And the particular facts stated by each of several expert witnesses upon the question of the sanity or insanity of another must be taken alone as the basis of the proposed opinion of that witness, and if they are found in themselves inconclusive in their nature, or of such a neutral character as to be consistent with either soundness or unsoundness, they cannot be assumed as the basis of an

it is fairly and reasonably conducted." It would seem that the learned judge below had this case in mind in the trial of the case now before us.

Miss Carrie Sparks testified for the state that she knew where defendant lived on the 24th day of July, 1896; that, about seven o'clock P. M. of said day, she was passing said house, and heard a voice,—a woman's voice,—pitched high, saying, "I am not going to stand this thing any longer;" that she was positive as to the day and the high tone of the voice. Counsel asked the court to note their exception to this evidence, because the same was not in rebuttal. The court replied that no objections had been made. Counsel for defendant then moved to exclude the evidence, because not in rebuttal. This the court refused to do. In this there was no error, because the court had the discretion to receive evidence until the argument was concluded, whether in rebuttal or not.

O. H. Gibson was permitted to relate to the jury a business transaction which he had with the defendant. The transaction occurred a few days before the homicide. Counsel for defendant objected, because the predicate laid by the testimony of the witness was not a sufficient basis to authorize an expression of opinion as to the sanity of defendant. This objection was overruled, and witness answered that, in his opinion, defendant was then sane; that is, at the time of the transaction. To this bill of exceptions the learned judge appends the following explanation: "That said witness was asked his opinion as to defendant's sanity at the time of his conversation with him about the check on Wednesday before July 24, opinion. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37.

A medical expert upon the question of sanity or insanity need not give all the details upon which his opinion is based, however, as the opinion sometimes depends upon the looks and gestures connected with acts, conduct, or conversation, which would be difficult if not impossible for the witness to intelligently describe. State v. Lewis, 20 Nev. 333.

But a question asked an expert witness in a will contest in which insanity is alleged is incompetent where it refers to facts which, standing alone or in connection with other things, has no tendency to show insanity or incompetency at any time. Prentiss v. Bates, 88 Mich. 567.

And the fact that persons who observed the conduct of a testator advised his wife that it was unsafe for her to remain alone with him is not a proper one upon which to base a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding the testator's sanity,—at least where his conversations are not stated and his conduct detailed. Re Barber, 68 Conn. 303, 22 L. R. A. 90.

And the fact that many persons after conversations with a testator and observing his conduct believed him to be insane is not a proper one upon which to base a hypothetical question to an expert as to his capacity to form an opinion regarding the testator's sanity,—at least where the conversations are not stated and his conduct not described. Re Barber, 68 Conn. 303, 22 L. R. A. 90.

So, proof that a testator made remarks to the effect that his son-in-law was a terrible man and a scoundrel, that he spoke bitterly against him and complained because his daughter had gone back to live with him, does not tend to show that he believed his daughter was trying to deprive him of his liberty and had been slandering him, so as to support a hypothetical question asked an expert witness based upon such an hypothesis. Bomgardner v. Andrews, 55 Iowa, 638.

And testimony as to the effect of hypnotism upon persons subject to such influence is not admissible in a criminal prosecution where there was no evidence which tended to show that the defendant was subject to hypnotism; merely showing that she was told to kill another, and that she did it, not establishing hypnotism. People v. Worthington, 106 Cal. 166.

But testimony of an expert witness in an action against a railroad company for a personal injury in which the person injured had given a receipt and release of all claim shortly after the accident, that his mind might have been dazed or confused as the result of the injury, is admissible in evidence, though the testimony did not go so far as to show that that result was probable. Bliss v. New York, C. & H. R. R. Co. 160 Mass. 447.

And the testimony of a deputy sheriff in charge of a person accused of crime as to the acts and conduct of such person while in jail, and that he read letters written by him while there, and that from his acts and conduct and said letters in his opinion the defendant was at the time of sound mind, is not subject to the objection that he was a prisoner and under arrest and was not warned by the officer that his acts and expressions would be used against him, or that such letters were not produced or their loss accounted for. Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470. And see BURT v. STATE.

So, the opinion of an expert on the question of the sanity of a person whose sale is sought to be avoided on that ground cannot be given in evidence where it is based on incompetent evidence. Heald v. Thing, 45 Me. 302.

And declarations of a person accused of crime who interposes the defense of insanity as to the condition of his mind some time previous to the making of the declarations are not competent as evidence of his actual condition at that time, and cannot be made the basis of an opinion as to whether he was sane or insane at that time. People v. Hawkins, 109 N. Y. 408.

The jury in a criminal prosecution is entitled to the facts on which an insanity expert bases his opinion, however, and where these facts are the result of his own interviews with the defendant it is not only competent but necessary that they should be laid before the jury. People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317.

And facts assumed in propounding a hypothetical question to an expert witness in a will contest upon the ground of insanity, which are a part of the testator's history, and which, taken in connection with other circumstances, are proper to be considered as showing his condition of mind, are not subject to objection that they are irrelevant and immaterial and have no tendency to show unsoundness of mind. Bever v. Spangler, 93 Iowa, 576.

And a medical expert who has made an independent examination of the accused in a criminal prosecution while confined in jail awaiting trial in order to determine the question of his sanity, may testify to conversations had with the accused in the course of such professional examination, all that the accused said and did during such examination being competent as bearing upon his mental condition at the time he was examined. People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317.

In People v. Nino, 149 N. Y. 317, People v. Hawkins, 109 N. Y. 408, and People v. Strait, 143 N. Y. 566, intra, were distinguished upon the ground that 1896, and witness detailed at length the facts upon which he based his opinion, as is set out in statement of facts much more fully than in this bill, and answered that, upon the facts detailed, defendant was, in his opinion, at that time, sane." We are not required to consult the statement of facts to verify the judge's statement. If counsel for the accused was not satisfied with this statement, they should have inserted in the bill of exceptions all that Gibson stated. But, if the testimony of this witness is looked at, it will be found that, though not an expert, he was qualified to give an opinion as to the sanity of the defendant. This is not like the Williams Case, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687. In that case no facts were stated by the nonexperts as the basis of their opinion. Here the witnesses gave a full detail of such facts.

this is not the case of a man claimed to be insane at the time of the criminal act and admitted to have been sane ever since, but one in which it is asserted that the accused had been continuously insane from a period of some months before the crime up to the time of the trial.

So, a question asked an expert witness calling for his opinion on the question of the soundness of mind of another based on conversations had with him and their character and his actions at that time is not subject to the objection that it is too narrow and should have included all of his observations during the entire period of his acquaintance, where counsel did not attempt to modify the evidence by cross-examination. People v. Borgetto, 99 Mich. 336.

But interrogatories in a will contest should not be so framed as to allow the deponent to express opinions as to the sanity of the testator on hearsay. Conely v. McDonald, 40 Mich. 150.

And the opinion of a physician, based in part at least on representations made to him by the defendant or others prior to his trial on the question of his insanity, cannot be considered in a criminal prosecution. United States v. Faulkner, 35 Fed. Rep. 730.

And representations made by an attending physician to a consulting physician as to the previous symptoms and condition of the testator are not admissible in a will contest after the death of the attending physician on the question of what the symptoms were or as a basis for the opinion of the consulting physician. Wetherbee v. Wetherbee, 36 Vt. 454.

And an expert witness in a criminal prosecution cannot give his opinion as to the sanity or insanity of the accused at the time of the criminal act based upon the story told by the accused himself which is not in evidence,—especially where the statements were made by the defendant long after the criminal act. People v. Strait, 148 N. Y. 596.

And the narration by a person whose sanity is in question, of what he said or did, or of his feelings or bodily ailments upon a former occasion, furnishes no foundation for an opinion as to his actual state or condition at that time. People v. Hawkins, 109 N. Y. 408.

So, an expert witness upon the question of insanity in a will contest cannot repeat an account which he had received from a monomaniac as to the development of his own disease or an account received by him from an unprofessional nurse of another insane person in support of his opinion. Wood v. Sawyer, Phill. L. 251.

And a physician who had visited an invalid in consultation with his attending physician cannot give evidence in an action brought to avoid a sale of the invalid's property made a short time

R. A. Rutherford was permitted to give his opinion as to the sanity of the appellant. Counsel for appellant made the same objection to this witness as he did to the testimony of Gibson, above, and the learned judge gives the same explanation to the bill of exceptions. In regard to this bill we make the same observations as with reference to Gibson's testimony above, holding that he very clearly qualified himself to give an opinion on the sanity of the accused.

Counsel for appellant proposed to read certain excerpts from standard works on medical jurisprudence and the disease of insanity. The state objected, and the court sustained the objections, and defendant reserved his bill of exceptions. We have carefully read the brief of appellant on this phase of the case, and, while counsel seem very confident that the afterwards upon the ground of insanity, of declarations made to him at that time by the vendor's wife, physician, or other attendant as to his previous symptoms or condition. Heald v. Thing, 45 Me. 362.

And the superintendent of an insane asylum called as a witness in a will contest cannot give an opinion as to what must have been the condition of a patient in the asylum from the time of her admission to her death, where he had never seen her and knew nothing except what the records of the asylum showed, and he based his answer upon the absence from the record of those things which he says would undoubtedly have been noted if they had existed. Prentiss v. Bates, 88 Mich. 567.

A record of the condition and treatment of a patient in a hospital produced at a trial forty years after its date by the superintendent as part of a series of records of which he is the official custodian, purporting to have been contemporaneously made by the attending physician of all cases there treated, and which it was their duty to make, however, is admissible in evidence as a foundation for the opinion of an expert as to whether it indicates mental disease of the patient without identifying the person who made it. Townsend v. Pepperell, 90 Mass. 40.

And the opinion of an expert witness on a hypothetical question as to a testator's mental soundness is not affected or rendered inadmissible by the fact that the hypothesis was based upon a state of facts describing the testator's physical condition as testified to by the medical expert himself and known to him. Re Flint, 100 Cal. 891.

And an opinion of a medical expert examined at a former trial of the same cause is not rendered inadmissible in an action upon a promissory note in which the insanity of the maker is alleged as a defense by the fact that new and unexpected matters had been introduced at the second trial upon which no cross-examination was conducted. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 108 Pa. 37.

So, a statement in a certificate by a physician upon which a lunatic was confined, that he had formed his opinion from the fact that she had labored under delusions of various kinds and that she was dirty and indecent in the extreme, is sufficient under 8 and 9 Vict. chap. 100, § 46, requiring the physician to specify therein any facts upon which he has formed his opinion. Re Shuttleworth, 11 Jur. 41, 2 New Sess. Car. 470, 9 Q. B. 651, 16 L. J. M. C. N. S. 18.

VIII. Scope.

a. General considerations.

A question asked a medical expert in a will contest on the issue of insanity is objectionable when court committed an error in rejecting these excerpts, they cite no authority in support of their contention. We have no statute on this subject. The rules of evidence known to the common law of England must therefore prevail. What is the common law upon this question? In Queen v. Crouch, 1 Cox, C. C. 94, the prisoner was indicted for the wilful murder of his wife, and the defense set up was insanity. We quote the case in full: "Clarkson, for the prisoner, in his address to the jury, attempted to quote from a work entitled 'Cooper's Surgery,' the author's opinions on the subject. Alderson, B., thought that he was not justified in doing so. Clarkson.—I quote it, my lord, as embodying the sentiments of one who has studied the subject, and submit that it is admissible in the same way as opinions of scientific men on matters appertaining to foreign law may be given in evidence. Alderson, B.—I should not allow you to read a work on foreign law. Any person who was properly conversant with it might be examined, but then he adds his own personal knowledge and experience to the information he may have derived from books. We must have the evidence of individuals, not their written opinions. We should be inundated with books if we were to hold otherwise. Clarkson.—I shall prove the book to be one of high authority. Alderson, B.—But can that mend the matter? You surely cannot contend that you may give the book in evidence, and, if not, what right have you to quote from it in your address, and do that indirectly which you would not be permitted to do in the ordinary course? Clarkson.—It was certainly done, my lord, in M'Naughten's Case [10 Clark & F. it assumes a state of facts upon which no medical or expert opinion should be based. Thornton v. Thornton, 39 Vt. 122.

And the doubt of an expert upon the question of insanity is not admissible in evidence in a prosecution for homicide. Sanchez v. People, 22 N. Y. 147.

So, medical experts in a prosecution for homicide in which insanity is alleged cannot give their opinions as to the value of the opinion on such a matter of a witness not an expert. People v. Webster, 60 Mun. 386.

And an expert witness upon the question of soundness or unsoundness of mind cannot be asked whether he regards another expert witness in the same case as good authority, as his opinion on such question might be based upon mere reputation. People v. Holmes (Mich.) 3 Det. L. N. 689.

But a question asked an expert witness in a will contest as to whether in his opinion the testatrix might have recovered her sanity assuming her condition to have been as stated by another expert calls for his opinion upon the facts stated by the other expert, and not upon such facts combined with his opinion, and is therefore competent. Foster v. Dickerson, 64 Vt. 233.

So, a medical expert who had been asked whether the headaches of a person whose sanity is in question were neuralgic or proceeded from a disordered stomach, and who declined to give any medical opinion thereon, cannot be asked what impression was made on his mind by interviews had by him with such person, as it was the medical opinion of the witness alone which was admissible; his opinion, unless based upon his professional knowledge, being no more admissible than that of any other man. Higbee v. Guardian Mut. L. Ins. Co. 66 Barb. 466.

A question asked an expert witness on the question of sanity or insanity of another should be so framed as to require him to state the measure of such person's capacity in his own language by such ordinary terms or forms of expression as may best convey his own ideas. Hall v. Perry, 87 Me. 569; Fairchild v. Bascom, 35 Vt. 298.

A proper form of a question asked an expert in a prosecution for homicide in which insanity is alleged is, Was the accused of sound or unsound mind? Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260.

And a question asked an expert witness in an action involving the validity of a gift whether the mind of the donor was in such a condition that he could understandingly dispose of $5,000 worth of government bonds, is objectionable only as being leading. Melendy v. Spaulding, 64 Vt. 517.

So, an expert witness in an action for the recovery of property alleged to have been disposed of while insane cannot be asked to state facts tending to show the state of the vendor's mind as to soundness; he can only be permitted to state how a party appeared in respect to soundness or unsoundness of mind. Wyman v. Gould, 47 Me. 159.

b. Symptoms and causes.

A medical expert on the question of sanity or insanity may be asked what are the symptoms of insanity. Lake v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 495.

And the question whether a certain trait was an indication of insanity involves the question of its nature, and an expert witness on the subject of insanity in a criminal case may be permitted to state whether such trait was a vice or a disease. United States v. Guiteau, 1 Mackey, 498, 47 Am. Rep. 247.

So, an expert witness in a prosecution for homicide in which epileptic insanity is alleged as a defense may give an opinion where he had seen the accused within an hour after the offense, as to whether there were any indications in his appearance of a recent epileptic attack. Com. v. Buocieri, 158 Pa. 535.

And it is not improper to ask an expert witness in a prosecution for homicide if he had discovered anything that led him to think that the accused was insane, though it is not claimed that his insanity was of that type which is manifested in the paroxysm of frenzy characteristic of a maniac. Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260.

And a medical witness examined as an expert on the question of insanity in a criminal prosecution may be asked his opinion upon a hypothetical statement of facts and what the symptoms of insanity are, the question as to whether such facts existed or such symptoms are proved being left exclusively for the jury. Lake v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 495.

The proper mode of examining an expert witness in a criminal prosecution upon the question of insanity is first to inquire as to the particular symptoms of insanity, asking whether all or any, and which, of the circumstances spoken of by the witness upon the trial should be regarded as such symptoms, and then to inquire of them whether any, and what, combination of these circumstances would in his opinion amount to proof of insanity. McCann v. People, 3 Park. Crim. Rep. 272.

Questions asked an expert witness in a will contest in which insanity is alleged, as to whether certain specified symptoms in connection with testimony, which is not specified, indicate unsoundness of mind, however, are improper. Re Storer, 28 Minn. 9.

So, in Anderson v. State, 42 Ga. 9, refusal of the trial court to allow a physician called as a witness on an issue as to mental soundness to explain to the jury the structure of the brain, what changes were produced upon it by bodily disease, and how its 200]. Alderson, B.—And that shows still more strongly the necessity for a stringent adherence to the rules laid down for our observance. But for the noninterposition of the judge in that case, you would not probably have thought it necessary to make this struggle now." The case of Reg. v. Taylor, 13 Cox, C. C. 77, was another murder case. The deed was done by cutting the throat of the deceased in the presence of only a child about nine years old. Counsel for the defense, in addressing the jury, set up insanity on the part of the prisoner, and proposed to read a case from Taylor's Medical Jurisprudence. Brett, J., says: "That is no evidence in a court of justice. It is a mere statement by a medical man of hearsay facts of cases at which he was in all probability not present. I cannot allow it to be read." In line with this common-law rule will be found the cases following: Ash- irritation and inflammation were calculated to present to the mind unreal images upon which a person with a diseased brain might be induced to act as though the imaginary impressions really existed, was upheld on appeal.

But to what extent and in what manner the mind of the testator was affected by disease, or what was his mental condition, is a question of fact upon which it is competent for professional witnesses to express their opinions in a will contest. Kempsey v. McGinniss, 21 Mich. 123.

And a medical expert in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged may be properly asked if, supposing a man had inherited a predisposition to insanity, great mental anxiety, loss of property, or the honor of one's family, and losses of other kinds would be likely to develop the disease. De Jarnette v. Com. 75 Va. 367.

And evidence on a trial for larceny in which it appeared that the defendant was addicted to the habitual and excessive use of opium in some of its forms, and that at the time of the alleged commission of the act he had been deprived of his accustomed supply of the drug, as to what effect such deprivation would have upon his mental condition, is admissible as tending to show whether or not he was in such a condition mentally as to be able to commit larceny. Rogers v. State, 33 Ind. 543.

So, an expert witness in a prosecution for homicide who has stated that the facts assumed in a hypothetical question indicate mental unsoundness may be asked in regard to the state and degree of mental soundness then indicated, and how far it will disqualify the person for business or render him unconscious of the nature of his conduct; and he should be inquired of as to whether the facts are explainable in any other mode than upon the theory of insanity, and with what degree of certainty they indicate the inference drawn by the witnesses. Reed v. State, 62 Miss. 405.

And evidence by a medical expert that persons asleep sometimes act as if awake, and walk and talk and answer questions, and do a great many things, and yet are unconscious, and that with many there is a period between sleeping and waking in which they are unconscious though they seem to be awake, and that loss of sleep and other causes which produce nervous depression or mental anxiety may produce such a state of unconsciousness between sleeping and waking, and evidence that the children of the accused had been sick and he had in consequence lost much sleep, is admissible in a prosecution for homicide in having killed a person who suddenly awoke him from a sound sleep. Fain v. Com. 78 Ky. 183, 39 Am. Rep. 213.

worth v. Kittridge, 12 Cush. 193, 59 Am. Dec. 178; Boyle v. State, 57 Wis. 472, 46 Am. Rep. 41; Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 337. We quote from Boyle v. State, 57 Wis. 472, 46 Am. Rep. 41, as follows: "Medical books cannot be introduced in evidence, nor can an expert witness be permitted to testify as to statements made therein. And it is equally inadmissible to permit the reading of such book to the jury by counsel." "In the trial of a criminal case, where the defense relied on is the insanity of the defendant, neither books of established reputation on the subject of insanity, whether written by medical men or lawyers, nor statistics of the increase of insanity, as stated by the court or counsel on the trial of another case, can be read to the jury." Com. v. Wilson, 1 Gray, 337.

Counsel proposed to read the same excerpts from these standard works in explanation and homicide on behalf of the accused cannot be asked on his examination in chief, however, what he considered some of the commonest and most frequent causes both of epilepsy and insanity. Hall v. Com. 22 W. N. C. 26.

And a medical expert cannot be asked on a criminal trial in which insanity was pleaded as a defense, whether certain domestic troubles would constitute a sufficient cause to produce insanity, the issue being whether the defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the offense, and not what would be a sufficient cause to produce insanity. Carter v. State, 56 Ga. 463.

Nor can a medical expert be asked on an issue as to the validity of a will in which the sanity of a testatrix is in question, and evidence of her insanity has been given, and it appears that she had a paralytic attack shortly before the execution of the alleged will, whether in nine cases out of ten paralysis does not produce any effect upon the mind, the existence of the phenomenon not being affected by any dispute as to its cause. Landis v. Landis, 1 Grant, Cas. 248.

c. Comparison; illustration; speculation.

A witness in a will contest on the question of sanity or insanity may compare the mind and memory of the testatrix with regard to the amount of property she was worth and the disposition she wished to make of it with that of an average child seven or eight years of age. Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 223.

But it is not competent for an expert witness in a criminal prosecution in which the accused is claimed to have become insane from an injury received to show that another had received an injury bearing some analogy to the injury inflicted upon the accused, and to show the effect it had upon his mind. People v. Holmes (Mich.) 3 Det. L. N. 689.

And refusal to permit an expert witness who had declared his opinion in a prosecution for homicide that the defendant was suffering from recurrent insanity at the time, to give illustrations of recurrent insanity which had come within his own personal experience, if erroneous, could not materially affect the defendant's rights, and would be error without prejudice. Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 633.

So, an expert witness in a prosecution for homicide in which epileptic insanity is alleged as a defense, called to give his opinion as to the effect of epilepsy upon the memory, may give as an illustration of a sound memory an opinion as to the prisoner's power of memory from the nature and accuracy of his narrative on the witness stand. Com. v. Buccieri, 153 Pa. 535.

elaboration of his argument. The court refused to allow this to be done, and defendant reserved his bill of exceptions. The authorities cited on the preceding question are in point, and, in addition, we cite People v. Wheeler, 60 Cal. 581, 44 Am. Rep. 70; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Bratt, 55 Md. 200; Rogers, Expert Testimony, § 179.

Dr. Davis was placed upon the stand as a witness for the state, and, after proving his acquaintance, etc., with the defendant, he was permitted to testify that the defendant was simulating, that is, playing a part, and not acting naturally. This was objected to by defendant, "because immaterial, and it would throw no light to the jury by which to read a solution of the question of guilt or no guilt in defendant as to the issue before the jury, to wit, sanity or no sanity in the defendant on the 24th of July, 1896, the day of the alleged offense for which defendant was on trial; that simulation or no simulation at this time, and in the present surroundings of defendant, would not help to aid the jury in determining whether this defendant was sane or insane on the 24th day of July, 1896, when the offense for which he is on trial was alleged to have been committed. All objections were overruled, and the exception reserved." The learned judge qualifies this bill of exceptions by stating "that the witness testified that he had carefully observed the defendant and his demeanor during the trial which had lasted about seven days; that he had qualified himself as an expert previously; and that the defendant himself had offered in evidence the manner and appearance of the defendant, the way he demeaned himself during the trial, as an evidence of his insanity at the time of the trial. The defendant had demeaned himself

One who has testified as a medical expert, and stated all that he had seen or heard, and given his own opinion thereon concerning the sanity of a person, however, need not be allowed to be asked what mental science teaches on the subject. Davis v. United States, 165 U. S. 873, 41 L. ed. 750.

And a medical expert who has testified as to his opinion on the question of insanity cannot be asked on direct examination as to whether the theory in question is supported by the authorities, the medical works themselves being the best evidence as to what they teach; though he might be inquired of as to the teachings of the authorities on cross-examination to test the accuracy of his knowledge. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

And the counsel for the accused in a prosecution for murder cannot be permitted to read to an expert witness on the question of sanity what had been said by an eminent authority in a medical journal and then ask him whether he concurred in the views there expressed, but he may use such journal to assist him in framing questions for the witness as to his own opinions, and read from standard authorities upon medical jurisprudence to the jury. State v. Coleman, 20 S. C. 441.

And refusal to permit a medical expert who had given his opinion on the question of insanity as such to answer a question as to whether he had read an article in a medical journal written by a prominent physician, and as to whether the same agrees and accords with his knowledge and experience on the subject, is not an abuse of discretion, as it would have been but a reiteration in another form of the opinion he had already expressed. State v. Winter, 72 Iowa, 627.

d. Questions of law for the court.

Expert witnesses on the question of sanity or insanity should not be asked to define words which have a fixed and well-known signification, such as monomania, except perhaps on cross-examination. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 580.

And questions in a prosecution for homicide, asked a medical expert, extending over an almost unlimited field of inquiry, involving a discussion of the law of insanity in all its complicated and mysterious phases, are objectionable as consuming the time of the court and tending to confuse and mislead the minds of the jury. Dejarnette v. Com. 75 Va. 867.

And a medical expert in a will contest upon the ground of mental incapacity cannot be asked if rational conduct and coherent conversations are not the best evidence of the existence of a lucid interval, especially if such conduct and conversations relate to the subject of a delusion; he should be asked whether a given state of facts tends to prove delusion or insanity. Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69.

So, evidence of an expert witness in a criminal prosecution that a man suffering from delirium tremens has no more control over his actions in that respect than a man suffering from delirium produced through any other cause, but that he still is sane, is inadmissible as directly opposed to the established legal rule upon the question. French v. State, 38 Wis. 325.

But evidence of a medical expert in an action upon a life insurance policy conditioned to be invalid in case of death resulting from intentional injuries where the insured was killed by a person alleged to be insane, that insanity is the result of a diseased mind, and that an insane person may have no power to resist an insane impulse although he knows it is wrong, and that he will sometimes hide and conceal the evidence of his crime with more particularity and ingenuity than a sane person would use, offers no ground for a reversal because it contradicts the rule of insanity established by the supreme court of the state, as the witness testifies in the abstract to a certain phase or kind of insanity, and his evidence is not addressed to the mental condition of the person whose sanity is in question. Marceau v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 101 Cal. 338.

And the admission in evidence in a will contest of a statement by a medical expert that the fact that a testatrix told those around her she wanted to get someone to make a will would be evidence of delirium, is harmless error as it is common knowledge that the condition referred to is not evidence of delirium but of its absence. McHugh v. Fitzgerald, 103 Mich. 21.

e. Questions of fact for the jury.

Inferences from facts proved are to be drawn and found by the jury, and cannot be proved as facts by the opinions of witnesses. People v. Barber, 115 N. Y. 475.

Thus, inferences to be derived from general peculiarities in the manner, speech, behavior, and letters of an alleged lunatic on the question of insanity should be drawn by the jury themselves, and not from the opinions formed by medical witnesses. Morrison v. Macilaine, 24 Scotch Sess. Cas. 625.

So, it is not for an expert witness to testify in a criminal action whether particular conduct not in itself irrational is prompted by an insane delusion. State v. Scott, 41 Minn. 365.

Nor can he state whether in his opinion the accused was competent to apply the rules of right and wrong to any state of circumstances concerning which he was under high excitement or the influquite unusual to an ordinary individual on such a trial, and under these circumstances the evidence as to whether or not he was then intentionally trying to play a part or simulate insanity was admitted, and this question was put to witness after the hypothetical question stated in other bills had been answered by him." From this explanation it appears that the appellant entered this field of evidence by offering testimony of his manner and appearance and demeanor during the trial, as evidence of insanity at that time. Unquestionably, the state could follow him, and introduce evidence as to this same matter. It was evidently the purpose of the appellant, when introducing this evidence, to convince the jury that, as he was then insane, the probability was that he was insane at the time of the homicide. The court was clearly right in admitting this testimony.

ence of an uncontrollable impulse. Com. v. Rich, 14 Gray, 335.

And refusal to ask a nonexpert witness in a criminal prosecution in which the question of insanity is involved whether the accused could control his appetite for intoxicating liquor, is not error. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

So, the question whether a change in a testator's life purpose to provide for a sister, occurring upon his deathbed and without apparent motive and reason, and unexplained, indicates any change in his intellect, is not one for the opinion of an expert. Re Nelson, 39 Minn. 304.

And the admission of evidence of a physician in a will contest that it is the duty of a physician when called upon to treat a patient to examine into his mental condition is erroneous, the material question being what examination was in fact made, and it being for the jury to determine the weight to be given to the testimony of the physician. Maynard v. Vinton, 59 Mich. 129, 60 Am. Rep. 276.

And medical witnesses in an action for a personal injury to an employee against his employer, who is alleged to have been an epileptic to the knowledge of his employer, who was injured from being required by such employer to work in a dangerous place, who had testified that unconsciousness on the part of the epileptic that he was subject to epilepsy was one of the ordinary symptoms, and fully described all of the characteristics and symptoms of the disease to the extent that the plaintiff was affected by it, and to circumstances showing his condition developed by their examination, cannot be asked whether he would be likely to understand that he had epilepsy, as it would be in effect asking for the plaintiff's assertion that he did not know it, which is a question of fact for the jury. Crowley v. Appleton, 148 Mass. 98.

But the opinion of an expert witness as to whether the person whose sanity is in question knows moral good from evil and right from wrong is not objectionable as calling for the opinion of a witness as to the moral insanity of such person. State v. Leehman, 28 D. 171.

And a medical expert may give his opinion as to the mental condition of a grantor in an action involving his capacity to execute a deed with regard to his usual and ordinary capacity for doing business. Poole v. Dean, 152 Mass. 589.

And an expert witness in an action involving the capacity of a person to make a gift may give his opinion as to such person's capacity to dispose of and manage property to the value of several hundred dollars in one transaction. Melendy v. Spaulding, 54 Vt. 517.

So, it is proper in a prosecution for homicide in 39 L. R. A.

The hypothetical question was also submitted to this witness, and he answered that, in his opinion, the defendant was sane on the 24th day of July, 1896. The objections here raised are the same as those presented with reference to the hypothetical question submitted to Dr. Wooten, and treated in this opinion above, and therefore we will not go over this discussion again.

It appears from a bill of exceptions that, at the request of appellant, Dr. Wooten and others went to the jail, and took the dimensions of the skull of the defendant, and, while there, examined the defendant, talked to him, looked at him, and observed him. The state proved by Dr. Wooten that it was his opinion that defendant was sane at that time. This bill of exceptions refers us to the statement of facts. When we consult the statement of facts, we are clearly of the opinion that the which insanity is interposed as a defense to ask a medical expert if there is any known form of insanity where the mind at fits comes, and then there is a blank, and it goes, as it calls for a fact, and is not of a nature which makes hypothesis necessary. People v. Osmond, 138 N. Y. 80.

And a question addressed to a family physician in an action upon an insurance policy where the insured had committed suicide, what effect, if any, he would say, from his experience and reading and from his acquaintance with her mental condition, the disease of melancholia would have upon her as to her power to control her actions or to resist any impulse with which she might be seized, and his answer that the impulse and will in a majority of cases becomes uncontrollable, and that he thought that the impulse was uncontrollable in this case, is admissible in evidence. Koenig v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Hun, 558.

In Koenig v. Globe Mut. L. Ins. Co. 10 Hun, 558, Van Zandt v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 55 N. Y. 169, 14 Am. Rep. 215, in note to Brown v. Mitchell (Tex.) 36 L. R. A. 64, was distinguished upon the ground that in the case at bar the question was not based on any supposed fact, but upon the actual knowledge of the witness, who was the family physician of the deceased, and that it did call for a fact particularly within the knowledge of an expert,—that is, the effect of a certain disease upon the power to control actions and resist impulses.

So, any expression of opinion by a medical expert which will aid the jury on the question of soundness of mind necessarily involves the consideration of questions which are similar to that in issue, but that alone does not render the evidence incompetent if the witness is not permitted to express opinions upon the evidence, and if the questions are so framed as to confine him to a statement of his conclusions as an expert, and not to submit to him the precise issue which is presented to the jury. Poole v. Dean, 152 Mass. 589.

An opinion as to the sanity or insanity of another may not be given upon a point which it is the duty of the jury to determine. And the distinction between opinions which may or may not be given lies in permitting opinions as to what capacity is as a question of fact, and rejecting opinions as to what is legal capacity as a question of law or mixed law and fact. Hamrick v. State, Hamrick, 184 Ind. 324.

f. The question at issue.

See Brown v. Mitchell and note, Right of witness to give an opinion on the exact issue to be tried in respect to sanity or mental capacity, 36 L. R. A. 64. And see Hall v. Perry, 87 Me. 550, supra, 111.

observations of defendant by Wooten were amply sufficient to warrant him in giving an opinion, and there was no error in admitting his testimony. Another bill of exceptions was reserved to the testimony of Dr. Wooten as an expert as to the sanity of the defendant, but when considered in the light of the explanation of the trial judge, it presents no error whatever.

Jack Hughes was placed on the stand for the state, by whom it was shown that he had noticed the fact that the defendant had struck his head against the window frame the day before, as he passed through the window, and that it was the only time the defendant had done so in the many times he had passed through said window during the trial. It appears that defendant had offered in evidence the appearance of himself during the trial, his manner of coming in and going out of the court room, etc., as shown by the statement of facts. This presents the same question that we have discussed above in relation to the defendant simulating insanity. We find no error in this matter.

After proving by Dr. Smoot that he was fifty years of age, a minister of the gospel, and, as such, serving the Presbyterian Church in the city of Austin for twenty years, and that he had read some authors on moral and intellectual science, but nothing on insanity or medical jurisprudence, the appellant proposed to prove by him that, in his opinion, the defendant was insane on the 24th of July, 1896, the day the offense is alleged to have been committed; and the state objected, because Dr. Smoot was not an expert. The court refused to permit the witness to testify on this phase of the case, and we think the ruling was correct. This witness was of-

IX. Cross-examination; contradiction, redirect examination.

An expert witness upon an issue of mental soundness, who has expressed an opinion based upon facts assumed by the party calling him to have been proved, or upon a hypothetical case put by such party, may be cross-examined by taking his opinion based on any other state of facts assumed by the cross-examiner to have been proved upon a hypothetical case. Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 496, 9 Am. Rep. 760; Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277; People v. Lake, 12 N. Y. 358.

And the proponents of a will are not confined to the use of the same hypothetical questions which the contestants had used, as the proponents might judge that some of the facts included in such questions used by the contestants would not be found by the jury. Foster v. Dickerson, 61 Vt. 233.

But error in refusing to permit the defense in a criminal prosecution to examine an expert witness on the question of sanity or insanity introduced by the prosecution, and who had given an opinion based upon facts assumed by the party introducing him by taking his opinion based on another set of facts assumed by the defense to have been proved, is cured where the defense calls the same witness on its behalf, and examines him fully as to matters which would have been elicited by the questions put on cross-examination. Grubb v. State, 117 Ind. 277.

So, expert witnesses on the question of insanity may be cross-examined on purely imaginary and abstract questions assuming facts and theories which have or have not foundation in the evidence. The allowance of such questions rests within the sound discretion of the court. Bever v. Spangler, 98 Iowa, 576; People v. Augsburg, 97 N. Y. 501.

And a witness who has testified as an expert, on behalf of the accused in a prosecution for homicide, as to his mental condition, may be asked on cross-examination if from his experience and conversations with him he thinks the accused killed the man because he threatened his life. Davis v. United States, 165 U. S. 373, 41 L. ed. 750.

So, it is proper upon cross-examination in a proceeding in the nature of a writ de lunatico inquiring to show that an expert witness testifying against the alleged lunatic, in order to qualify himself as a witness, obtained admission to her house by fraudulent means without the consent and against the will of those present and in the absence of her attending physician. Re Mason, 60 Hun, 46.

And a medical expert who has been examined in support of another witness who had had a paralytic attack, and testified that he knew her well and had seen her about fifteen months subsequent to such attack, and that he could then discover no impairment of her faculties, may be asked on cross-examination if paralysis did not have a tendency to impair the mind of old persons, where the evidence of such person was in direct conflict with the testimony of a witness upon the other side. Lord v. Beard, 79 N. C. 5.

And where it appears in a prosecution for homicide that an expert witness had examined the defendant for the people while in jail awaiting trial upon a previous charge, and evidence of the former trial and conviction were introduced into and made a part of the hypothetical question asked him, intended to array the facts for the opinion of the defendant's insanity, it is not incompetent to elicit upon his cross-examination the facts about such previous examination. People v. Hoch, 150 N. Y. 291.

So, after expert witnesses in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged as a defense have given their opinions on the direct examination, inquiries may be put to them on cross-examination tending to test their skill and capacity and the correctness of their conclusions, and they may be asked whether certain facts already sworn to did not furnish evidence of insanity. People v. Lake, 12 N. Y. 358; Lake v. People, 1 Park. Crim. Rep. 496.

And a medical expert called by the defendant in a prosecution for murder in which insanity is relied upon as a defense may be asked on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing his competency, as to whether or not certain hypothetical facts would indicate insanity. People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 243.

And a physician called as a witness in a trial for murder in which insanity is interposed as a defense, who has stated on direct examination that in his opinion the person was insane, may be asked on cross-examination, in order to test the accuracy and value of his opinion, whether in his opinion the accused knew right from wrong and that it would be wrong for him to commit the crime in question. Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 488, 40 Am. Dec. 481.

So, a witness in a criminal prosecution who had testified to certain events in the history of the person having a tendency to bring on a diseased condition of the brain may be asked by the state on cross-examination what would be the effect in his opinion of the injuries described, both as a means of testing his capacity and for the purpose of eliciting further facts. State v. Reddick, 7 Kan. 143.

But refusal to permit a medical expert on the question of sanity or insanity to be asked whether he had ever examined a designated person for the purpose of showing that the same symptoms existed in the case of such person, and that he had been ferred as an expert when in fact he was not an expert. It was not proposed to prove his opinion as to whether defendant was sane or insane from what he knew of the defendant, his associations with him, etc., but simply to obtain his opinion as an expert.

We are not informed of any case holding that because a prisoner is in jail, unwarned, therefore his conduct cannot be observed, so that the expert can give an opinion as to his sanity. It would be a remarkable case, indeed, in which the accused, if insane, would simulate sanity. We cannot comprehend how the fact that he was in jail could affect his conduct in this particular in any manner, and therefore the ruling of the court in regard to the testimony of Dr. M. M. Smith was correct. See Adams v. State, 34 Tex. Crim. Rep. 470.

The matters contained in the bill of exceptions in reference to the testimony of Dr. Goodall Wooten have been disposed of in treating of the bill of exceptions relating to the testimony of Dr. Wooten, hereinbefore discussed.

The objection to the testimony of R. E. White, sheriff, is not well taken. He had warned the defendant, and after being warned, anything that the defendant stated to him was admissible, and he had a right to give his opinion as to the sanity of the defendant. Having stated detailed conversations, facts, acts, and his observations of the defendant, he was qualified to give an opinion. In addition to this, we will not be forced to peruse the statement of facts in order to ascertain whether the witness qualified himself or not. As before stated, it is the duty of counsel for appellant to set forth the facts in the bill of exceptions. But, to satisfy ourselves that the learned judge acted properly, we have examined the testimony of this witness in the statement to an asylum upon a doctor's certificate, cannot be held erroneous where there was no offer to show that he had been sent to the asylum upon the same indications existing in the case on trial and upon those alone, or that the witness observed or knew of any such symptoms in such case; in order to render the question competent on cross-examination as a basis of impeachment it should have appeared from the offer that the witness made a certificate or statement in another case contradictory to or inconsistent with his testimony on the trial. People v. Youngs, 151 N. Y. 210.

So, expert witnesses in a prosecution for homicide cannot be asked hypothetical questions upon cross-examination upon the question of the sanity of the accused where the hypothesis is wholly unsupported by evidence. Kearney v. State, 68 Miss. 233; State v. Hanley, 34 Minn. 430. But see Bever v. Spangler, 93 Iowa, 576; People v. Augsburg, 97 N. Y. 501, supra.

And it is improper in the examination of an expert witness who has testified in a will contest to the mental incapacity of the testator, to select a few facts which tend naturally to show competency and sanity and ask him whether they change his opinion. All the facts bearing upon the question should be included. Prentiss v. Bates, 88 Mich. 567.

And an expert witness in a proceeding to set aside a deed, whose testimony on direct examination was confined to a contradiction of the theory of another expert witness called by the other side, cannot be asked on cross-examination a hypothetical question in all respects similar to the questions propounded by the cross-examination to his own witnesses. Gridley v. Boggs, 62 Cal. 190.

So, an expert witness on insanity called by the prosecution on a trial for murder, who had examined the prisoner, cannot be asked on cross-examination why and for what purpose he made the examination. Hall v. Com. 22 W. N. C. 25.

And refusal to permit an expert witness in a criminal prosecution, who has declared his opinion that the defendant at the time of the criminal act was suffering from recurrent insanity, to state whether he could give any illustration of recurrent insanity which had come within his own personal experience, is not reversible error. Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638.

And a statement of his opinion, made by a medical expert in a criminal prosecution, as to the mental condition of the accused, at the instance of the attorney general, which is placed in the hands of the prisoner's counsel by the attorney general for use in framing questions on cross-examination, will not be permitted to be put in evidence against the objection of the attorney general, especially where the counsel for the accused acquiesces in and avails himself of the offer of the attorney general by using it in cross-examination. Com. v. Pomeroy, 117 Mass. 143.

A physician introduced as a witness by the commonwealth in a prosecution for murder, who testifies as an expert to the effect that in his opinion the accused was sane at the time of the killing, may be contradicted by the accused, however, after laying the proper foundation, by showing that a month after the killing he expressed his opinion that the accused was insane when he did it. Montgomery v. Com. 88 Ky. 509.

But a medical book stated by an expert witness upon the question of sanity or insanity to be an authority cannot be read in evidence for the purpose of contradicting the evidence of an expert witness given upon cross-examination. Macfarland's Trial, 8 Abb. Pr. N. S. 57.

So, a question asked an expert witness upon re-examination, in a will contest in which insanity is alleged, without repeating, and which does not include the hypothesis stated upon the direct and cross-examination, is within the legitimate limits of re-examination, and will be understood to rest upon that hypothesis, where carefully formed hypothetical questions had been put to him and these without being repeated in terms were subsequently referred to as a basis for numerous additional inquiries bearing upon the question during the direct and cross examination. McGinnis v. Kempey, 27 Mich. 363.

And error in permitting a medical expert to give his opinion in a criminal prosecution on redirect examination as to whether the accused so far lost control of himself as to commit the act involuntarily, based upon his acts immediately before and immediately after the act and what he said immediately after, will be considered as immaterial and without prejudice where the facts occurring immediately before and immediately after were practically uncontroverted and the witness had several times expressed a like opinion in answering hypothetical questions upon his antecedent examination. Jones v. People, 23 Colo. 276.

The opinion of an expert witness that from the facts adduced the accused was sane, produced by the people in rebuttal, does not constitute new matter which will entitle the accused to the privilege of calling experts for the purpose of procuring contrary opinions. People v. Hill, 116 Cal. 562.

But evidence of a qualified expert in a prosecution for murder in which insanity is alleged, as to whether alcohol taken internally acts upon the brain and is a direct brain poison and is regarded as a cause of insanity, offered by the defense on redirect examination, is not objectionable as a reopening of the case where the prosecution had intro-ment of facts, and find him qualified as a witness.

Objection was made to the charge of the court. We think the charge is an admirable one. It was the duty of the court, in defining murder in the first degree or murder upon express malice, to charge the jury: "Do the facts and circumstances in this case show such a reckless disregard of human life as necessarily includes a formed design against the life of the person slain? If they do, the killing, if it amounts to murder, would be upon express malice." This charge is amply supported by a number of authorities. If sane, it would be almost morally impossible for the homicide to be committed, under the circumstances in this case (the prisoner having slain his own wife and two little children), without it being upon express malice. This homicide, with its attending circumstances, evinces a reckless disregard of human life, which is the conclusive evidence of express malice. There was no passion attending this homicide, and the defendant's mind was in the same condition when he killed his wife as it was when he killed the two little children. We are of opinion that the charge is eminently correct when viewed as a whole.

A number of methods, modes, and instruments were alleged to have been used in the perpetration of the crime. The indictment alleges that it was "by then and there striking, beating, and wounding the said Anna M. Burt upon her head and face, with a hatchet and some heavy instrument, a better description of which the grand jurors are unable to give, thereby fracturing the skull and the bones of the face of the said Anna M. Burt, and by then and there tying tightly around the throat and neck of said Anna M. Burt a handkerchief, duced evidence tending to show, and the opinions of witnesses to the effect, that all the conduct and conditions shown by the defense to establish insanity might be attributed to intoxication rather than insanity, the purpose being to disprove the theory of the prosecution. People v. Straff, 154 N. Y. 165.

X. Weight.

a. Generally.

Scientific evidence is not necessarily required to satisfy a jury of the insanity of a person accused of crime; it is sufficient if the evidence of facts was such as to indicate an insane state of mind. Reg. v. Dart, 14 Cox, C. C. 143; People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 482.

And there is nothing in the nature of inquiries concerning mental capacity in will contests which requires juries to be informed as of necessity, by other than ordinary witnesses, as in case of natural decay from age or weakness. Beaubien v. Clootte, 12 Mich. 459.

So, while the opinions of medical experts upon an issue of sanity or insanity should be considered by the jury in connection with all the other evidence in the case, they are not bound to act upon them to the exclusion of the other testimony. Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99.

When permitted to testify they stand substantially on the same footing as any other witness as to credibility. Eggers v. Eggers, 57 Ind. 461.

Thus, the opinions of medical men as to sanity or insanity are not conclusive in a criminal prosecution, but are to be weighed by the jury as other testimony. McAllister v. State, 17 Ala. 434, 52 Am. Dec. 180; Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 511; Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424; Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99.

Though such testimony is all on one side, Williams v. State, 50 Ark. 511.

And if the whole evidence does not satisfy their minds that insanity existed at the time the act was done, they should convict the prisoner although the medical witnesses were of the opinion that he was insane. McAllister v. State, 17 Ala. 434, 52 Am. Dec. 180.

But expert evidence is intended to aid the jury in coming to a correct conclusion, and when the experience, honesty, and impartiality of the witness is undoubted, it is entitled to great weight. Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424.

So, the opinions of medical experts are not conclusive in a will contest on the ground of mental incapacity, but must be weighed as any other evidence. Chandler v. Barrett, 21 La. Ann. 58, 90 Am. Dec. 701; Re Kledalsch, 2 Connolly, 438.

And the opinion of the attending physician and nurse of a testator that he was incompetent to make a will, unaided by any circumstances to show that when his attention was aroused or called to the subject of the will his mind did not run in the same even and reasonable channel, is not conclusive but may be outweighed by circumstances tending to show his competency. Tompkins v. Tompkins, 1 Ball. L. 92, 19 Am. Dec. 656.

So, the court will not be controlled by the opinions of experts in passing upon the question of mental capacity in an action for interdiction, but will give them a respectful consideration, and also give legitimate weight to every act bearing on the issue, and form its decree from its own conclusions. Francke v. His Wife, 29 La. Ann. 302.

The court upon an inquisition of lunacy does not merely consider the medical evidence to ascertain whether the irregularities and defects do or do not amount to insanity, but is governed by a regard to the well being and happiness of the alleged lunatic and the condition and security of his property. Re Hoblyn, 29 L. T. 305.

And the opinion of medical men who gave certificates upon which a party to a contract was confined as an insane person at or about the time of the making of the contract is evidence only upon the question of his insanity at that time, but is not conclusive, and the jury must judge of the grounds upon which such opinion is formed. Lovatt v. Tribe, 3 Fost. & F. 9.

It is within the province of the jury in an action involving the question of sanity or insanity to reject each and every opinion uttered by experts. People v. Barberi, 47 N. Y. Supp. 168.

The opinions of professional men on the question of sanity or insanity, however, are frequently entitled to great weight. Com. v. Rogers, 7 Met. 500, 41 Am. Dec. 458; Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260; Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424; Nicholas v. Kershner, 20 W. Va. 251.

Particularly where they had special opportunities for observation. Cheatham v. Hatcher, 30 Gratt. 56, 32 Am. Rep. 650; Montague v. Allan, 73 Va. 522, 49 Am. Rep. 384.

Or where they attended him and were with him constantly during the time the weakness of mind was charged. Jarrett v. Jarrett, 11 W. Va. 564.

And the opinion of the court as to the mental capacity of a party alleged to be incapable of contracting a marriage by reason of insanity should be formed from the testimony of witnesses who have long been acquainted with him, and that of medical experts, in preference to any personal examination. Thayer v. Thayer, 9 R. I. 377.

And the court in a habeas corpus proceeding to discharge a person from an asylum will not reject as erroneous the uncontradicted opinions of unprejudiced experts of high standing that the party thereby strangling and suffocating the said Anna M. Burt, and by then and there wrapping around the head and body of said Anna M. Burt a blanket, and securely tying the same thereon with rope, and then and there throwing said Anna M. Burt so wrapped and tied, in a cistern partially filled with water, sufficient to submerge the body of said Anna M. Burt." This indictment is correctly drawn. Where there is doubt about how the death was produced, it is well to put every means suggested by proof in the indictment; and, if proof be made of one of the means, it is unnecessary to prove them all. It is not necessary to cite any authority to sustain this proposition.

If there was any error in the charge of the court, it consists in the fact that the court submitted murder in the second degree to the jury. We believe this practice, however, to be correct, prudent, and safe. The charge upon this subject is the law, not obnoxious to any objection.

The court gave the usual charge in regard to the burden of proof applicable to a case in which the accused relies upon insanity, charging that the burden was upon the accused to show his insanity. My opinion upon this subject has been expressed, and I can add nothing to what I have said, in the King Case, 9 Tex. App. 515; but the majority of this court hold that the charge upon this subject as submitted to the jury in this case is correct. The rule in Texas is unbroken in support of the charge as given in this case upon the question of insanity. If the burden is upon the defendant to establish insanity, he is not entitled to reasonable doubt upon this proposition. If the burden be upon the state, then he might claim that the state should be required to establish sanity beyond a reasonable doubt; but, being upon him, he must discharge the burden, and is insane simply because of its inability to detect the existence of mental disorder. Re Sherman, 17 R. 1, 366.

But the evidence of a medical expert called by the defendant in a criminal prosecution will not justify a return of a verdict of insanity where he gives his opinion that the defendant was in a measure able to distinguish right from wrong. State v. Kalb, 2 Ohio Legal News, 364.

And a will will not be refused probate on the opinion of a medical expert against testamentary capacity where in order to do so it would be necessary to find as a fact that each of the subscribing witnesses had committed wilful perjury. Re Lyddy, 4 N. Y. Supp. 468.

So, where there is considerable conflict between the opinions of expert witnesses on the question of testamentary capacity, their opinions are entitled to but little, if any, weight. Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 108.

And where there is a disagreement in the testimony of expert witnesses in a prosecution for homicide on the question of the sanity of the accused it is not error for the court to refuse to charge that the opinions of those who had not had practical experience on the subject should be disregarded, where nothing is said to the jury calculated to mislead them. People v. Montgomery, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 207.

So, in Burgo v. State, 26 Neb. 639, it was said by Maxwell, J., that in his opinion ordinary medical expert testimony in regard to insanity, particularly where graduates of different schools of medicine are pitted against each other, is of the most unreliable character.

But an instruction in a will contest upon the ground of mental incapacity of the testator, that no medical experts have testified, and that the findings as to testamentary capacity must be based upon the testimony of neighbors and intimate friends of the deceased, is erroneous where physicians did testify as to the testator's mental condition, though their opinions were conflicting. Vanvalkenberg v. Vanvalkenberg, 90 Ind. 433.

So, in Russell v. State, 53 Miss. 367, it was said that medicine not being exact science, the testimony of a medical witness on the question of sanity or insanity of another is at best of an exceedingly unsatisfactory character, and is often as much calculated to mislead as to guide to a correct conclusion.

b. As affected by facts and opportunity to observe.

The reliance to be placed upon the opinion of an expert witness on a question of sanity or insanity depends upon the means of judging of the true mental condition of the person and the facts upon which his opinion is based. People v. Lake, 2 Park.

Crim. Rep. 215; Gray v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Blatchf. 142.

The most important evidence where medical experts have been examined on an issue as to soundness of mind is the facts to which they depose upon which their opinions are based, rather than the opinions themselves. Prinsep v. Dyce Sombra, 10 Moore, P. C. C. 232.

The opinion of a medical expert upon a question of mental capacity can be of no value when the facts upon which it is predicated are not established. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37.

And an opinion of an expert based upon an hypothesis wholly incorrect or incorrect in its material facts to such an extent as to impair the value of the opinion is of little or no weight. Gueltig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 90.

Medical evidence on the question of insanity should be received with the utmost caution and like opinions of neighbors and acquaintances should be regarded as of little weight if not well sustained by reasons and facts that admit of no misconstruction, and supported by authority of acknowledged credit. Clark v. State, 12 Ohio, 483, 40 Am. Dec. 481.

Thus the fact that a person is unable to discriminate between right and wrong is best ascertained, not by any medical theory, but by the acts of the individual himself. United States v. Shults, 6 McLean, 121.

And acts and conduct of a person accused of crime showing conclusively that he had sufficient reason to contemplate the act he did and its consequences at the time he did it are of more value as evidence on the question of capacity than the opinions of witnesses however learned or experienced they may be. State v. Thomas, Houst. Crim. Rep. (Del.) 511.

So, the abstract opinions of witnesses, whether professional or otherwise, will not justify a decision against the capacity of a testator to make a will; opinions of witnesses must be brought to the test of facts that the court may judge what weight the opinion is entitled to. Stackhouse v. Horton, 15 N. J. Eq. 202.

Where the mental capacity of a testator is thoroughly established by the evidence other than hypothetical reasoning of experts, their mere speculation on the subject would be entitled to but little weight. Rankin v. Rankin, 61 Mo. 235.

And a will will not be declared invalid against strong affirmative testimony in its favor upon the bare opinion of medical men that there was want of testamentary capacity at the time it was made, based upon the argument that the testator's disease was one that more or less affects the brain. Palmer's Estate, 5 W. N. C. 542.

satisfy the jury that he was insane. He need not do this beyond a reasonable doubt, but this must be done.

Counsel for appellant insist that, notwithstanding the enormity of the acts imputed to appellant, yet he was entitled to a fair and legal trial, and that, if he has not had such trial, the judgment should be reversed. We indorse this proposition to the fullest extent, and, if we believed that any error had been committed in this trial in the least calculated to prejudice the rights of the accused, we would not hesitate to say that the judgment should be reversed; but we are of opinion, after a careful examination of this record and close attention paid to the argument of the learned counsel for the defense (than whom we have no superior), that the appellant has received a fair and legal trial. The question of fact whether the appellant was sane or insane was submitted to the jury. The evidence is conflicting. We are of opinion, however, that the great weight of the testimony is in favor of the sanity of defendant; but, be this as it may, the jury has settled the question, and we think they have settled it properly.

We are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

A motion for rehearing having been filed, Hurt, P. J., on December 2, 1897, handed down the following response:

The judgment in this case was affirmed at the Austin term, 1897, of this court, and the case comes before us now on motion for rehearing by the appellant. In the original opinion we discussed the question as to whether or not expert opinion could be obtained upon a partially stated hypothetical case, this question being discussed with reference to the bill of excep-

And evidence of physicians as experts in a will contest with reference to the effect of pulmonary consumption, with which the testator was afflicted, and the medicines administered, on the mind of the patient, is of but little, if any, weight as against the testimony of attesting witnesses and others showing clearly that she was possessed of testamentary capacity. Re Andrews, 33 N. J. Eq. 614.

So, letters of a testator written at about the time he made his will, evidencing a sound, discriminating mind, competent to give historical details of matters of domestic and family interest with details of mathematical calculation and intelligent information which only a sound mind could perform, are more reliable in a will contest than speculations and opinions of witnesses, expert or nonexpert, as to testamentary incapacity. Harper v. Harper, 1 Thomp. & C. 354.

Evidence that a married woman, fondly attached to her children and apparently most happy in her family, had poisoned two of them with some evidence of deliberation and design, and that there was insanity in her family, and that her demeanor after the act, though not wholly irrational, was strangely erratic and excited, and that the medical witnesses based their opinion upon her recent antecedents and the presence of certain exciting causes of insanity and her own account of her sensations, and that in their opinion she was laboring under acute cerebral disease and was in a paroxysm of insanity at the time however, is sufficient to warrant a finding by the jury of not guilty upon the ground of insanity. Reg. v. Vyse, 3 Fost. & F. 247.

And in Reg. v. Southey, 4 Fost. & F. 864, which was a prosecution for homicide in which there was no evidence of the insanity of the accused previous to the act, and all the evidence of insanity consisted of that of the medical men who had seen him since the act, and their opinion that his insanity was chronic and therefore that he was insane at the time of the act because insane at the time of the examination, but all of the circumstances showed great premeditation, preparation, and design with a view to disguise the act and effect an escape, and his subsequent conduct showed consciousness that he had violated the law, the whole of the circumstances were left to the jury with a strong direction that if they were not satisfied that he did not know the nature of his act and did not understand the nature of the proceedings he should be found guilty.

So, the court in a will contest is not bound by the opinion of an expert as to the mental capacity of the testatrix, where such opinion is founded on reasons which are absurd or not well founded. Crockett v. Davis, 81 Md. 184.

And expert testimony in a prosecution for crime which is made up largely of mere theory and speculation, and which suggests mere possibilities ought never to be allowed to overcome clear and well-established facts. State v. Hockett, 70 Iowa, 442.

And the opinion of a distinguished alienist upon the probable mental condition of the patient years before such patient had come under his observation, though entitled to respect should be carefully scrutinized before acceptance, where the opinion is contingent upon the correctness of hypotheses which have not been established by the evidence. Bristed v. Weeks, 5 Redf. 529.

And a person will not be interdicted on the ground of idiosyncrasy and imbecility on the evidence of two medical witnesses neither of whom had ever conversed with him until the day before the filing of their report, and who had not had any opportunity to test his mental condition. Watson's Interdiction, 81 La. Ann. 757.

So, testimony of a physician as to the insanity of a party in an action to annul a marriage is entitled to but little weight where he did not know her at the time in question. Slais v. Slais, 9 Mo. App. 98.

And the opinion of an expert in a proceeding to set aside a will, that the testator was insane, founded upon the fact stated by him that he was in a dying condition and much the same as any other man in such a condition, and that he judged his mental from his physical condition, is entitled to but little weight as against proof of facts which show mental capacity. Burley v. McGough, 115 Ill. 11.

And the testimony against mental capacity in a will contest of a physician who formed his opinion from her condition, and not from conversations with her, and who at first had many opportunities of forming such opinion but later his interviews with her were not oftener than once a month, will not warrant the rejection of the testimony in favor of mental capacity of all those who were about her deathbed and whose intercourse was frequent, and who had conversations with her on many occasions and saw business transacted by her and were the witnesses to a codicil to her will. Crollins v. Stark, 64 Barb. 112.

But evidence that a person whose sanity was questioned was subject to insane delusions, and in the opinion of several competent and expert medical witnesses who had excellent opportunities for observing him was so insane as to be unfit to manage his affairs, is sufficient to justify the setting aside of the return to a commission of lunacy that he was not of unsound mind to such a degree as to incapacitate him for the management of himself and his estate. Re Fitzgerald, 80 N. J. Eq. 59.

And testimony of an expert witness in an action brought to set aside a deed upon the ground of the tions in regard to the testimony of Dr. T. D. Wooten. The same subject was presented in a bill of exceptions in regard to the testimony of Dr. Davis. We disposed of the question presented in the bill of exceptions with reference to the testimony of Dr. Davis by reference to what we had said in regard to the bill of exceptions as to Dr. T. D. Wooten's testimony. Counsel for appellant, on motion for rehearing, insists that there is a very material difference in the bills of exception. From the record it appears that Dr. Wooten was introduced by the state, and a hypothetical case submitted to him, and that this question did not include all of the evidence bearing upon the question of sanity. Dr. Wooten answered the question that, in his opinion, defendant was sane. Afterwards the state asked the witness his opinion based upon a hypothetical case embodying all the evidence in the case, upon which the witness expressed the same opinion as upon the state's first question; that is, that appellant was sane. Appellant then put a hypothetical question to the witness based upon his theory of the case, and upon which the witness answered that the defendant was insane. A full opportunity was allowed to get the opinion as to the defendant's sanity based upon any hypothesis to be inferred from any evidence in the case. The objection to this procedure was that the state obtained the witness's opinion upon an incomplete hypothetical case. Let us concede for the argument that the full case, containing all the testimony, offered either by the state or the defendant, must be embraced in the hypothetical case; still, if this was not done, no complaint can be urged by appellant in regard to the testimony of Dr. Wooten, because, after the defendant had submitted his hypothetical case, the wit-mental incapacity of the grantor that he had privately examined the grantor, and that he did not know whether he had made a deed, a will, or a lease, and that in his opinion the grantor was not competent to make a sale of his land and protect his own interest, is sufficient to uphold a decree setting aside the deed. Sponable v. Hanson, 87 Mich. 204.

c. As affected by character, bias, and nature of the question.

Where opinions of witnesses are received on the question of sanity or insanity, from the necessity of the case their weight will not depend so much upon the number as upon the intelligence of the witnesses and their capacity to form correct opinions, their means of information, and the unprejudiced state of their minds, and the nature of the facts testified to in support of their opinions. Clark v. Fisher, 1 Paige, 171, 19 Am. Dec. 402.

Thus, while medical witnesses may testify as to the effect of disease on the mind, and give their opinions on the question of testamentary capacity, and their opinions are usually entitled to consideration and respect, the value of such testimony depends upon the professional character, integrity, skill, and standing of the witness. Jamison v. Jamison, 3 Houst. (Del.) 108; People v. Lake, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 215; Gay v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Blatchf. 142.

Expert evidence on the question of insanity is only entitled to importance when fairly given by one who through experience, study, and scientific eminence is properly accredited to give it. People v. Kemmler, 119 N. Y. 580.

And the opinion of a physician who has not studied the progress of the disease of the accused, and who has limited opportunities for observing his personal habits and conduct, is of very little if of any value. State v. Kalb, 2 Ohio Legal News, 764.

And the extent of an expert witness's acquaintance with the subject of insanity may be always inquired into to enable the jury to estimate the weight of the opinion given by him on that question. Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 498, 9 Am. Rep. 780.

So, in Van Horn v. Keenan, 28 Ill. 448, in which the question of insanity was involved, and no one who had made this branch of medical jurisprudence a special study had been examined in the case, and the opinions given by the witnesses were generally crude, the court declared itself not satisfied with them, and sought the opinion of the eminent head of an asylum for the insane.

For legal purposes incapacity, either criminal or civil must be judged by manifestations in conduct and language, and the circumstances and symptoms as to which a physician alone can perceive outward mental disorder may aid in understanding the manifestations subsequently appearing, but can have little further value. Fraser v. Jennison, 42 Mich. 206.

So, the jury in a will contest upon the ground of mental incapacity should consider whether the testimony of expert witnesses is partisan in its character or biased by any leanings for or against any of the parties. Rush v. Megee, 36 Ind. 69.

But the opinions of experts on the question of the sanity or insanity of a person accused of crime when their honesty and impartiality are not doubted are entitled to great weight, but the jury is not bound to be governed by them. Choice v. State, 31 Ga. 424.

So, when an expert witness on the question of mental capacity states precise facts in science as ascertained and settled, or states the necessary or inevitable conclusion which results from the facts stated, his opinion is entitled to great weight; but where he gives only the probable inference from the facts stated his opinion is of less importance, and when it is speculative, theoretical, and states only the belief of the witness, while yet some other opinion is consistent with the facts stated, it is entitled to but little weight. Gay v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Blatchf. 142; People v. Barberi, 47 N. Y. Supp. 168.

So far as medical opinions bear upon the degree of cerebral diseases indicated by apoplexy, paralysis, loss of speech, convulsions, and other physical symptoms, they are to be regarded as the opinions of experts; but so far as they rest upon evidence going to show a want of intellect directly, and not merely as the result of disease of the brain, they derive little, if any, additional force from the professional education of the witness. Delafield v. Parish, 26 N. Y. 115.

d. As compared with other expert opinions.

The opinion of a physician who attended a testator during his last illness is entitled to more weight on the question of testamentary capacity than the opinions of physicians who had not this advantage. Harrison v. Rowan, 3 Wash. C. C. 580.

And the opinion of a medical expert that a testator was insane and incompetent to make a will, and had been so for some time, will not be held to invalidate the will, though he was an expert of high authority, where his opinion seemed to be that any insanity would be sufficient to invalidate it, and the testator's family physician, who visited him many times during such period, saw no indication of unsoundness of mind or mental disorder, and he attended to his own affairs then and after-ness answered that, in his opinion, the appellant was insane. Upon no ground of reason or common sense could appellant be heard to complain of this matter in the shape presented by this bill. Appellant was permitted to form a hypothetical case, not alone upon his testimony, but upon any and all the testimony introduced upon the trial. When the whole case was put, the witness answered that his opinion was that defendant was sane. When the defendant's case, based upon the testimony offered by him, was put to the witness, he answered that defendant was insane. But it will be observed that the bill shows that the state submitted the whole case, and upon which the witness answered that defendant was sane. We cannot comprehend how appellant can complain of this. As to the contention of appellant that the opinion was only upon a partial or incomplete statement of the case, we will treat of this subject when we reach the bill of exceptions pertaining to the testimony of Dr. Davis.

It occurs by a bill of exceptions that Dr. Davis was introduced as an expert; that the state submitted a hypothetical case, based upon its testimony bearing upon the question of sanity, and obtained the answer that appellant was sane. The defendant objected, because all the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity was not embraced in the hypothetical case put by the state; but the bill further shows that the defendant then put a hypothetical case to the witness, based upon the assumption that all reasonable inferences to be drawn from his testimony were true, including the fact that defendant, without reason, motive, or cause, killed his wife and children, upon which question the witness answered that upon such hypothesis, he would say that the wards in an intelligent manner. Re Blakely, 48 Wis. 294.

So, a statement by the judge in a will contest that he relied with more confidence upon the opinion of an intelligent attending physician than he did upon the subsequent opinions of four physicians who had not seen the testator during his lunacy, and based their opinions as to his sanity upon the nature of the disease, is not reversible error. Kirkwood v. Gordon, 7 Rich. L. 474, 62 Am. Dec. 418.

And in Whelpley v. Loder, 1 Dem. 368, which was a will contest upon the ground of testamentary capacity, the court attached more value to, and relied and acted upon, the testimony of the testator's attending physician than that of an alienist, who was rejected while admitting his ability and skill.

The evidence of experts in a will contest who knew the testator and had treated him, however, cannot be said to be entitled to greater weight, as matter of law, than that of experts who founded their opinions simply upon hypothetical questions. Bever v. Spangler, 98 Iowa, 576.

c. As compared with nonexpert opinions.

The rule has been laid down that on questions of sanity or insanity proof made by expert witnesses who have devoted their time and attention to cases of mental derangement is of much greater value than that of other persons who have no scientific or experimental knowledge of the subject, and who can only speak from observation from outward signs and appearances. State v. Reidell, 9 Houst. (Del.) 470; Watson v. Anderson, 18 Ala. 203.

And that in marshaling evidence of insanity the greater weight should be given to the judgment of medical experts and those closely associated with the party claimed to be insane than to other witnesses; and, next to this, great respect should be accorded to lay witnesses whose intercourse and public relations with men enable them from experience and observation to form an opinion of men's motives from their speech and actions. Com. Helmbold, v. Kirkbride, 11 Phila. 427.

And professional opinions in the absence of overruling facts are entitled to credence on the question of capacity to make a testamentary disposition as against mere opinions of nonexperts unsupported by concurrent facts which have any legitimate weight. Hendrix v. Money, 1 Bush, 303.

And the opinions of unprejudiced medical witnesses that a person is insane is sufficient to overcome the presumption in favor of sanity when supported by testimony of nonexpert witnesses none of whom had seen him more than once during the period covered by the alleged insanity on an application. L. R. A.

for discharge from a hospital on a habeas corpus. Com. Helmbold, v. Kirkbride, 11 Phila. 427.

So, evidence in a criminal prosecution, of insanity in the family of the accused, and testimony of his family physician and persons who had known him for years tending to show insanity, preponderates over evidence given by a person who had known him but a short time and whose opinions were not substantiated by reason, and the opinions of witnesses as experts who were not specially qualified as experts on insanity. McLeod v. State, 31 Tex. Crim. Rep. 331.

And an instruction in a will contest that the testimony of medical men of large experience on the question of insanity as a general rule is entitled to more weight than that of nonprofessional men, but that the question of weight is for the jury, is not error where the medical men testifying were not mere experts whose testimony was founded upon facts testified to by other witnesses, but who had made a personal examination of the decedent for the very purpose of ascertaining his mental capacity. Blake v. Rourke, 74 Iowa, 519; Meeker v. Meeker, 74 Iowa, 362.

And in Forman v. Smith, 7 Lans. 443, the testamentary capacity of the testator was held sufficiently proved, though a large number of witnesses testified that he had not sufficient capacity to comprehend and understand ordinary business transactions, and he disinherited most of his nearest kindred and relatives, where a larger number of witnesses, including his pastor, his family physician, and the subscribing witnesses to the will, gave evidence which established or tended to prove his competency. Forman v. Smith, 7 Lans. 443.

But it is the duty of the jury to weigh the whole evidence and decide according to their conviction, although the medical witnesses were of a different opinion. Watson v. Anderson, 18 Ala. 202.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the opinions of medical experts are to be considered in connection with all the other evidence in the case, and that the jury is not bound to act upon them to the exclusion of other evidence, and that they are to determine the question of the whole evidence, is not subject to the objection that it informs the jury that the testimony of experts is not entitled to greater weight than that of nonexpert witnesses. Goodwin v. State, 98 Ind. 550.

Jurors are not bound to give more weight to the testimony of medical experts on the question of insanity than to that of nonexpert witnesses who state facts within their own knowledge; it is not for the court to pronounce, as matter of law, which of the two classes shall receive the greater weight. Sanders v. State, 94 Ind. 147.

defendant was insane; that all of the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity was embraced in the state's hypothetical question and the defendant's hypothetical question combined.

We have presented to us the question discussed in the original opinion, in treating of the bill of exceptions pertaining to the testimony of Dr. Wooten, which is: Can the state submit a hypothetical case which does not include all the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity, and obtain an opinion from the expert; or must the question propounded contain all the evidence bearing upon the question of sanity whether introduced by the state or the defendant, and whether believed to be true or false by the state? We hold, as we did in the original opinion, that the state can formulate a hypothetical case embracing such facts bearing upon the question of sanity as it deems proper and competent, and obtain the opinion of an expert. We hold that, if the defendant is not satisfied with the hypothetical case submitted by the state, he has the privilege of submitting his case, not only as embraced in his testimony, but upon any and all testimony introduced on the trial. Of course, if the case submitted by the state is unfair and unjust to the appellant, the court will correct this; and if the court fails to do so, and the defendant proposes to submit a case embracing all the facts bearing upon the question, and he is denied this right, error would be patent.

Recurring to the bill of exceptions pertaining to the testimony of Dr. Wooten; if the last proposition be correct, the state was under no obligation and was not required to submit the full case, but had the right to submit the case which it thought was supported by the testimony, and was not bound to submit a case in-

And the testimony of experts, although always admissible on the question of testamentary capacity in a will contest, and a great aid in discovering where the truth lies, is not conclusive and controlling against the testimony of persons of intelligence who saw the testator daily and who had transactions with him of a social character and in business. Re Kiedaisch, 2 Connoly, 438; Brook v. Luckett, 4 How. (Miss.) 459.

So, an instruction in a will contest that, all other things being equal, the jury should give greater weight to opinions of physicians on the subject of testamentary capacity than to other witnesses, is improper. Carpenter v. Calvert, 83 Ill. 62.

And one that opinions of expert witnesses are entitled to great weight, and so are those of persons who associated and lived with the person whose sanity is in question, is erroneous; it being safer and better to leave all these matters to be weighed by the jury. Ryder v. State (Ga.) 88 L. R. A. 721.

And one assigning more weight to the testimony of nurses and attendants than to the opinions of the subscribing witnesses to the will is erroneous, as the jury, and not the court, must judge of the weight to be given to each part of the proofs in the case. Brown v. Rargin, 94 Ill. 560.

The opinion of a physician as to the mental competency of a testator is entitled to no greater consideration than that of a layman having equal facilities for observation, however, where no claim is made that the testator was insane. Maynard v. Vinton, 59 Mich. 120, 60 Am. Rep. 276.

And the opinions of the neighbors of the testator, who are men of good common sense, are of more value than those of medical experts in a will contest, upon the question whether the mental disease with which the testator was afflicted had reached such a stage at a given time before it had developed itself as to render him incapable of making a will or contract, or irresponsible for his acts. Rutherford v. Morris, 77 Ill. 397.

And evidence of subscribing witnesses to a deed, and of persons who are familiar with the grantor and the transaction involved, are entitled to great weight, while the opinion of an expert witness is entitled to little weight as against such evidence. Kelly v. Perrault (Idaho) 48 Pac. 45.

1. A question for the jury.

The opinion of an expert witness as to the sanity of another is a fact bearing upon that question, the proper weight of which falls within the province of the jury to determine. Kempsey v. McGinnis, 21 Mich. 123; Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 496, 9 Am. Rep. 760; Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550; Gay v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 9 Blatchf. 142.

The court must decide whether a witness called to testify as to his opinion on an issue of mental soundness had the necessary experience to enable him to testify as an expert; but the value of his opinion when admissible must be determined by the jury alone, and depends upon the opportunities he has had for acquiring skill and knowledge, and the use he has made of these opportunities. Flynt v. Bodenhamer, 80 N. C. 205.

And to charge that expert witnesses speaking merely as to matters of opinion and basing their opinions upon hypothetical questions are entitled to more credit than witnesses who had knowledge of facts gathered from personal observation, and who based their opinions on actual facts, would be an invasion of the province of the jury. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550. And see Brown v. Rargin, 94 Ill. 560; Carpenter v. Calvert, 83 Ill. 62; and Sanders v. State, 94 Ind. 147, supra, X., e.

Thus, the jury in a criminal prosecution in which insanity is alleged should not be told that expert witnesses speaking merely as to matters of opinion and basing their opinions on hypothetical questions are entitled to more credit than witnesses who have knowledge of facts gathered from personal observation, and who base their opinions on actual facts, and not supposed cases. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the testimony and opinions of medical witnesses should be received with caution, and are entitled to but little weight unless sustained by reasons and facts that admit of no misconception, and that they are not binding upon the jury, is objectionable as a comment upon the sufficiency and weight of the evidence, which is prohibited by 2 Wagner's (Mo.) Stat. 1106, § 20. State v. Hundley, 46 Mo. 414.

So, it is error for the court in a prosecution for homicide to question in the presence of the jury whether they will realize much, if any, valuable aid from the testimony of experts in coming to a correct conclusion with reference to the criminal responsibility of the accused, where evidence has been given of their observation, experience, and skill, sufficient to enable them to form intelligent opinions which they have given. Pannell v. Com. 86 Pa. 260.

And a jury in a will contest in which the question of sanity or insanity is at issue should not be told that common experience has shown, and the courts have often remarked, that opinions of professional witnesses upon the question of insanity have become of little practical value from the almost universal conflict between those called upon the different sides as compared with testimony consisting of acts and sayings of the testator.

volving testimony believed by the state to be false. And we repeat that the disposition of the bill of exceptions as to Dr. Wooten's testimony disposes of the bill of exceptions as to the testimony of Dr. Davis; for if the state is not bound to embrace all the testimony bearing upon the subject, then it was not required to do so in reference to Dr. Wooten, but after having done so, appellant had no right to complain.

Now, we have this question: Is it necessary, in submitting a hypothetical case, for the state to include every particle of the evidence bearing upon the question of insanity, in order to obtain a legal answer from the expert? If so, the contention of the appellant in the Davis bill of exceptions is well founded; for that bill shows that the opinion was obtained from the expert upon a hypothetical case that did not embrace the theory of the defense, and did not embrace all the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity. The question therefore is: Must the hypothetical case submitted to the expert include all the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity, in order to obtain a legal and proper answer from the expert? In the original opinion we discussed this very question, and held that it was not necessary. We have seen nothing to change our opinion upon this subject. The authorities are just that way. But it is contended by counsel for appellant that we have settled the law to the contrary in Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490; Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638; and in Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 39 S. W. 687.

Now, we assert that the question here discussed has never been presented in any case before either the court of appeals, court of criminal appeals, or the supreme court of this state. The counsel for appellant cites no case decided by the supreme court, but relies upon the cases of Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490; Leache v. State, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep.

Burney v. Torrey, 100 Ala. 157; Eggers v. Eggers, 57 Ind. 461.

And a remark by the judge in charging the jury in a criminal prosecution in which insanity was interposed as a defense and in which expert witnesses had been examined, that in his experience and observation doctors can be gotten to swear on both sides of any question is objectionable as adding the testimony derived from the experience of the judge, and as a statement of convictions and conclusions created by listening to the testimony of that class of persons in other cases. People v. Webster, 59 Hun. 395.

But an instruction in an action to contest the validity of a will upon the ground of unsoundness of mind of the testator, that the evidence of an expert was of little value, is not reversible error as against the plaintiff, where he was called by and testified strongly in favor of the deceased. Bundy v. McKnight, 43 Ind. 502.

And an instruction in an action in which an expert had testified upon an issue of sanity or insanity, that the law attaches peculiar importance to the opinions of medical men who have the opportunity of observation upon a question of mental capacity, as by study and experience they become experts in the matter of bodily and mental ailments, is not objectionable as an expression of opinion as to the weight of the evidence. Flynt v. Bodenhamer, 80 N. C. 205.

And an instruction in a criminal prosecution that the opinion of medical experts on the question of insanity are to be considered in connection with the other evidence, but that the jury is not bound to act upon them to the exclusion of other evidence, is not subject to the objection that it informs the jury that the testimony of experts is not entitled to greater weight than that of nonexperts. Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550.

Nor is an instruction in a will contest in which insanity is alleged that the testimony of medical men of large experience as a general rule is entitled to more weight than that of nonprofessional men, but that the question of weight is one for the jury, erroneous where the physicians examined were not mere experts whose testimony was founded upon facts testified to by other witnesses, but had each made a personal examination of the testator for the very purpose of ascertaining his mental capacity. Meeker v. Meeker, 74 Iowa. 352.

So, whether the facts upon which the opinion of a medical expert on a question of mental capacity are established or not is a question for the consideration of the jury. First Nat. Bank v. Wirebach, 106 Pa. 37.

And the jury in a criminal action in which insanity is interposed as a defense are not to take for granted that the statements contained in the hypothetical questions propounded to experts are true but are to carefully scrutinize the evidence and determine from it what, if any, of such facts are true, and what not true. Guetig v. State, 66 Ind. 94, 32 Am. Rep. 99.

And where the opinion of a medical expert has been admitted in a criminal case in which the defense of insanity was interposed based on facts hypothetically stated, which vary somewhat from the facts proved on the trial, a charge that his opinion is entitled to but little weight is properly refused, as the question is purely one of fact for the jury. Gunter v. State, 33 Ala. 96.

So, a refusal to instruct the jury in a will contest upon the ground of insanity that no weight is to be given to the evidence of experts, when some of the facts upon which hypothetical questions are based are not found to be true, will not be regarded as prejudicial error where the court had instructed that the weight of such opinions was for the jury to consider in view of all the other testimony in the case. Bever v. Spangler, 93 Iowa. 576.

And an instruction in a will contest upon the ground that the testator was afflicted with senile dementia, that the jury ought to consider and weigh all the evidence, including the evidence of experts, tending to show the condition or state of mind of the testator, is not subject to the objection that it directs the jury that they might give more weight to the opinions of experts, though some of the assumed facts stated in the hypothetical questions might have been found to be untrue. Bever v. Spangler, 93 Iowa. 576.

The jury in a proceeding to inquire as to the lunacy of a party should be left at liberty to apply the same general rules to the testimony of experts that are applicable to the testimony of other witnesses when estimating its value. Cuneo v. Bessoni, 63 Ind. 524.

And a verdict against the validity of a will will not be disturbed on appeal though it was rational in its provisions and was written and attested by a physician without interest in the matter, who testified in favor of testamentary capacity, where the other attesting witness testified that the testator was not competent by reason of his physical and mental condition, that he signed the will to avoid offending the physician, and other witnesses, including another attending physician, testified against testamentary capacity. Sydney v. Cunningham, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 24.

638, and Williams v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 89 S. W. 687. What was the question before the court in Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490? It was as to whether or not an expert could give his opinion unless he had heard all the testimony bearing upon the question at issue. It was not a case in which the hypothetical case was submitted to an expert who had not heard the evidence. The question arose in this manner: Dr. Stone, witness for the defendant, heard all the testimony introduced on the trial, and gave as his opinion that he had heard no evidence of the insanity of the accused that could not be explained by other causes, such as indulgence in drink or debauchery. The state, upon cross-examination of Dr. Stone, asked what his opinion was, based upon the testimony of the witness Pool. Dr. Stone answered that from the evidence of Pool alone he would have considered Webb insane, and believed the mind of defendant, at the time the particular offense was committed, to be more or less disturbed from some cause, but not to the extent to relieve him entirely from responsibility. In passing, the court says "that the witness had heard all the testimony in the case and did not believe the defendant insane. This opinion, founded upon the whole testimony, must have included, and did include, the testimony of the witness Pool. If it did, then how could any injury result to defendant by asking, and that, too, upon cross examination, the opinion of the witness upon the testimony of Pool alone, we confess we cannot conceive. It would have been otherwise if the expert had not heard and formed his opinion upon the whole case; for in that case the question and answer would have been, not only improper, but illegal and inadmissible." Now, it will be observed that in the Webb Case, the hypothetical question was not propounded to an expert who had not heard the testimony, but the expert had heard all the evidence. It may be insisted that, if it is necessary for the expert to hear all the testimony before giving an opinion, therefore it is absolutely necessary that the hypothetical case submitted to an expert who did not hear the testimony must embrace all the testimony bearing upon the question of sanity. We are not called upon to pass upon this question; but the reasons for the one rule will not apply to the other rule. Take the most enlightened expert, and let him hear all the testimony; he can arrive at a correct conclusion as to the sanity of the accused; and at the same time if called upon to state all the facts from which he makes the conclusion, he would most generally fail. The impression from the facts is made upon his mind, without the ability to produce the facts in the statement. But, be this as it may, the question involved in the Webb Case is not the question before us. Now, it is true that Presiding Judge White in that case states that the full case must be submitted, and he asserts that all the authorities support this proposition. We find to the contrary,—that the overwhelming weight of authority supports the proposition "that the state has the right to submit its hypothetical case, and, if the accused is not satisfied with it, he can state his hypothetical case." This proposition is conclusively established by the authorities cited in the original opinion; and, in addition to those, we desire to cite the elaborate opinion in the case of Coyne v. Com. 104 Pa. 117. To be more explicit: "Each side had the right to an opinion from the witness upon any hypothesis reasonably consistent with the evidence; and, if meagerly presented in the examination on one side, it may be fully presented on the other; the whole examination being within the control of the court, whose duty it is to see that it is fairly and reasonably conducted." Now, the question presented to us is one in which the state presented its theory of the hypothetical case to the expert. (We are now treating of the bill of exceptions in reference to Dr. Davis's testimony.) The state had a right to select its theory of the evidence, and to base a hypothetical case upon that state of facts which the state thought to be true. The defendant had a right to submit a hypothetical case upon the state of facts which he believed to be true. Of course, if the statement of the hypothetical case for the state was unfair and unjust to appellant, and objections had been raised, the court would have controlled this matter; but that does not appear in this case. It would be almost impossible for the state to embrace all the testimony introduced in evidence in the hypothetical case, without impressing the jury with the fact that the state believed that all of the evidence and circumstances embraced in the case were in fact true. This would be a great injury to the state. It would be in the nature of a concession of facts which the state proposed to controvert. Nor would it be just to the defendant to require him to embrace all the facts in his statement,—those which tended to show sanity as well as insanity,—when he did not believe the testimony, and in fact proposed to impeach the witnesses swearing to the facts tending to show sanity in some manner, or to show that they were unreasonable and not in fact true. The record shows that a very full statement was made by the state presenting its theory of facts believed to be true; and the record also shows that the defendant presented his theory of the case. This being so, the expert was in possession of the whole case as effectually as can be presented practically upon a trial of the case.

In the Leache Case, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638, the question was in regard to placing the experts under the rule. It appears from the record that the experts were placed under the rule, and did not hear the testimony of the other witnesses. Leache contended that this was reversible error; that he had the right to have the experts present, so that they might hear the testimony in order to give an opinion. Presiding Judge White states, "that it is not shown that the hypothetical method of obtaining the opinion of the experts was either defective in not submitting all the facts essential to an intelligent opinion, nor that the opinions were such as would have been given differently had the evidence been heard directly by these witnesses and their conclusions drawn from it, and not from a hypothetical statement of it. We cannot perceive that the discretion of the trial judge was abused in the matter to the prejudice of the defendant;" that is, that, in placing the experts under the rule, no prejudice therefrom was shown to have resulted to.

the appellant. That was the only question in judgment. The remarks of Judge White in regard to the rule were not called for or necessary to the disposition of the question raised; but he states, relying upon Coyle v. Com. 104 Pa. 117, "that, where the expert has not heard the evidence, each side had the right to an opinion from the witness upon any hypothesis reasonably consistent with the evidence; and if meagerly presented in the examination on one side, it may be fully presented on the other, the whole examination being within the control of the court, whose duty it is to see that it is fairly and reasonably conducted." The question involved in the Leache Case, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638, was simply the action of the court in putting the experts under the rule, and all of the observations made by the presiding judge in regard to the rules which control in submitting hypothetical cases to an expert were dicta. But he concedes that each side has the right to an opinion from the witness upon any hypothesis reasonably consistent with the evidence. This concession is made in the face of the assertion that all authorities agree that it is inadmissible to permit an expert to give his opinion upon anything short of all the evidence in the case, whether he has personally heard it, or it is stated to him hypothetically.

In the Williams Case, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 30 S. W. 687, the only question before the court was as to the admissibility of the testimony of Dr. Armstrong, an expert, who testified that he had heard but a part of the testimony, but had read the newspaper account of the testimony of the witnesses on the question of insanity on the previous trial of the case. The court thereupon stated that the testimony was the same in the present trial, and permitted the witness, over the objections of appellant, to give an opinion as to the sanity of the defendant. We held in that case that the newspaper report was nothing but hearsay testimony, and that it was not competent for the judge to put such a hypothetical case to the witness. We stated, further, that if the newspaper statement was eliminated, the witness was not authorized to give his opinion based only on having heard a part of the testimony of the witnesses. So the question here presented was not raised in said case, and what was said by us in referring to the Webb Case, 9 Tex. App. 490, and the Leache Case, 22 Tex. App. 279, 58 Am. Rep. 638, was not at all necessary to that decision.

We misunderstood the bill of exceptions reserved to the testimony of Carrie Sparks. We thought that the only objection urged to this testimony was that it was not in rebuttal; but, since our attention has been called to the bill in the motion for rehearing, we find that the appellant moved to exclude the evidence upon the grounds, condensely stated, of irrelevancy, that appellant was not shown to have been in the house, and a number of other objections. We therefore have the question as to whether or not, under the circumstances of this case, the evidence of this witness was admissible. When we look to the record we find that the circumstances strongly tended to show that the appellant was at home. The evidence places Mrs. Burt there, as well as defendant, a short time after the expression was heard. This being the case, we are of opinion that the testimony was admissible, and have no doubt of its relevancy. It was conceded in the argument of appellant's counsel that defendant killed his wife and two children. About this there is no question. But it is contended that the evidence of this witness bears strongly on the question of sanity. We do not understand it in that way. The testimony shows that Mrs. Burt exclaimed, "I will stand this thing no longer!" To what "thing" she alluded is not disclosed. Whether it was the ill treatment of the husband, or whether it was the insane conduct of the defendant, is not shown. The exclamation may have been made because of the strange and unnatural conduct of an insane man, or might have been induced by the ill treatment of appellant towards his wife. We are left in the dark upon this subject. This exclamation could not have been made by the servant, for she was not at home; and the evidence shows no other female there except Mrs. Burt. Appellant insists, however, that the evidence fails to show that Burt was at home. The witness heard the exclamation after 7 o'clock in the evening. It is shown that defendant was there between 8 and 9 o'clock. The exclamation was made at his home, and the conclusion is reasonable that it was made by his wife to him. Be this as it may, appellant concedes, and the unquestioned facts of the case demonstrate, that he killed his wife and children. We might admit, but we do not, the incompetency of this evidence; and yet no possible injury could have resulted to appellant. It is a strained conclusion that the remark made by the female in the house tended to show the sanity of defendant, for, as before stated, it might have resulted from the insane act of the appellant. If the jury believe, as they had a right to believe, that the exclamation was made by appellant's wife to defendant, clearly the evidence was admissible. If they did not so believe, then no harm resulted to the appellant. If the jury believed that the appellant was insane, or had a doubt about it, they may have concluded that the exclamation was made by the wife, because of some misconduct of her deranged husband, or, if they did not believe he was insane, that the remarks were made because of the ill treatment of the defendant. We are left in a field of speculation, but we cannot perceive, conceding the inadmissibility of the testimony for the argument, how, under the facts of this case, appellant could have been injured; that he killed his wife and children being a conceded fact. Now, it must reasonably appear that the exclamation testified to by the witness Sparks tended to show sanity, and nothing else; and, unless this is made to appear, no injury could have resulted. But we are of opinion that the evidence was admissible, independent of these considerations.

The court instructed the jury upon the subject of express malice as follows: "(6) Express malice, which is absolutely essential to constitute murder in the first degree, exists where one, with sedate, deliberate mind and formed design, unlawfully kills another. (7) When an unlawful killing is established, the condition of the mind of the party killing, at the time, just before and just after the killing, is an important consideration in determining the grade of the homicide; and in determining whether murder has been committed with express malice or not, the important questions for a jury to consider are: Do the facts and circumstances in the case at the time of the killing, and before and after that time, having connection with or relation to it, furnish satisfactory evidence of a sedate and deliberate mind on the part of the person killing, at the time he does the act? And do these facts and circumstances show a formed design to take the life of the person slain, or to inflict on him some serious bodily harm, which, in its necessary and probable consequences, may result in his death? Or do the facts and circumstances in the case show such a general reckless disregard of human life as necessarily includes the formed design against the life of the person slain? If they do, the killing, if it amounts to murder, will be upon express malice. (8) In order to warrant a verdict of murder in the first degree, malice must be shown by the evidence to have existed; that is, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the killing was a consummation of a previously formed design to take the life of the person killed, and that the design to kill was formed deliberately with a sedate mind,—that is, at the time when the mind of the person killing was self possessed and capable of contemplating the consequences of the act proposed to be done. There is, however, no definite space of time necessary to intervene between the formed design to kill and the actual killing. A single moment of time may be sufficient. All that is required is that the mind be cool and deliberate in forming its purpose, and that the design to kill is formed while the mind is in such calm and sedate condition. (9) When the evidence satisfies the mind of the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the killing was the result of a previously formed design by the defendant to kill deceased, and that the design was formed when the mind was calm and sedate, and capable of contemplating the consequences of the act proposed to be done by him, and such killing is further shown to have been unlawful and done with malice, then the homicide is murder in the first degree, and your verdict should be rendered accordingly. (10) To warrant a conviction of murder in the first degree, the jury must be satisfied by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, before the act, deliberately formed the design with a calm and sedate mind to kill the deceased; that he selected and used the weapon or instrument or means reasonably sufficient to accomplish the death by the mode and manner of its use. The act must not result from a mere sudden, rash, and immediate design, springing from an inconsiderate impulse, passion, or excitement, however unjustifiable and unwarrantable it may be. (11) Now, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant, Eugene Burt, in Travis county, state of Texas, on or about July 24, 1896, as charged in the indictment, unlawfully, with malice aforethought, with a sedate and deliberate mind and formed design to kill, did kill Anna M. Burt, by then and there striking, beating, and wounding the said Anna M. Burt upon her head and face with a hatchet and some heavy instrument, thereby fracturing the skull and the bones of the face of said Anna M. Burt, and by then and there tying tightly around the throat and neck of said Anna M. Burt a handkerchief, thereby strangling and suffocating the said Anna M. Burt, and by then and there wrapping around the head and body of said Anna M. Burt a blanket, and securely tying same thereon with rope, and then and there throwing said Anna M. Burt, so wrapped and tied, in a cistern partially filled with water, sufficient to submerge the body of said Anna M. Burt; or if the said defendant did, with malice aforethought, so kill said Anna M. Burt, by either one or by all of the means above enumerated,—you will find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, and so state in your verdict, and fix his punishment at death or confinement in the state penitentiary for life, as you may determine and state in your verdict."

Counsel for appellant objects to that portion of the charge which reads as follows: "If the said defendant did, with malice aforethought, so kill said Anna M. Burt, you will find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree." It is insisted that this charge authorized a verdict of murder in the first degree, upon a state of case which demanded a verdict of murder in the second degree. We do not so understand the charge. It has reference directly to the preceding portions of the charge, which in a remarkably clear and explicit manner define murder in the first degree. No juror with the least degree of intelligence, under the charge given in this case, could conclude that the verdict of murder in the first degree could be rendered unless it was established beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence that the accused, with a calm mind and formed design, deliberately killed his wife. This portion of the charge has reference to the charge preceding it, and, when it says "so kill," it means, and of necessity means, in the manner and condition of mind as set forth in the preceding portions of the charge. However, there was no objection to the charge; and this being the case, the rule is that it must have been calculated to injure the rights of the accused. This proposition is supported by any number of cases, the leading case being Bishop v. State, 43 Tex. 390. Tested by this rule, was appellant injured? As we said in the original opinion, there is no murder in the second degree in this case. The learned counsel of appellant, in argument, admitted that, if the accused was sane, he was guilty of murder upon express malice. If this be true,—and it is absolutely true,—then no possible injury could have resulted from this charge, if the appellant's construction be correct.

It is insisted by counsel for appellant that, if we affirm this judgment, it will be contrary to law, and contrary to the previous decisions of this court. If contrary to law, this judgment ought not to be affirmed. If contrary to previous decisions, and those decisions are wrong, being correct in all other respects, the judgment ought to be affirmed. It is not contended by counsel that a change of opinion has wrought a legal injury to appellant, in misleading him so as to deprive him of a legal defense. Nothing of this sort is intimated. We have discussed the cases referred to by appellant in which he insists that we have laid down a different rule in regard to the testimony of an expert. We have shown that no case contains the question here raised. We have shown that in the Webb, Leache, and Williams Cases, supra, the observations of the court were mere dicta. But concede, for the argument, that this court has changed its opinion (which is not the case); if we are correct now, the appellant has no right to complain, he having been misled in no manner calculated to deprive him of a legal defense. But, as we have before observed, the question in regard to the manner of obtaining the opinion of an expert has never been presented to this court in the shape presented in this case. There has been no change of opinion, but there have been dicta, which are not supported by the authorities. We have given this record a most careful examination, in the light of the consequences of the verdict, and are thoroughly aware of the fate pending over the appellant, and would not hesitate to reverse the judgment if we thought appellant had been deprived of a legal right; but we have found nothing in the record tending remotely to show that appellant has been deprived of a legal right. The evidence is amply sufficient, in fact conclusive, of the guilt of the accused; the verdict of the jury is supported beyond all question by the evidence; and we have found nothing in the record authorizing this court to reverse the judgment. The motion for rehearing filed by appellant is overruled, and the judgment affirmed.

Davidson, J., concurring (Filed December 15, 1897):

I concur in the conclusions reached by the presiding judge. As to whether the bill of exceptions in regard to the testimony of the expert witness Dr. Davis is complete, so as to raise the question at issue, I simply quote the qualification of the trial judge to said bill: "The evidence in the case was very voluminous, and in part contradictory. The fact of the killing itself, relied on by the defense as one of its strongest, if not only, ground showing insanity, was one of the disputed facts in the case, provable only by circumstances, and it was impossible to form a hypothetical case assuming all the evidence in the case to be true, because there was no direct evidence of the killing, and said testimony was contradictory in part; and the court stated to counsel that the state would be allowed to state a hypothetical case based upon the assumption that her testimony was true, and embracing all the evidence for the state, and to ask the opinion of the witness based upon such hypothesis; and that the defendant would be allowed to state a hypothetical case based upon the assumption that his testimony was all true, and on all reasonable inferences to be drawn from such testimony, and to express his opinion based upon such hypothetical case. The state embraced all its testimony in its hypothetical question, and, upon the assumed truth of said question, the witness stated his opinion that defendant was sane. The defendant then put its hypothetical case to witness based on the assumption that all his testimony was true, and based on the assumption that all reasonable inferences to be drawn from his testimony were true, including the fact that defendant, without reason, motive, or cause, killed his wife and children, upon which question witness answered that upon such hypothesis he would say the defendant was insane. All the evidence was embraced and included in the state's hypothetical question and defendant's hypothetical question combined." It will be seen from this statement of the judge that two hypothetical questions were stated,—one based upon the evidence for the state, and the other based upon the evidence for the defendant. The expert witness answered upon the state's hypothetical question that the defendant was sane, and upon the hypothetical question put by the defendant that he was insane. Taking these answers, we are forced to the conclusion that the testimony was not only incongruous and contradictory, but led the mind of the expert to two different conclusions. Under such a state of case, it is evident that a hypothetical case embracing all the facts adduced on the trial in this respect could not be answered by the witness without first having decided in his own mind the credibility of the witnesses testifying to such facts. This, of course, he could not do. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony in this state is entirely within the province of the jury. Then, we have the question as stated in the opinion of the presiding judge sharply presented, because no hypothetical question was put to the witness covering the entire testimony adduced in relation to insanity. The question, then, is as to whether the expert witness can be asked hypothetical questions involving the different theories, without requiring him in one question to pass upon all the testimony adduced. It is conceded by Judge Henderson that, if the testimony is incongruous and contradictory, hypothetical questions can be asked, presenting the different theories, and the witness be required to state his opinion on each. I agree with the presiding judge that this can be done in either event, whether the facts are disputed or not. If this were not true, there would be endless confusion and interminable discussion as to what are the facts, or whether the facts are incongruous or not. That the hypothetical questions may be put to the witnesses in this manner is sustained by the weight of authority, and is the sounder rule. In support of this proposition, I refer to Shirley v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 36 S. W. 267; Jones, Ev. § 372, and notes for collated authorities; Stearns v. Field, 90 N. Y. 640; Harnett v. Garcey, 66 N. Y. 641; Mercer v. Voss, 67 N. Y. 56; Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398; People v. Augsburg, 97 N. Y. 501; Guilerman v. Liverpool, N. Y. & P. S. S. Co. 88 N. Y. 358; Coyle v. Com. 104 Pa. 117; Pidcock v. Potter, 68 Pa. 342, 8 Am. Rep. 181; State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224; State v. Hayden, 51 Vt. 296; Stephen, Dig. of Ev. p. 105, note. Mr. Jones, in his work on Evidence (vol. 2, § 373), thus states the question: "The facts are generally in dispute; and it is sufficient if the question fairly states such facts as the proof of the examiner tends to establish, and fairly presents his claim or theory. It cannot be expected that the interrogatory will include the proofs or theory of the adversary, since this would require a party to assume the truth of that which he generally denies." He is here discussing the practice of putting hypothetical questions. If one side fails to include all the testimony in the hypothetical question, the other may go into the matter fully on cross-examination. This, under all circumstances, will get the matter fairly before the jury; and such a practice is commended by the authorities I have examined on the question. See also Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550; and there are other cases in Indiana to the same effect.

Henderson, J., concurring:

I agree to the conclusion reached by a majority of the court in this case, but I disagree as to the rule of practice therein laid down with reference to propounding to an expert a hypothetical case. I do not concede, as contended for by counsel for appellant, that the rule has ever heretofore been laid down by this court. The question was more nearly involved in the case of Webb v. State, 9 Tex. App. 490, than in either the Leache Case or the Williams Case; but an examination of even the Webb Case fails to disclose that the question was properly before the court. Judge White, however, in rendering the opinion in that case, appears to have so conceived it, and discussed the question, and stated the rule to be that, in propounding a hypothetical question to an expert on the question of insanity, all the evidence developed on the trial should be embraced in the hypothetical question put to a party's expert witness. The opinion of the presiding judge discusses the matters involved in said cases, and I will no further refer to them, save to suggest that I cannot understand how counsel for appellant so strenuously insists in his motion for rehearing that he was misled by the decision in the Williams Case as to the rule laid down in propounding a hypothetical question to an expert, when the Williams Case, at the time the BURT CASE was tried, had not then been decided by this court. The question as to the proper interrogatory to be propounded to an expert witness was not before the court in the Williams Case, and what was said on the subject in that case, on a careful reading, would obviously appear to the legal mind to be merely dicta. Besides, as above stated, the BURT CASE was tried in the district court of Travis county on the 27th day of November, 1896, while the Williams Case was not decided by this court until March 27, 1897; so it is absolutely impossible that counsel could have been at all influenced by anything that was said in the Williams Case.

I would here call attention to the case of Shirley v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 36 S. W. 267, decided by this court on the 10th of June, 1896. The opinion in said case would indicate that this very question had come directly before this court in the decision of that case, and the opinion would appear to lay down a different rule than that contended for by appellant. I quote from the opinion as follows: "Upon the trial, counsel for the state submitted to the two physicians, G. B. Beaumont, and C. M. Alexander, a hypothetical case. The physicians gave as their opinion that the appellant was not only sane, but that he was feigning insanity. Counsel for appellant objected to this opinion, because the hypothetical case was not full, and did not introduce the testimony introduced by the appellant tending to show insanity. This objection was not well taken. If not satisfied with the hypothetical case submitted to the doctors by counsel for the state, it was the duty of the counsel for appellant to submit a case made up of all the testimony. Again, the opinion of the doctors was not based upon the testimony that they had heard alone; but they had made examinations of the appellant, had observed his conduct, and the opinion was based upon the evidence delivered by the witnesses and their personal observation of the conduct of the appellant." On an inspection of that record, it will appear, as suggested in the latter part of said opinion, that the experts were examined upon the hypothetical case put, in connection with their personal examination of the appellant and their observation of his conduct. I think it may be said that the question to be propounded to one's expert witness upon a hypothetical case was not fairly involved in the Shirley Case.

After an examination of all the authorities which are accessible, I think the true rule on this subject is simply this: that when the issue of insanity is gone into, and testimony is introduced upon that question, and an expert is introduced by a party, and a hypothetical question is propounded by such party to such witness, he should embrace in such hypothetical question all the facts that have been developed in the evidence bearing upon that issue which are not incongruous and which are not disputed. If any facts are incongruous or are disputed by him, of course he would be authorized to omit such facts; and, on cross-examination, the opposite party could, if he saw fit, in addition to the hypothetical question put by the party introducing the witness, propound a hypothetical case of his own, and add thereto such other facts as may have been omitted by the opposite party, and which might occur to him to be material. Either party should be authorized to propound hypothetical cases embracing the disputed facts; that is, each party would embrace the facts believed by him to be true which may be disputed by his adversary. Such a course seems to me to be fraught with fairness. See Buswell, Insanity, §263; Davis v. State, 35 Ind. 496, 9 Am. Rep. 760; Goodwin v. State, 96 Ind. 550; Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398; Hathaway v. National L. Ins. Co. 48 Vt. 335; Stephen, Dig. of Ev. p. 105, and note. Authorities can, of course, be found to the contrary, and some of them go to the extent of authorizing a hypothetical question to be presented to an expert embracing only such facts as a party desires to present. See Coyle v. Com. 104 Pa. 117, and Sterns v. Field, 90 N. Y. 640.

It occurs to me that the rule above stated is not only supported by the best-considered authorities, but that it is logical. All of the facts which are adduced in evidence bearing upon the issue of insanity are a part of the defendant's character in that respect. Certainly, all of the undisputed facts pertain to him, and serve to shed light upon his character with respect to his sanity. Now, if the evidence contained a great many facts indicating eccentricity of character, and a few of these are culled out and put to an expert, he might say that they did not necessarily indicate insanity of the defendant; whereas, if all the eccentric facts are presented to the expert, he might say that they clearly indicate insanity. If, moreover, the record embraces a great number of facts, some indicating sanity and others insanity, and the facts indicating insanity alone are presented to an expert, he might say that the party was insane; whereas, if all the facts in combination are submitted to the expert in the hypothetical question, he might say that they indicated his sanity or insanity, as the case may be. What I mean to say is this: That when all of the facts in evidence bearing upon the issue of the insanity of the defendant are undisputed, and the expert is adduced by the state to respond to a hypothetical question put, that question should, in common fairness, embrace all the facts. This, in concrete form, alone constitutes his character for sanity or insanity, and the opinion based upon all the facts can alone shed any light upon the question or be of any service to the jury. While I believe this to be the correct rule, yet it by no means follows that a case ought to be reversed where this method of propounding a hypothetical case has not been followed; and I would not be understood as holding that any case ought to be reversed because a proper hypothetical question is not put in the first instance by a party calling an expert, where full opportunity is afforded the opposite party for cross examining that witness. Much less would I agree that the opposite party may object to a hypothetical question on the ground that it does not embrace all the facts, and conceal from his adversary, or refuse to state for the benefit of his adversary, such facts as are not embraced in the hypothetical question. In the case at bar, full opportunity was afforded the appellant on cross-examination to put a full case to the expert, or to put any character of hypothetical case arising from the evidence which he saw fit; and I do not believe that he could refuse to avail himself of this opportunity, and then ask a reversal of the case because a full hypothetical case had not been put by the state. Further, I do not believe that the bill of exceptions in this case fairly raises this question. The authorities hold that the bill must be so full and certain in its statements that in and of itself it will disclose all that is necessary to emphasize the supposed error. It must sufficiently set out the proceedings and attending circumstances below to enable the appellate court to know certainly that error was committed. The judge must certify to the truth of the facts upon which the exception is predicated; and the taking of an exception, without the recitation of such facts in the certificate of the judge, will not be remedied by the allegation of the grounds upon which the exception was taken. The bill of exceptions must itself certify the ground, or it must reasonably appear from the bill itself.

With regard to the testimony of the witness Carrie Sparks, I think it sufficiently appears that the exclamation she heard was from the wife of the appellant, and was addressed to him. It was made on the evening of the homicide, about 7 o'clock. The evidence shows that the only inmates in said house were the appellant, his wife, two small children, and the nurse. At that particular time the nurse and children were absent, and there is no testimony suggesting that anyone else could have been in the house at the time, save the appellant and his wife. True, the evidence is not positive establishing the fact that it was the voice of the wife addressed to her husband (appellant); but, while it was circumstantial, it was of such a character as to almost certainly exclude the idea that the expression could have been made by any other party than the wife, or to any other person than her husband. The evidence shows positively the absence of the nurse and children from the house at that hour, and presumptively or inferentially the presence there at that time of appellant and his wife; and I believe it was admissible for the state to show by the witness Carrie Sparks that, as she passed the residence of appellant, she heard a woman's voice exclaim, in a high tone, as if addressing someone, "I will not stand this any longer!" and this could be used by the state for the purpose of showing motive, and directly as tending to suggest sanity.

With the foregoing observations, I agree with the conclusion reached by the court.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT (Department 2).

Re Estate of Henry KLEMP, an Insolvent Debtor.

(.....Cal.....)

A combined harvester used by a man engaged in the business of farming and grain raising, which he testifies is a necessary implement for his business, is exempt from execution under Code Civ. Proc. § 660, subdiv. 3, as a farming utensil or implement of husbandry, although the owner has used it, after doing his own work, in harvesting the crops of his neighbors.

(November 9, 1897.)

A PPEAL by an insolvent from an order of the Superior Court for Sutter County refusing to set apart to him a combined harvesting machine as exempt from execution. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to exemptions of tools of trade from execution, see also Watson v. Lederer (Colo.) 1 L. R. A. 854, and note; Re McManus (Cal.) 10 L. R. A. 39 L. R. A.

Messrs. White, Hughes, & Seymour, for appellant:

"The farming utensils or implements of husbandry of the judgment debtor" are exempt from execution.

Code Civ. Proc. subd. 3, § 690.

Statutes of exemption are remedial in character, and are enacted for humane purposes, and are everywhere given a most liberal construction, in furtherance of their benevolent objects.

Montague v. Richardson, 24 Conn. 388, 63 Am. Dec. 178; Re McManus, 87 Cal. 292, 10 L. R. A. 567; Re Robb, 99 Cal. 202.

In Kansas a printing press, type, and other articles used in publishing a newspaper have been held to be exempt under a statute exempting "the necessary tools and implements of any mechanic," etc.

Bliss v. Vedder, 84 Kan. 59, 55 Am. Rep. 287.

So, in the state of Vermont a barber's chair was exempted as a tool or implement "necessary for upholding life" of the debtor.

Allen v. Thompson, 45 Vt. 472.

In Wisconsin a mowing machine was exempted as a "farming utensil" necessary to a farmer in the conduct of that business.

Humphrey v. Taylor, 45 Wis. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 738.

There seems to be no limitation of the things which may be held exempt as implements, save that of necessity. If they are necessary in the debtor's trade or calling, they are exempt, though they are not mere tools, but are complicated and expensive machinery.

Freeman, Executions, 2d ed. § 226a; Re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 74; Robert v. Adams, 38 Cal. 383, 99 Am. Dec. 413; McCue v. Tunstead, 65 Cal. 506.

Modern ways of farming, as well as of doing all kinds of business, make it necessary for the farmer or artisan who would successfully compete with others engaged in the same business, to arm himself with the most improved tools and machinery.

Healy v. Bateman, 2 R. I. 454, 60 Am. Dec. 94; Montague v. Richardson, 24 Conn. 388, 63 Am. Dec. 178.

Messrs. K. S. Mahon and Lawrence Schilling, for respondent:

A reasonable construction should be given to the statute, and not one which would pervert its benevolent design, and enable gross frauds to be perpetrated under cover of law.

Re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 78.

The farmer who farms 160 acres cannot afford such an expensive piece of machinery, costing $1,500, and requiring twenty to thirty mules, or a traction engine to haul it. Nor is it a "necessary tool" to such a farmer.

Roberts v. Adams, 38 Cal. 383, 99 Am. Dec. 413.

The legislative intent showing that a harvester is not a "farming implement" is found in § 2955, Civil Code, as amended March 16, 1895, Stat. 1895, p. 57.

Sec. 2955. Mortgages may be made upon the following personal property, and none other.

"Third.—Steam engines and boilers.

"Seventeenth.—Harvesters, threshing outfits, hay presses, and farming implements."

Some large farmers who own harvesters use large steam traction engines to pull the harvester, and find them much cheaper and more profitable to use than horses or mules as motive power.

Such an outfit—harvester and engine—cost from $5,000 to $7,000.

Suppose such a farmer should avail himself of the insolvent law. Would this court sanction the exemption of such an outfit for the use of the insolvent debtor.

Such a construction would enable a person to retain to his own use thousands of dollars' worth of property, and place it beyond the reach of his creditors, who, perhaps, have supplied him with the necessities of life.

Expensive machinery of such character is not exempt.

Re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 74; Ford v. Johnson, 84 Barb. 364; Meyer v. Meyer, 23 Iowa, 359, 92 Am. Dec. 432.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by an insolvent debtor from an order of the superior court denying his petition to have set apart to his use "one Holt Bros.' Combined Harvester." The court adjudicated that said harvester, and certain other personal property not involved here, "are not utensils or implements of husbandry," and in so holding we think the court erred. The court found that at the date of the adjudication in insolvency, and for a long time prior thereto, the appellant had been engaged in the business of farming and grain raising, and during all that time had used and employed said harvester in the conduct of his business. The only evidence introduced on the subject of the harvester was the testimony of the appellant himself. He testified that for about nine years he had been engaged in farming and wheat raising on a certain piece of land in Sutter county; that he had cultivated between 1,000 and 1,100 acres; that he had used certain personal property, including said harvester in said business; and that "all thereof were and are necessary implements for the proper conducting and care of my said business." He further testified as follows: "I purchased said harvester in the reaping season of 1888, and paid for the same about $1,500, but at this time it is worth about $300. I purchased said harvester to be used in harvesting my own crops, grown on the leased lands above mentioned, but I have on some occasions, after having harvested my own crops, used said harvester in harvesting the crop or crops of one or two of my neighbors, usually in return for assistance rendered by such neighbor or neighbors in harvesting my own crops. I never have been in the business of harvesting grain, nor have I used said harvester in the business of harvesting grain for others in any manner other than above explained. A combined harvester is a necessary tool for a farmer and grain raiser who is engaged in the business to any considerable extent." He further said that "comparatively few farmers in Sutter county own a combined harvester. Some of them still use headers, and some hire combined harvesters to harvest their crops." This testimony was in no way controverted.

Section 690, subd. 3, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "the farming utensils or implements of husbandry of the judgment debtor" are exempt from execution. This provision has, on its face, no limitation as to the character of the implements of husbandry so exempt. It does not even provide that they must be "necessary," as is provided in statutes of exemption in many other states, and as is provided in our own Code as to other property exempted. Of course personal property owned by a farmer which is really not an implement of husbandry is not exempt under the section, but if it be such an implement its exemption does not depend upon its value. There is no limitation as to value, although there is such a limitation as to certain other kinds of property which are exempt under other provisions. It is clear from the evidence that the combined harvester in question is a farming utensil and an implement of husbandry, if, indeed, that fact is not a matter of common knowledge. It was used directly and prominently in the business of farming and for no other purpose, and it is not contended that appellant had other implements by which he could cut, thresh, or winnow his wheat. Horse rakes, gang plows, headers, threshing machines, and combined harvesters are as clearly implements of husbandry as are hand rakes, single plows, sickles, cradles, flails, or an old-fashioned machine for winnowing. There is no ground for excluding an implement from the operation of the statute because it is an improvement, and supplants a former implement used with less effectiveness for the same purpose. Present methods of farming, as well as conducting other kinds of business, require the use of improved machinery. The fact that not many farmers in Sutter county own combined harvesters is of no importance. It appears that it was not unusual for them to hire such harvesters. The amount of land cultivated by appellant is certainly not unusual in this state. The whole subject is one of legislative policy, and until the legislature shall see fit to limit the implements of husbandry which shall be exempt—either by enumeration or by a restriction based on value—a court has no warrant in any of the reasons given by respondent to eliminate from the statute anything which is clearly within its terms. No decisions of this court cited by respondent are adverse to the above views. In the case of Re Baldwin, 71 Cal. 74, it was held that a threshing machine with an expensive outfit was not exempt because it was used chiefly in doing work for others. The court there says: "It was not intended that all farming machinery which a farmer may own should be exempt, because, while he uses it chiefly by renting it out, or in doing work on others' farms for hire, he still uses it to a small extent on his own land. To hold otherwise would enable the farmer, who cultivates 40 acres, to invest a large amount of money in expensive implements, and to hold them free and clear of his creditors, though they were used but for a day on his own land, and for all the balance of the year were rented or hired out to others." And in the later case of Estate of McManus, 87 Cal. 292, 10 L. R. A. 567, this court say that in the Baldwin case it was held that the threshing machine was not exempt "upon the ground that the outfit was principally used in threshing grain raised by other persons for hire." For a discussion of the general subject, see Montague v. Richardson, 24 Conn. 338, 63 Am. Dec. 178, and notes; it being remembered that our Code is broader than any to which our attention has been called, there being no such word used as "necessary," "proper," "adequate," etc.

We think that the court below erred in refusing to set apart the combined harvester as exempt, and therefore the order appealed from is reversed.

We concur: Temple, J.; Henshaw, J.

John D. SIEBE, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The collection of taxes at an earlier date on personal property unsecured by lien on real property than upon other property, although the taxpayer thus loses the use of his money earlier than other taxpayers do, does not violate Const. art. 13, § 1, requiring property to be taxed "in proportion to its value."

2. A statute making different provisions for the collection of taxes on different kinds of property is not special, if the classification is based upon intrinsic differences requiring different regulations.

3. A statute authorizing taxes on personal property not secured by lien on real property to be collected at the time of making the assessment before equalization, before levy for the year, and before the beginning of the fiscal year to which they belonged, with a provision for subsequently collecting or refunding any difference between the amount collected and that which ought to be paid, is not unconstitutional for lack of uniformity, since there is sufficient difference between secured and unsecured taxes to justify the discrimination in the procedure.

(Van Fleet and Harrison, JJ., dissent.)

A PPEAL by petitioners from a judgment of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco refusing to restrain defendant from proceeding to seize and sell petitioner's property to enforce payment of taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Walter H. Levy for appellants.

Messrs. Naphtaly, Freedrich, & Ackerman, W. F. Fitzgerald, Attorney General, and W. H. Anderson for respondent.

Beatty, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant is assessor of the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiffs are residents of San Francisco, and in March, 1895, in response to defendant's demand, made a return showing that they were owners of personal property in said city and county subject to taxation for the ensuing fiscal year, but owned no real property. The defendant assessed their personal property, and on May 20, 1895, demanded payment of the tax, amounting, at the rate of the tax levy for the previous year, to $71.78, and threatened, in case of their refusal to pay, to seize and sell enough of said property to make the amount due. To restrain such threatened seizure and sale, this action was begun. The superior court denied the injunction, and plaintiffs appeal.

It is conceded that the proceedings of the assessor were sanctioned by the express provisions of the statute, but it is contended that a statute which authorizes the collection of taxes on personal property not secured by lien on real property, before equalization, before levy for the year, and before the beginning of the fiscal year to which they belong, is unconstitutional in those particulars, and to that extent unenforceable. The specific objection to the law is that it violates the constitutional requirement as to uniformity of all general laws, and especially of laws relating to taxation. It will not be necessary, in order to indicate the position of appellants, to cite the various sections of our revenue law to which reference has been made in the argument. It is sufficient to say that under the Constitution and laws of California the fiscal year begins on the 1st of July, and ends on the 30th of June. The taxes for each fiscal year accrue on the first Monday in March preceding its commencement, and become a lien from that date upon the real property of the respective taxpayers. Where the real property of a taxpayer is sufficient to secure the payment of all his taxes upon his personal property, as well as upon the realty itself, he is not required to pay the tax before the end of November, prior to which time the board of supervisors, first, and the state board of equalization, afterwards, equalize the assessments, and then establish the rates for state and county purposes, according to which the tax is to be levied. But where a taxpayer has no real property, or none sufficient to secure the payment of his taxes, the assessor is required to collect them at the time of making his assessment, and, in case of failure to pay, to sell sufficient of the property of the delinquent to make the amount of the tax, with costs. As this collection must be enforced before the meeting of either board of equalization, and before the rate for the ensuing year is ascertained and the levy made, it is provided that it shall be made according to the rate levied the previous year; and as this may be, and generally is, greater or less than the subsequent levy for the current year, provision is made for refunding to the taxpayer any excess in the collection, and for the payment by him of any deficiency. It is, of course, undeniable that the citizen who by the provisions of this law is compelled to pay his taxes six months sooner than others are required to pay on the same kind of property is under the disadvantage of being deprived of the use of his money for a longer period than other owners of personal property; and it is easy to put extreme cases, as counsel have done, in which real hardship would result. But it would be equally easy to imagine extreme cases in which honest taxpayers, whose taxes are perfectly secured by lien upon their real property, would suffer great injustice by the removal of personal property from the jurisdiction between the 1st of March, when taxes accrue, and the end of November, when secured taxes become delinquent. The validity of a law is not to be tested, however, by its application to extreme cases, involving the assumption of grossly arbitrary violation of their duties by public officers. If every law were declared unconstitutional which by the application of such a test could be shown capable of working injustice, we should have very few laws left. As to the actual working of this particular law, we know that it has been in operation in this state, outside of San Francisco, for almost forty years, and that its validity has never before been drawn in question. This could scarcely have happened if its operation was oppressive or unjust. These arguments, therefore, must be put aside, and the law considered with reference to the different clauses of the Constitution which it is supposed to violate.

First, it is said to violate § 1 of article 18, which provides that "all property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States shall be taxed in proportion to its value to be ascertained as provided by law." There is nothing in the revenue law which is inconsistent with this provision, unless it is the requirement that unsecured taxes must be paid at the time of assessment, thereby causing the taxpayer to lose the use of his money longer than other taxpayers do. As to the right of equalization, that is not taken away by a previous collection of the tax; and if the assessment is reduced by either board of equalization, the excess over the true amount of the tax is refunded. The same is true as to the rate. If the levy for the previous year is larger than the levy for the current year, the excess is refunded. In the end all taxpayers are taxed uniformly upon their duly-equalized assessments, and it remains only to inquire whether there is such an intrinsic difference between secured and unsecured taxes as to justify the legislature in making different regulations as to the time of their collection. The clause of the Constitution which is supposed to preclude such a difference of regulation is subdiv. 10 of § 25 of article 4, which prohibits the legislature from passing local or special laws for the assessment or collection of taxes. This law is not a local law, and it is not special if the classification which it makes is based upon intrinsic differences requiring different regulations. That there is such intrinsic difference between secured and unsecured taxes seems to me self-evident. The object of the Constitution is to make the burdens of taxation equal in proportion to the value of all taxable property. To accomplish this object, it is not only necessary that assessments should be duly made and equalized, and the rate levied uniformly, but measures must be taken to secure the collection from all alike. The law imposes upon real estate a lien, dating from the first Monday in March of every year, for all taxes levied upon the owner for the ensuing fiscal year. It makes such taxes perfectly secure, by a lien upon immovable property, and the burden of this lien is in many instances an inconvenience and disadvantage to the owner. If the owner of personal property has no real property to secure the payment of his taxes, must the state leave him for more than six months at liberty to remove himself and his property without the jurisdiction, and risk the loss of the tax altogether, to the prejudice of those whose taxes are secured? Either it must do so, or it may collect the tax at once, or take the property into its possession, and thus secure the only lien to which personal property may be subjected. These considerations make it clear that there is a difference between secured and unsecured taxes which justifies the classification which the legislature has made, and leaves the law entirely free from objection on the ground that it is not general and uniform.

The other objections stated by counsel have not been pressed, and we think them wholly without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: Henshaw, J.; Temple, J.; Garoutte, J.; McFarland, J.

Van Fleet, J., dissenting:

I dissent. In my judgment the provisions of the act in question clearly violate the constitutional rule that "all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value." Const. art. 13, § 1. This provision is not satisfied by an equal assessment merely. Taxation consists in the payment of taxes, and, if the operation of the statute is such as to make one person or one kind of property pay more in proportion to value than other persons or property, such a statute must be void. Under the operation of this law, the owner of personal property not owning any real estate, is forced to pay his tax many months, perhaps nearly a year, before those owning real estate are required to pay their taxes on personal property. He is therefore compelled to lose the interest on his money for that time. Obviously the state has no more right to deprive a man of the use of his money than it has to deprive him of the money itself. The result is that he has to pay more than others on the same valuation,—the difference being measured by the value of the use of the money during the period in which the others are not required to pay. This constitutional rule is further violated by this legislation because the "value" in proportion to which the taxation is to be laid is "to be ascertained as provided by law," and such ascertainment has not been completed when the tax is required to be paid. The provisions of the statute concerning equalization make no exception as to any kind of property, and none could constitutionally be made. Article 4, § 25, subds. 10, 83. The right of any taxpayer to have his assessment reduced, if too high, is therefore perfect; and until the opportunity therefor has been afforded the taxpayer, the value has not been "ascertained as provided by law." In any particular case the assessment of personal property made by the assessor may be, and not infrequently is, much too high, and is reduced by the board of equalization; yet the owner, if not also owning real property, is compelled to pay a tax based on this excessive valuation. He is therefore taxed in excess of his proportionate amount. It is said that the excess, if any, will be ultimately returned to the taxpayer. But this is no answer. For, first, he is deprived of the use of the money which the state has thus unjustly taken from him, and loses the interest thereon. Moreover (and this is no light consideration), a person who could pay the proper amount of tax may be wholly unable to pay the excessive amount thus demanded, and is therefore forced either to sell his property on the spot, perhaps at a ruinous sacrifice, or to submit to a seizure and sale by the assessor at still greater loss, aggravated by penalties and costs. By this process he is certainly taxed, in effect, at a higher rate than other persons, and the statute as to him, has not a uniform operation. The system provided by these provisions is also open to the similar objection that the property owner is required to pay his tax before even the rate of taxation has been ascertained. He is required to pay on the basis of the levy for the preceding year, and, while this may be lower than the rate which may be levied for the current year, it may also be much higher. In the latter case the taxpayer is required to pay to the state a sum in excess of his proportionate share, and he is deprived of the use of the money represented by such excess for many months, and in many cases is compelled to resort to onerous, and, for a poor man, expensive proceedings to collect it. It is contended that this legislation is based on a classification which the legislature is competent to make. But, if this were so, it would not help the case. The legislature has no power, by any process of classification, to tax any person, or any kind of property, except in proportion to the value of the property. But the supposed classification is in itself arbitrary and invalid. Personal property might be said to constitute a class, as distinguished from real property; and the legislature might, perhaps, make such differences in the rules for the taxation of these different classes, as should legitimately follow from the inherent difference between them. But the classification here attempted is not based upon any difference in the property itself or even in its situation. What has been undertaken is to prescribe one rule for the taxation of personal property when owned by one person, and a different rule for the taxation of precisely similar property when owned by another person. Such a classification the legislature has no power to make. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 288, 251; Ex parte Frank, 52 Cal. 608, 28 Am. Rep. 642. It is said that, unless some such distinction be made, much property will escape taxation. This, if true, would not entitle the legislature to overstep its constitutional power. But the suggestion is not necessarily true. It would be quite possible to frame a system, operating equally upon all, in which no such result would necessarily follow; and, in fact, for more than thirty years such a system prevailed in San Francisco, and it was never claimed, so far as I am aware, that personal property taxes were not collected as closely there as in the other counties of the state. It is also said that this system has been substantially in force in this state since a very early period, and that there is therefore a strong presumption of its constitutionality. It must be remembered, however, that during the greater portion of the time it was not in force in the city and county of San Francisco, wherein a very large proportion of all the taxes are paid. This system presses most heavily on the poor,—the class which is the least able to undertake legal contests,—and by far the greater proportion of the poor are in a large city like San Francisco. In the interior counties the number of persons coming under the operation of this law is very small. Most of them are too poor to resist the law, and others have been restrained, perhaps, by the sentiment that it is not patriotic to refuse to pay taxes. Under such circumstances the fact that the question has not previously been mooted can have no great force.

This whole system, it seems to me, presents an instance of the most vicious kind of discrimination known to the law,—a discrimination against the poor. It would be much better, if such a thing were necessary, that the state should lose some small portion of its revenue, than that it should wring it, by questionable means, out of those least able either to endure or to resist such exactions. For this reason, if for no other, it is the duty of courts to jealously scrutinize such a discriminating system, and to unhesitatingly condemn it, unless a clear constitutional warrant for its exercise has been made to appear. In my judgment, no such warrant can be found under the Constitution of this state. I think the judgment should be reversed.

Harrison, J., dissenting:

I also dissent from the judgment of the majority of the court, upon the following considerations, as well as for the reasons expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Van Fleet: The provisions of §§ 3820-3824 of the Political Code are, in my opinion, totally at variance with the constitutional rights of the citizen. By these sections the assessor is authorized to assess and summarily sell the property of any person "when in his opinion" the person does not own sufficient real property within the county to secure the payment of his taxes. Under this provision an assessor has the unrestricted power to exercise favoritism or antagonism towards the person to be assessed. It does not affect the principle whether the power is so exercised or not. The fact that it may be used as a cover to an unfair assessment is the test of the right of the legislature to confer the power. Under the principles of the Constitution of this state, the sovereign power of taxation cannot be intrusted to the arbitrary will of any individual, and it is equally immaterial to the question that the person assessed may subsequently obtain redress for any abuse of this power. The state can by this mode no more deprive the citizen of his property for six months than it can take it from him entirely. In either case his property is taken without due process of law. Under the authority thus given, one's property, which in reality is not of greater value than $500, may be assessed at $5,000, and the very property so assessed taken from the owner, and summarily sold at a forced sale, where, as it is well known, its value is never realized, and the surplus, after deducting the taxes and costs, returned to the owner. It is poor satisfaction to him that months afterwards the assessment is reduced by the board of equalization to its actual value, and that still later he may recover from the county the difference between what should have been his taxes and what the assessor took at the sale of his property. I have no hesitation in holding that such a procedure is contrary to the principles of free government.

3. An allegation of a threat to "change the grade" of a street is fairly construed to mean a physical grading of the street, and not merely an ordinance establishing the grade.
4. A mere denial that plaintiff is entitled to any damages, while affirmatively showing that the work of grading a street in front of his premises is being done, is not such a denial of all the equities of his bill for an injunction as to justify the vacation of an injunction order.
5. An allegation of irreparable injury to plaintiff's property, or of the inability of the defendant to respond in damages, is not necessary for an injunction against grading a street in front of plaintiff's premises without paying him compensation for his damages, where the Constitution forbids taking or damaging his property without such compensation.
6. Damages by the grading of a street in front of one's premises, although no prior grade had been established, are within the provision of the Constitution against taking or damaging property without just compensation.

7. A constitutional provision against taking or damaging property for public use without just compensation is self executing.

8. No admission that any damage will be caused by the grading of a street is necessary to the filing of a petition by a city, under Acts 1891, chap. 94, providing for the ascertainment of damages before taking or damaging private property for public use.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Circuit Court for Lawrence County granting an injunction to restrain defendant from changing the grade of the street in front of plaintiff's property until compensation had been paid for the damage caused thereby.

Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. E. Dewey, for appellant:

An injunction will not lie unless some physical act is threatened, like digging up the street.

Hempstead v. Des Moines, 63 Iowa, 36; Mulholland v. Des Moines, A. & W. R. Co. 60 Iowa, 740; Brown v. Lowell, 8 Met. 172; Tyson v. Milwaukee, 50 Wis. 78; Jennings v. Le Roy, 68 Cal. 397; Lewis, Em. Dom. §§ 210, 667.

When the defendant fully and fairly denies, under oath, the equities claimed by the bill of complaint, the injunction will be dissolved.

2 Walt, Pr. 115.

The extraordinary judicial writs of the courts will not be issued, like summons from justice courts, as a mere matter of course, on application, but the right to the relief demanded must be clear and the facts on which it is asked not disputed and the remedy by ordinary law action inadequate.

3 Walt, Act. & Def. § 6, p. 761.

There is nothing in our Constitution requiring condemnation proceedings, where the property is not actually taken for public use.

It will be observed that the requisite of prepayment is limited to the taking possession of private property for public use, and not to damaging it.

Const. art. 6, § 18.

There have been many attempts to have the word "taking" so held as to cover property consequently damaged by a public improvement, but they have always failed.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 995, p. 1182, and note 1.

The only ground that equitable jurisprudence has ever recognized as being sufficient to sustain an injunction for threatened damages to property is that the damage would be irreparable. Included in this ground is another, viz.: That the defendant is irresponsible and unable to respond for the threatened damage, which would, of course, make it irreparable.

3 Walt, Act. & Def. p. 700.

An abutting owner cannot claim any compensation whatever, for purely consequential damages in bringing a street to grade the first time, the street to be used solely for ordinary purposes of travel.

Corson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order granting a preliminary injunction. The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of certain town lots in Lead city, fronting upon Mill street, in said city, upon which she had erected a house and made other improvements, instituted this action to restrain the city from changing the grade of said street, which she avers the city was threatening to do, and which change of grade, she avers, would cause damage to her property in a sum of, at least, $1,000, until such damages shall be ascertained and paid. The court made the order restraining the city from grading in front of her premises, but permitted it to complete a sidewalk then partially completed.

The errors assigned upon which the city relies for a reversal of the order are, in substance, as follows: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for an injunction; (2) that the court erred in making said order after the defendant had presented its proposed answer, in which it denied that plaintiff was entitled to any compensation as in her complaint alleged, or that she would sustain any damage; (3) that the court erred in making the order, having dissolved the restraining order as to the construction of the sidewalk; (4) that the court erred, for the reason that the complaint shows upon its face that the only change of grade threatened was to bring the street to the established grade for the first time; (5) because the complaint contains no allegation that plaintiff would sustain irreparable injury, or that the defendant was not solvent, and fully able to pay any damages plaintiff might sustain by reason of such threatened change of grade.

The complaint states, in effect, that the defendant (appellant here) is a municipal corporation; that Mill street is one of the streets of the city; that plaintiff (respondent here) is the owner of certain lots (describing them) fronting upon said street; that she had erected a house and made other improvements upon said lots on the "natural grade" of said street; and that the defendant threatens to change the grade of said street by raising the same about 3½ feet, thereby leaving the house and other improvements of said plaintiff that depth below the grade, causing damage to her property fronting on said street of at least, $1,000; and that said defendant has not compensated nor offered to compensate her for the damage so threatened. She therefore prays that said defendant be enjoined from in any manner changing the grade of said street until her damages have been ascertained and paid. The defendant filed an answer, which will be referred to further on in this opinion. A hearing was had, and the trial court made the order appealed from.

The theory, evidently, upon which the complaint was drawn, and upon which the court below granted the injunction, was that, under the provisions of the Constitution of this state, it was the duty of the defendant to first proceed to ascertain the damage resulting to plaintiff's property by the change of grade or proposed change of grade, and pay or tender the same, before the street could be lawfully graded. The section of the Constitution relied on reads as follows: Private property shall not be taken for public use or damaged without just compensation as determined by a jury, which shall be paid as soon as it can be ascertained and before possession is taken." Const. art. 6, § 13. In this connection it may be proper to notice the act of the legislature of 1891, entitled "An Act to Provide for the Assessment by Jury of Just Compensation for Private Property Taken for Public Use or Damaged," approved March 7, 1891, and which constitutes chapter 94, Laws 1891. The first section of this act reads as follows: "In all cases when municipal or other corporations, or individuals, invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use or damaging the same in making, constructing, or repairing any work or improvement allowed by law, shall determine to exercise such privilege, it shall be the duty of such corporation or individual to file a petition in the circuit court of the county in which the property to be taken or damaged is situated praying that the just compensation to be made for such property may be ascertained by a jury." The sections following provide specially the method of proceeding, impaneling a jury, etc. This act seems to have been adopted to provide a summary proceeding for carrying into effect the constitutional provision. It may be assumed from the statements in the complaint that Mill street is one of the streets of Lead city over which the defendant has the right to exercise municipal control, by grading, keeping the same in repair, etc., and in which the public has the usual easements incident to highways in incorporated towns and cities. It may also be assumed from the statements in the complaint that Mill street had not been previously graded or the grade established prior to the erection of plaintiff's buildings, and that the change of grade threatened was from the natural grade to the grade established by an ordinance of the city. It does not appear from the complaint whether the fee to the soil of Mill street is in the city or the owners of lots fronting thereon; but in the view we take of the case, this is not material, as the authority of the municipality over the same and the rights of fronting owners are practically the same as to the liability of the one to pay and the right of the other to recover damages.

The question as to whether or not the facts stated in the complaint entitled the plaintiff to an injunction is an important one, and has not been heretofore passed upon by this court. It involves a construction of the constitutional provision, and the effect of including the term "or damaged" in our Constitution, and the duties and powers of municipal corporations thereunder. It is a general rule that compensation for private property, taken for public use, shall be ascertained and paid before the property is taken; and, in states where such provisions exist, it has been the rule to restrain the taking until after the ascertainment and payment of the compensation. McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257. It is also true, as a general rule, that in states where no constitutional provision exists similar to the one in this state, and in which the term "damaged" is not included, if no property is in fact taken, the incidental damages which may result to the owner of abutting property give no right of action to the owner, and furnish no basis for interference by the courts or otherwise. We say as a general rule, for courts have held in a class of cases that where the injury was in some manner direct, and the estate actually invaded by super-induced additions of water, earth, sand, or other matter or artificial structures placed upon it, so as effectually to destroy or impair its usefulness, it is a "taking," within the meaning of the Constitution. Vanderlip v. Grand Rapids, 73 Mich. 52, 23 L. R. A. 247. The reports disclose many cases under the former system where streets were cut down or filled to such a depth as to render the property of the abutting owner comparatively worthless, and yet such owner was without remedy. In other words, the private property of such owner was, in effect, taken for the use or benefit of the public, without any compensation made to the owner. Most of these decisions were based largely upon the decision of the supreme court of Massachusetts in Callender v. Marsh, 1 Pick. 417, which was a street-grade case, in which a deep cut had been made. But in that case the learned chief justice who wrote the opinion fully recognized the injustice of the old rule as applied to the facts in that case. He says: "These are cases, without doubt, where an individual may suffer by the exercise of this power, and thus be made to involuntarily contribute much more than his proportion to the public convenience; but such cases seem not to be provided for, and must be left to that sense of justice which every community is supposed to be governed by. . . . Cases apparently hard will occur. The present is such a one."

But the framers of our organic law deemed it proper to fully protect the rights of the abutting property owner in the Constitution itself, and not leave him to the "sense of justice" by which a community is supposed to be governed. The framers of our organic law must be presumed to have been familiar with the provisions in the earlier state Constitutions, and of the many cases in which private property had been, in effect, taken for public use, for which the property owner seemed to have no redress; and it is quite manifest that they inserted the term "or damaged" for the express purpose and object of protecting private property from the arbitrary exercise of municipal or other corporate power. The constitutional provision is unquestionably a wise and just one, and well calculated to protect property owners from injustice and wrong on the part of municipal or other corporations or individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, and should be given a liberal construction by the courts, in order to make it effectual in the protection of the rights of the citizen. The words "or damaged" were, without doubt, added to the usual provisions contained in earlier Constitutions for the purpose of extending the remedy to incidental or consequential injuries to property, not actually taken for public use, in the ordinary acceptance of that term; and the same was adopted by the people with this express guaranty that just compensation should be made for property so taken or damaged for public use. And there is the further express guaranty that this compensation shall be paid before the proposed improvement can be made, or, in the language of the Constitution, "possession is taken." The ascertainment and payment of damages that may be caused is a condition precedent to the right of the municipality to proceed. We are of the opinion, therefore, that, upon the facts stated in the complaint, the court below was authorized to make the order. The words "or damaged" are found in the later Constitutions of several of the states, among which are Illinois, Missouri, Nebraska, Pennsylvania, California, and West Virginia; and the construction we have placed upon these words is fully sustained by the courts of these states. Werth v. Springfield, 78 Mo. 107; Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 56 Am. Rep. 109; Blanchard v. Kansas, 16 Fed. Rep. 444; Harmon v. Omaha, 17 Neb. 548, 52 Am. Rep. 420; Johnson v. Parkersburg, 16 W. Va. 402, 37 Am. Rep. 779; Chambers v. Cincinnati & G. R. Co. 69 Ga. 320; McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257; New Brighton v. United Presbyterian Church, 96 Pa. 331; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638. The supreme court of Missouri, in the first case above cited, says: "When property is damaged by establishing the grade of a street, or by raising or lowering the grade of a street previously established, it is damaged for public use within the meaning of the Constitution." In the case last above cited, the Supreme Court of the United States quotes from the supreme court of the state of Illinois in Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Ayres, 106 Ill. 518, the following: "It is needless to say our decisions have not been harmonious on this question but in the case of Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64, there was a full review of the decisions of our courts, as well as the courts of Great Britain, under a statute containing a provision similar to the provision in our Constitution. The conclusion there reached was, that under this constitutional provision a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial damage by the making and using and improvement that is public in its character, that it does not require that the damage shall be caused by a trespass, or an actual physical invasion of the owner's real estate, but if the construction and operation of the railroad or other improvement is the cause of the damage, though consequential, the party may recover. We regard that case as conclusive of this question." And then adds: "We concur in that interpretation. The use of the word 'damaged,' in the clause providing for compensation to owners of private property, appropriated to public use, could have been with no other intention than that expressed by the state court. Such a change in the organic law of the state was not meaningless. But it would be meaningless if it should be adjudged that the Constitution of 1870 gave no additional or greater security to private property sought to be appropriated to public use, than was guaranteed by the former Constitution." In some respects our constitutional provisions differ from those of the states mentioned,—notably as to the ascertainment and payment of the compensation before possession is taken. Upon this subject see exhaustive opinion of Brewer, circuit judge, in McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257, supra.

The learned counsel for the defendant contends that the complaint does not allege that the defendant threatened to disturb the street itself; but we think the expression "change the grade" fairly imports that the defendant was threatening to physically grade the street, and not merely to pass an ordinance establishing the grade.

He also contends that, defendant having denied that plaintiff would suffer any damage, the court should have vacated the injunction order. The rule invoked only applies to a case where all the equities of the bill are fully and specially denied. Grant County v. Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. 3 S. D. 390. The answer in this case does not come within the rule. Without attempting to give the answer in full, or even its substance, it is sufficient to state that it appears from the affirmative defense therein that the grade of the street had been established by ordinance No. 75, and that the city engineer was proceeding with the work of constructing a sidewalk in front of plaintiff's lots on the grade so established. The mere denial, therefore, that plaintiff was entitled to any compensation or entitled to any damages was not sufficient to defeat the injunction.

The contention that the failure to allege in the complaint that the plaintiff would sustain irreparable injury, or that the defendant was unable to respond in damages, was fatal to plaintiff's right to an injunction, is not tenable, as applied to this class of cases. Plaintiff's right to an injunction does not depend upon the ability or the inability of the defendant to respond in damages, but upon the fact that plaintiff is entitled to be paid such damages as she may sustain before the city can lawfully proceed to damage her property. In McElroy v. Kansas City, 21 Fed. Rep. 257, the court says: "When the defendant has an ultimate right to do the act sought to be restrained, but only upon some condition precedent, and compliance with the condition is within the power of the defendant, injunction will almost universally be granted until the condition is complied with. This principle lies at the foundation of the multitude of cases which have restrained the taking of property until after the payment of compensation, for in all those cases the legislature has placed at the command of the defendant means for ascertaining the value of the property. In those cases the courts have seldom stopped to inquire whether the value of the property sought to be taken was little or great, whether the injury to the complainant was large or small, but have contented themselves with holding that, as the defendant had full means for ascertaining such compensation, it was his first duty to use such means, determine and pay the compensation, and until he did so the taking of the property would be enjoined." And in the same opinion the court says: "As the established rule of construction has been, under Constitutions prohibiting the taking of private property for public use until compensation was first made, to enforce that mandate irrespective of all legislative action, the same rule must obtain in this case. The damage to property is placed upon the same basis as the value of property taken, and neither can be done without compensation first made. In other words, uniting 'property damaged' with 'property taken' in the same clause, and subject to the same prohibitions, places them in the same category as to judicial action. I see no logical escape from the conclusion."

Appellant further contends that the complaint fails to show that any previous grade had been established; and, unless that fact appears, the respondent would have no right to damages for an incidental injury caused by the making of a grade for the first time, and cites § 18, art. 16, chap. 87, Laws 1890, which provides that, after the grade of any street has been established, the city shall, if they change the grade, be liable for damages. But an act of the legislature, while entitled to great consideration, cannot abridge or control the provisions of the Constitution. The provisions of the Constitution are not limited to a change of grade once established, but are general, and include all damages to private property for public use. The legislature is not authorized to restrict the language or take from the citizen the protection the Constitution has thrown around him and his property. This provision of the Constitution is self-executing, and, if there was no law to carry it into effect, a court of equity would, in the exercise of its inherent power, provide some method for ascertaining the damages, if any, caused by the injury threatened. But we think the act of 1891, heretofore referred to, provides fully the proceedings which the city should have taken.

The contention that the city does not admit that its threatened acts would cause any damage to the respondent, and cannot avail itself of the provisions of the act, is without merit. The object of the provisions of the act is to ascertain whether or not there will be damage caused by the proposed improvement, and the amount, if any. The first section, as we have seen, provides that, "in all cases when municipal or other corporations . . . invested with the privilege of . . . damaging the same . . . shall determine to exercise such privilege, it shall," etc. It will be seen that the municipality is not required to state that its acts will, in fact, damage anyone, but only that it has determined to exercise its privilege as such corporation, stating the necessary facts to call into exercise the power of the court. Whether or not the court below properly granted the order upon the evidence before it cannot be considered by this court, as the evidence is not brought in by the record.

The order of the court below is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

City of HENDERSON, Appt.,

v.
Helen McCLAIN.

(.....Ky.....)

1. Damages for injuries caused to an abutting lot by being left 8 or 10 feet above the street by change of grade must be paid by the city to the lotowner, under a Constitution providing compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed, for public use.
2. The filing of a second traverse of an answer is not necessary in case the answer after having been traversed was withdrawn for the purpose of a motion to dismiss the petition, and refiled when the motion was dismissed.
3. Failure to bring an injunction suit to prevent the changing of the grade of a street without making compensation for injury to the abutting owner is not an abandonment of the right to bring an action for such compensation after the change is effected.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henderson County

NOTE.—As to change of grade, see also Searle v. Lead (S. D.) ante, 345, and footnote thereto.

in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to abutting property by a change of the grade of a street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Clay & Clay, for appellant:

A municipal corporation has the authority to grade or regrade a street for any public purpose without incurring any responsibility to holders of lots adjacent to the street, though the street might be raised several feet above the level of the lot.

Wolfe v. Corington & L. R. Co. 15 B. Mon. 404; Keasy v. Louisville, 4 Dana, 154, 29 Am. Dec. 395; Louisville & F. R. Co. v. Brown, 17 B. Mon. 763.

Section 242 of the Constitution does not change the principle as decided in the above cases, nor was it the intention of the framers of our Constitution that such should be done.

The Constitution provides that the compensation shall be paid before such taking, or shall be paid or secured before such injury or destruction. The appellee by her delay has lost her right to damages.

When an owner dedicates without restriction land for a public street he must be taken to consent that the public authorities may determine grades, and possibly what future changes in grades may be necessary or desirable for the public convenience.

2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 995a, p. 1236.

Messrs. Yeaman & Lockett for appellee.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee brought suit against the city of Henderson, alleging that she was the owner of a lot of land fronting on Center street, and had easy and free access to and use of that street in going to and from her residence; that the appellant, in pursuance of an ordinance of its common council, caused the street to be excavated in front of and adjoining her property, up to the line thereof, to such an extent and depth as to ruin her fence and enclosure, wholly destroying her access to and use of the street, leaving the surface of her lot from 8 to 10 feet above the street and sidewalk, and the entrance to her dwelling barred by a high, perpendicular bank, so that her only ingress and egress is by an alley; that the dwelling is so situated upon the lot that the lot cannot be graded so as to give access to the street, and that to protect the lot from constant caving, which would finally destroy the house, would require the construction of a wall along its whole front, at great expense; that, by notice to the city, delivered to its mayor, she objected to and protested against the excavation before it was made, and gave notice that she would be damaged thereby and would seek to hold the city responsible.

A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and an amendment filed, which, after the answer was filed, and a reply thereto, was withdrawn by the appellee, and the appellant thereupon withdrew its answer and moved to dismiss the petition. The order sustaining the demurrer was set aside and the demurrer overruled. Appellant then filed its answer, and a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict for appellee.

As there is no bill of exceptions, and as the record does not show that the instructions were objected to, the only question presented to this court is the sufficiency of the petition.

Without determining the question whether this petition presents a case of partial destruction of the property by the city, amounting to an invasion of private rights within the rule in the cases of Louisville v. Louisville Rolling Mill Co. 3 Bush, 424, 96 Am. Dec. 243, and Kemper v. Louisville, 14 Bush, 90,—we shall consider whether the rule of Wolfe v. Covington & L. R. Co. 15 B. Mon. 404; Keasy v. Louisville, 4 Dana, 154, 29 Am. Dec. 395; Louisville & F. R. Co. v. Brown, 17 B. Mon. 763, and Newport & C. Bridge Co. v. Foote, 9 Bush, 264, that a municipal corporation has authority to grade or regrade a street for a public purpose without incurring responsibility to the owners of abutting lots, although the street might be raised several feet above the level of the lot, and that the citizen must submit to such incidental disadvantages as resulted therefrom,—has been altered by § 242 of the present Constitution.

The general rule was as stated in 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 990, that "municipal corporations, acting under authority conferred by the 39 L. R. A. legislature to make and repair, or to grade, level, and improve streets, if they keep within the limits of the street, and do not trespass upon or invade private property, and exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of the work resolved upon, are not answerable to the adjoining owner, whose lands are not actually taken, trespassed upon, or invaded, for consequential damages to his premises, unless there is a provision in the Constitution of the state, in the charter of the corporation, or in some statute, creating the liability."

The Constitution of 1860 provided, in § 14 of the Bill of Rights, that no "man's property be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him."

The present Constitution, in addition to the section just quoted, which is contained in § 13 of the Bill of Rights, provides, in § 242: "Municipal and other corporations, and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use, shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by them; which compensation shall be paid before such taking, or paid or secured, at the election of such corporation or individual, before such injury or destruction."

The adoption of this section, in addition to the provisions of § 13, in our view undoubtedly indicated an intention to change the organic law of the state, and to abolish the requirement of direct physical injury to the property in order to establish a claim for damages. The language used is that municipal corporations shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by them. The city undoubtedly has the right to take private property, having the right of eminent domain. It also has the undoubted right to improve the streets for the public use, in proper manner, when thereto authorized by legislative authority. If, however, in making the improvements it takes, injures, or destroys private property, compensation must be made, unless consent has been given.

This exact question appears to have been decided in several of the states in which new Constitutions containing similar provisions have been adopted in recent years. In Illinois, the old Constitution contained a provision similar to that contained in § 13 of our Constitution. By the Constitution of 1870, the provision was made to read: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation;" and, while the rule under the former Constitution had been held as in the section quoted above from Dillon, it has been held in numerous cases that the new rule introduced by the present Constitution required compensation in all cases where it appears "there has been some physical disturbance of a right, either public or private, which the plaintiff enjoys in connection with his property, and which gives to it an additional value, and that by reason of such disturbance he has sustained a special damage with respect to his property in excess of that sustained by the public generally." Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64. It was there held "that the introduction of that word (damage), so far from being superfluous or accidental, indicated a deliberate purpose to make a change in the organic law of the state, and abolished the old test of direct physical injury to the corpus or subject of the property affected."

This doctrine was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, in the case of Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 162, 81 L. ed. 689. Referring to the Rigney Case, he said: "The conclusion there reached was, that under this constitutional provision a recovery may be had in all cases where private property has sustained a substantial damage by the making and using an improvement that is public in its character—that it does not require that the damage shall be caused by a trespass, or an actual physical invasion of the owner's real estate, but if the construction and operation of the railroad or other improvement is the cause of the damage, though consequential, the party may recover. We regard that case as conclusive of this question. The case of Pittsburg, Ft. W. & O. R. Co. v. Reich, 101 Ill. 167, is in point on this question of damages, and the case of Chicago v. Union Bldg. Assn. 102 Ill. 379, 40 Am. Rep. 598, also reviews the authorities and approves the doctrine in Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64."

In Missouri a similar constitutional provision has been adopted, and a similar construction given. See Seehy v. Kansas City Cable R. Co. 94 Mo. 574.

In Pennsylvania a constitutional provision was adopted in 1874 exactly similar to § 242 of our Constitution, which has been construed in New Brighton v. Peirce, 107 Pa. 280, as the provision of the Illinois Constitution.

In a number of other states which have adopted the same or similar constitutional provisions, the courts have gone as far or farther than the Illinois courts in permitting recovery for consequential damages in such cases. See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 990 to 995a, inclusive, and notes.

We conclude that, under the averments of the petition in this case, admitted by the demurrer to be true, there was a right of recovery.

But it is argued on behalf of appellant that there is no legal right or equity in a person who dedicates land for street purposes, or in his assignee, to compensation for the original establishment of a grade line and the reduction of the natural surface of the street for street purposes to such line, for the reason that, when dedicated unconditionally, the dedicant must be supposed to have contemplated and consented that a grade should be established and the inequalities of the surface brought to some proper level, and to have embraced in his grant or dedication the right to establish such a grade. This question, however, is not presented by the record. If the law be that consequential damages are not recoverable for the original establishment of the grade of a street which has been dedicated (and this question is expressly not here decided), the fact that such establishment is original is matter of defense, and such fact does not appear in this record.

It is further urged that certain averments of the answer pleaded as an estoppel are undenied by any reply. It is not necessary to consider the sufficiency of the averments, if they have been denied, as the evidence has not been brought to this court. To the answer originally filed, a reply was filed controverting the affirmative averments. After the amended petition was withdrawn, the answer was also withdrawn by appellant, in order to insist upon a motion for a judgment dismissing the petition. This motion being overruled, and the order sustaining the demurrer having been set aside, the same answer, or a copy of it, was again filed, and it is now contended that those averments are undenied. We do not concur in this contention. While they were a part of the record the averments were traversed, and the fact that they were withdrawn and again filed does not render a second traverse necessary.

A further contention is, that appellee lost her right to compensation by not instituting a suit for an injunction to prevent the injury to her property until the damages to result therefrom had been estimated and paid her. But in response to this it is sufficient to say that the inhibition of the Constitution is not against the citizen, but against the municipality, and forbids the latter from taking, injuring, or destroying property, without previously making compensation therefor. To say that the citizen's right of recovery was barred because the municipality failed to perform its duty would be to permit it to take advantage of its own wrong.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

The words "heir or heirs" in Gen. Laws 1877, p. 343, giving to the heirs a right of action for death if there be no husband or wife cover damages for alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's uncle. Reversed.

Statement by Goddard, J.:

This is an action brought in behalf of Catherine M. Holt by C. J. Burns, her guardian ad litem, against J. B. Hindry, to recover damages for the death of Thomas Holt, her uncle. The right to such recovery is predicated upon the following facts: On October 6, 1893, Thomas Holt, an unmarried man, thirty-eight years of age, was employed by J. B. Hindry, the defendant, as a common laborer, and while engaged under his direction in excavating a sewer trench in North Denver, the ground caved in upon him, causing his death. He died intestate, leaving surviving him Catherine M. Holt, a daughter of his deceased brother, an infant five years of age, as his only heir. From November, 1890, to September, 1892, he resided in the city of Denver with Catherine and her mother, and contributed almost entirely to her support, furnished her clothing, and the provisions and necessities for the family. In September, 1892, plaintiff and her mother moved away from the city of Denver, and from that time until his death he continued to support plaintiff, sending money to her mother for that purpose; and, if he had survived he would have continued to support, educate, and maintain her. The cause was tried to a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for $4,500. To reverse this judgment, defendant, Hindry, prosecutes this appeal.

Messrs. George W. Miller, Daniel Sayer, and John H. Reddin, for appellant:

Although the appellee may be a niece of the deceased Thomas Holt, she is not an heir of the said Thomas Holt within the meaning of the statute under which this action is brought, and consequently is not entitled to sue or recover damages in this action under said statute by reason of his death, and the court had no jurisdiction to render judgment herein.

The word "heir," often has a special and restricted signification, and is controlled by the context in which it is used, and it would seem when used by the legislature in furtherance of the humane purpose of making whole and compensating the families of persons killed by accident that it should be interpreted to mean lineal descendants, and confined to sons and daughters and their descendants in a direct line instead of collateral issue.

There should be no encouragement to foster an avarice that seeks to make misfortunes of this character the vehicles to transport good fortune and undeserved favors to remote relatives, and to claim such an application for the law is a diversion from its intent and purposes, and it is safe to say the statute in question was never passed for that purpose.

This statute was adopted by our legislature from Missouri.

Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Farrow, 6 Colo. 506.

The supreme court of Missouri, in Coover v. Moore, 81 Mo. 574, held that the statute must be strictly construed, and that only such persons as are specifically granted the right under the statute can recover.

The word "heir," as used in our statute, was 89 L. R. A.

intended by the legislature to mean a child of the deceased, and can in no event be extended to collateral relatives, and we propose to show this from the context of the act itself and by analogy.

The damages given must be in reference solely to the pecuniary loss which, however, may be evidenced by proof of a reasonable expectation of a pecuniary benefit as of right or otherwise from a continuance of life.

Bourke v. Cork & M. R. Co. Ir. L. R. 4 C. L. 685, 10 Cent. L. J. 48.

The object of all these statutes is to provide actual compensation to those persons who have sustained a pecuniary loss, and not any other kind of a loss, such as a loss of affection, or by grief or like matters.

Jordan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 89 Ky. 40.

Messrs. Cayless & Brown, for appellee:

In Jordan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 89 Ky. 40, it is stated: "However, we do not deem it necessary to refer at length to the construction that has been given to statutes of other states, as they, with some exceptions, differ materially from § 8, chap. 57, Gen. Stat. For it will be observed that section is unlike them, as well as the English statute, in the following particulars: 1. In none of them is the right to maintain the action given to the widow and heir. 2. The cause of action provided for by § 8 is for destruction of life by wilful neglect only. 3. In no other statute is the right to recover punitive damages in express terms given. 4. Unlike some other statute, § 8 gives the right to sue persons as well as companies, for the cause therein mentioned."

Brothers and sisters can maintain an action for damages under our statute.

Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Wilson, 12 Colo. 20.

Goddard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Among the many objections raised by the specifications of error, we deem it necessary to notice the one only which challenges the right of appellee to maintain the action, since, in our opinion, this question is decisive of the case. No right of action for damages resulting from death through wrongful act or negligence was given by the common law, and such right exists only by virtue of our statute. Gen. Laws 1877, p. 348; Mills's Ann. Stat. chap. 37. This statute gives the right of action, and designates the party or parties who may sue for recovery of damages in cases of this kind, and classifies them as follows: First, husband or wife of deceased; second, if there be no husband or wife, or he or she fails to sue within one year after such death, then by the heir or heirs of deceased; third, if such deceased be a minor, or unmarried, then by the father or mother, who may join in the suit, and each shall have an equal interest in the judgment, or, if either of them be dead, then by the survivor. Though similar in its general features to the original English statute (9 & 10 Vict. chap. 93), known as "Lord Campbell's act," and the statutes on this subject generally adopted in this country, it will be seen that our act differs from all of them in its designation of the parties that may sue. Most of them provide that the action may be brought by the personal representatives of the deceased, for the benefit of his widow and next of kin, while by the terms of our statute the right to sue is vested, in the first instance, in the surviving husband or wife, to the exclusion of all others; and the existence of the right in the second class named is wholly dependent upon the fact that there be neither husband nor wife surviving, or that he or she shall have waived the right by failing to sue in the time prescribed; thus evincing an intention on the part of the lawmaking power to confer this new right of action upon the second class only in the event the decedent at the time of death was, or had been, a married person, and should leave surviving lineal descendants. This is made more manifest by the third subdivision, whereby the right of action is exclusively given to the father and mother in case the deceased was a minor, or unmarried. By construing the words "heir or heirs," as used in the second subdivision, to mean "child or children," the purpose of this character of legislation is carried out, which is to compensate those who suffer pecuniary loss by reason of the death. While, on the other hand, if the words "heir or heirs" are to be construed as meaning all those who, under the statute of descents and distributions, would be entitled to inherit, then collateral kindred, however remote, who would derive no pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of deceased, as well as the direct descendants, may maintain the action,—a result wholly inconsistent with the plain purport and object of the statute. And furthermore, such construction would render the third subdivision wholly useless and unnecessary, since the father and mother would, by our act of descents and distributions, be the heirs in case the deceased was a minor, or unmarried, and consequently included within the class of beneficiaries described in the second subdivision. In order, therefore, to give consistency and effect to all of the foregoing provisions, and to carry out the beneficent purpose of the statute, the words "heir or heirs," as used in the second subdivision, must be held to be synonymous with "child or children." In Jordan v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 89 Ky. 40, the supreme court of Kentucky had under consideration the meaning to be given to the word "heir" as used in their statute, which provided that the "widow, heir, or personal representative" of the deceased should have the right to sue; and it was held that it should be so limited as to mean "child," and not extended so as to include collateral kindred of the deceased. Lewis, Ch. J., in speaking for the court, says: "The word 'heir' cannot, according to its 'peculiar and appropriate meaning in the law,' be used in relation to damages recoverable under the section, being applicable to real estate of inheritance, and not to personality. It must therefore be interpreted to mean either distributee or child. To make it mean distributee would, it seems to us, be contrary to the reason and purpose of the law, which was intended to give redress, reparation, or compensation to those only who are injured pecuniarily by the loss or destruction of the life of husband and father." To the same effect are Henderson v. Kentucky C. R. Co. 86 Ky. 389; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Adam, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 833. The case of Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. v. Wilson, 12 Colo. 20, is relied on as recognizing the right of brothers and sisters of the deceased to maintain an action under this statute. That was an action brought by the parents to recover damages for the death of an unmarried son, and the question as to the right of collateral kindred to maintain the action was in no way involved; and, moreover, the language used, aside from being mere dictum, is found in a quotation from the case of Chicago v. Keefe, 114 Ill. 322, 55 Am. Rep. 860, cited in support of a different proposition. The case, therefore, is not an authority for the rule claimed by appellee. Our conclusion is that the words "heir or heirs," as here used, do not include all those entitled to share in the estate of a person dying intestate, under our statute of descents and distributions, but were intended to mean "child or children," and limit the right of action to lineal descendants of the deceased. In this case the deceased had never been married, and had no children. Under such circumstances, the right of action is given, as we have seen, exclusively to the father and mother. This, in itself, precludes the plaintiff from maintaining the action. The judgment of the District Court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the action.

mination of that question is not a denial of due process of law when made on a written complaint and affidavit to the fact of insanity, but it is clearly within the police power of the state, and is for the restraint of a dangerous person in an emergency.

2. A proceeding for a hearing as to the insanity of a person is pending after a written complaint alleging the insanity is presented to the judge, as required by Pub. Acts 1880, p. 88, and supported by an affidavit of a physician.

3. A temporary provisional order for the custody of a person alleged to be insane pending a hearing of the question as to his insanity is not an adjudication, and is not void on its face because it fails to recite the affidavit of a physician on which it was based or the fact that proceedings for a hearing as to the sanity were then pending.

4. Evidence of acts of an agent of a defendant cannot be given under allegations of the performance of such acts by the defendant.
5. Testimony that the members of a club considered a certain paper one of the strongest they had read before them is incompetent as hearsay.
6. Testimony of a defendant that he did not instruct his counsel in the matter, but that he acted altogether on the advice of the counsel, is admissible where he is charged with acting maliciously in making a complaint on which a hearing as to the insanity of another person was based.
7. The rejection of a hypothetical question involving assumptions concerning which no evidence has been offered is not ground of error.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover damages for alleged conspiracy to defraud plaintiff of his property and false imprisonment in execution thereof. Affirmed.

The complaint charged that defendants conspired together to obtain from plaintiff a very large sum of money, and, to effect that result, purporting to act under Public Acts 1889, chap. 162, they made a false and malicious complaint against him before the judge of probate in the district of Stamford, representing that he was insane and unfit to go at large. That an order was obtained committing plaintiff to the custody of two of the defendants, where he remained for three months and until more than $100,000 in money had been extorted from him.

The defense was that Schuyler Merritt one of the defendants, acting in good faith, and fully believing that plaintiff was an insane person, made an application to said court praying it to inquire into the alleged insanity of plaintiff. This application was supported by an affidavit of plaintiff's family physician stating that in his opinion plaintiff was insane and unfit to go at large. The court made an order for a hearing, and directed that notice thereof be served on plaintiff. It was further ordered that, pending the proceedings, the custody of plaintiff be committed to Richard Bolster and Henry E. Schock, two of the defendants. The order of notice was served on the plaintiff, and immediately afterwards the committee began to exercise suitable and proper restraint over him. On December 19, 1893, plaintiff obtained a writ of habeas corpus from the superior court of Fairfield county to obtain his release. That court found that the probate court had jurisdiction of the matter, and remanded petitioner to custody, from which decree he appealed. On the same 19th day of December, 1893, plaintiff's minor children prayed the probate court for the appointment of a conservator over the plaintiff. On December 21, 1893, plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain defendants from interfering with his books and papers. On January 2, 1894, persons interested in the trust estate in plaintiff's possession brought suit to prevent his wasting property belonging to said estate. On February 21, 1894, all the parties interested in the various suits made and entered into an agreement which became known in the case as the "Family agreement." Defendants claimed that by their performance of the terms of that agreement all the claims of plaintiff in this suit were fully and finally adjusted. Plaintiff claimed that the agreement was made under duress.

The court found as facts that defendant Merritt, who had married plaintiff's wife's sister had been on intimate terms with plaintiff, and later with his family. That after consulting counsel and acting on his advice, he filed the application for an inquiry into plaintiff's sanity. That the court relying on the physician's affidavit accompanying the application, issued the preliminary order for plaintiff's custody. That the order for hearing was served on plaintiff and afterwards the order for custody was presented, and plaintiff under advice of his counsel obeyed it. That the acts of defendants Bolster and Schock, complained of, were performed by them as officers of the law, in execution of and under and within the authority of the order, in good faith, and in full belief of its validity. That none of their acts were done as agents for the other defendants unless the law implied agency from the facts found. That pending the proceedings plaintiff's counsel, Judge Stoddard, made suggestions to the opposing counsel for a settlement. Through the efforts which he and other friends brought to bear upon plaintiff and his appeals to defendants the family agreement which was prepared by Judge Stoddard himself was signed and executed. That said agreement was executed by plaintiff under the advice of his friends and counsel and without any influence having been brought to bear upon him by the adverse parties. That it was understood that said agreement should accomplish a full and final settlement of all existing differences between the parties, and of all the legal proceedings then pending, and of all matters arising out of such proceedings. Immediately after the execution of the agreement all pending proceedings were withdrawn and the restraint exercised over plaintiff terminated. That Merritt alone was responsible for the institution of the proceedings before the judge of probate and that he acted in good faith.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Earliiss P. Arvine, Robert E. De Forest, and Stiles Judson, Jr., for appellant:

The court of probate had no jurisdiction to issue the order of custody.

Where the count is of limited and special jurisdiction the warrant must set forth affirmatively and clearly all facts necessary to show that it was legally constituted and had jurisdiction.

Brooks v. Adams, 11 Pick. 441; Hall v. Howd, 10 Conn. 519, 27 Am. Dec. 696; Sears v. Terry, 26 Conn. 285; Grimond v. Raymond, 1 Conn. 46, 6 Am. Dec. 200.

The jurisdiction of the probate court did not appear upon the face of the warrant by which plaintiff was taken into custody.

The fact of insanity in one case, and the fact of death in the other, can never be conclusively determined by these special statutory tribunals, in order to support their decrees and judgments.

Shelton v. Hadlock, 62 Conn. 143; Willett's Appeal, 50 Conn. 330; Culver's Appeal, 48 Conn. 173; Olmstead's Appeal, 43 Conn. 123; First Nat. Bank v. Balcom, 35 Conn. 351; Dickinson v. Hayes, 81 Conn. 422; Sears v. Terry, 26 Conn. 232; Brown v. Lanman, 1 Conn. 469; McFeely v. Scott, 123 Mass. 16; Jochumsen v. Suffolk Sav. Bank, 3 Allen, 87.

The legal "pendency" of the application only began with its service upon the alleged lunatic. The finding shows that such service had not been made when this order of custody was issued, and therefore the proceedings were not "pending" in legal contemplation.

Taylor v. Judd, 41 Conn. 435; Studwell v. Cooke, 38 Conn. 551; Elting Woolen Co. v. Williams, 36 Conn. 319; Sanford v. Dick, 17 Conn. 216; Spalding v. Butts, 6 Conn. 29; Jencks v. Phelps, 4 Conn. 152; Spice v. Steinruck, 14 Ohio St. 214.

The mere issuing of a summons is not the commencement of an action for general purposes.

Kerr v. Mount, 28 N. Y. 664.

The acts authorized by chap. 162, Pub. Acts 1899, are in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, and the statute is unconstitutional.

The proceedings which were had in this case were inquisitorial and ex parte. They cannot be authorized by the legislature, and the statute must be construed as impliedly requiring notice, or it must be declared invalid.

The court having been without jurisdiction at the time the order of custody was made and issued, the defendants Ritch and Merritt, having procured such order, are trespassers.

Prince v. Thomas, 11 Conn. 472; Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 258; Parsons v. Loyd, 8 Wils. 345; 2 Addison, Torts, p. 810; Kerr v. Mount, 28 N. Y. 664; Hayden v. Shed, 11 Mass. 503; Williams v. Smith, 14 C. B. N. S. 620; Moody v. Bibb, 50 Ala. 247; Look v. Choate, 108 Mass. 116.

The defendants Bolster and Schock are also liable as trespassers, for the reason that the order which they undertook to serve was not regular on its face, the jurisdictional requisites not affirmatively appearing upon the face of the warrant.

The officer serving a precept must at his peril observe the absence of such jurisdictional facts.

Bowler v. Eldredge, 18 Conn. 13; Elliott v. Peirsol, 26 U. S. 1 Pet. 340, 7 L. ed. 170; 2 Addison, Torts, 803; Cutler v. Wadsworth, 7 Conn. 10; Colt v. Eves, 12 Conn. 258; *Grumon v. The defendants Bolster and Schock became trespassers, even if this order of custody is found to be regular and valid by reason of their abuse of legal process, and in going beyond the precept of the order of custody, in the character of the imprisonment maintained.

Osgood v. Carver, 43 Conn. 29; Wilcox v. Gladwin, 50 Conn. 81; Mussey v. Cahoon, 84 Me. 74; Colby v. Jackson, 12 N. H. 526; *McGough v. All who command, advise, or countenance the commission of a tort by another, or who approve of it after it is done, are liable, if done for their benefit, in the same manner as if they had done the tort with their own hands.

2 Hilliard, Torts, p. 293.

The defendants Ritch and Merritt are liable to malicious prosecution because they proceeded maliciously in legal contemplation.

The fact that Mr. Merritt, acting in co-operation with Louis to accomplish certain ulterior objects, advised with counsel as to the legal mode for placing Mr. Porter under restraint, upon the pretext that after a lapse of six years since his apoplectic attack, they had suddenly discovered evidence of insanity, and that immediate physical restraint was necessary, is not in any sense a defense to the charge of bad faith.

Brewer v. Jacobs, 22 Fed. Rep. 218; Grundy v. Crescent News & Hotel Co. 88 La. Ann. 974; Lytton v. Baird, 95 Ind. 849; Roy v. Goings, 112 Ill. 657; Wild v. Odell, 56 Cal. 137; 2 Addison, Torts, p. 746; Sharpe v. Johnston, 76 Mo. 668.

If Merritt in bad faith made the complaint to the court of probate, he became liable for the consequences flowing from such complaint.

Goodrich v. Warner, 21 Conn. 482; Coffey v. Myers, 84 Ind. 105; Walsler v. Thies, 56 Mo. 89; Green v. Cochran, 48 Iowa, 545; Shattuck v. Bill, 142 Mass. 61.

He neglected and refused to withdraw his complaint, or to report to the court the fact that he had discovered that Mr. Porter was being held a prisoner upon a false statement of the facts in his case, or in any manner to have Mr. Porter released from the imprisonment now admitted to be false.

If this prosecution was not originally malicious, it became malicious as a proposition of law at this stage in the proceedings.

2 Addison, Torts, p. 747.

It is not necessary to show that the defendant Ritch was actively engaged in the initiatory steps, or that he joined with Mr. Merritt in applying for the order for Mr. Porter's custody. It is sufficient "that they advised and consulted together, and both participated in the prosecution, which was carried on under their countenance and approval.

Vinal v. Core, 18 W. Va. 3.

What was done was done in the furtherance of a common design. The whole course of conduct of the defendants, taken together, furnishes satisfactory proof of that fact.

State v. Spalding, 19 Conn. 237, 48 Am. Dec. 158; Knower v. Cadden Clothing Co. 57 Conn. 223; Stephen, Malicious Prosecution, p. 85; Pollock, Torts, p. 208.

This "family agreement" being an agreement by which Mr. Porter divested himself of a large estate in favor of other contracting parties, who sustained confidential relations to him, the burden of proving its validity, fairness, and integrity is upon these defendants.

Nichols v. McCarthy, 53 Conn. 317, 55 Am. Rep. 105.

Aside from this feature of the case, the burden is upon defendants from the fact that it is a special defense.

Taylor v. Atwood, 47 Conn. 506.

The real question is: Did Mr. Porter act as a free and voluntary agent in divesting himself of his property in order to secure his liberation?

Walbridge v. Arnold, 21 Conn. 430.

There may be a species of duress, although the imprisonment is by lawful process.

Watkins v. Baird, 6 Mass. 506, 4 Am. Dec. 170; Downing v. Ely, 125 Mass. 369.

The question was whether the contracting party was "under pressure to such an extent as to be deprived of free agency."

Mills v. Swords Lumber Co. 63 Conn. 105.

Where the circumstances give one an unfair advantage, and an agreement is executed under an immense pressure which those circumstances produce, the contracting party will not be considered as a free and voluntary agent.

Where there is an arrest for improper purposes without just cause, or an arrest for a just cause but without lawful authority, or an arrest for a just cause and under lawful authority for an improper purpose, and the person arrested pays money for his enlargement, he may be considered as having paid the money by duress of imprisonment.

Even where the duress is not of the person, but only a wrongful detention of property, equity will protect the person imposed on, especially when the act sought to be avoided was to prevent irreparable mischief.

It is immaterial whether the facts which prompt the settlement and constitute the duress, were communicated to the person imprisoned by the prosecutors of the legal proceedings or by some other person, who had secured from them the knowledge of their intentions in respect to the prosecution of the complaint.

Taylor v. Jaques, 106 Mass. 291; Schultz v. Catlin, 78 Wis. 611.

The question is whether, under the circumstances, the agreement was so voluntarily made as to be binding.

Cumming v. Ince, 11 Q. B. 112.

There was nothing that belonged to these defendants at the date of the execution of the agreement except the oppressive power that they were unconscionably exercising, and that the law does not require us to restore to them.

Messrs. Samuel Fessenden and Goodwin Stoddard, for appellees:

In civil and criminal actions before hearing had, and even without notice given, alleged trespassers, or criminal offenders, are taken into custody pending the hearing to be had.

These acts are not in violation of the Constitution, as they are in no case final, but only preliminary orders, and necessary in the due enforcement of law and justice, as the order in the present case was called for, and the provision in the statute enacted for the protection of life and property.

Pendency by force of statute dates from the application.

If an ordinary civil suit could be brought by application to the superior court, and it was the mode of procedure for the court then to issue a summons for the defendant to come in and answer, the suit would be pending before services.

Whether the action of the plaintiff was induced by duress of the defendants was a question of fact.

2 Bishop, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 552; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 43-84; 6 Wait, Act. & Def. 661.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There is quite a long list of reasons of appeal, but it will not be necessary to consider them in detail. They are only an expansion of the claims made by the plaintiff at the trial, and these may all be disposed of by considering a few general propositions. If the act of 1889 was constitutional, especially that part of it which is relied on to support the order made by the judge of probate in Stamford on the 18th day of December, 1893, and if the law is so that the proceeding was pending at the time that order was made and the order was not void on its face, and if there was no error in the rulings on the evidence, or if the causes of action were discharged by the "family agreement," then there is no material error on which the appellant is entitled to have a new trial. Everything else is included in the finding of facts.

At its January session, 1889, the legislature passed "An Act Concerning Insane Persons" (Pub. Acts 1889, p. 88), which enacted that "any judge of a probate court within his probate district shall have power to commit any insane person residing in said district to an asylum in this state in the manner hereinafter provided," and that, "except when otherwise specially provided by law, no person shall be committed or admitted to an asylum without an order signed by a judge of probate, as hereinafter provided." The act then proceeded to details, and enacted that "whenever any person in this state shall be insane, or shall be supposed to be insane, any person may make complaint in writing to any judge of probate within whose district the person complained of shall reside, alleging that such person is insane and is a fit subject to be confined in an asylum, and when any insane person, who ought to be confined, shall go at large in any town, any person may, and the selectmen thereof shall, make a like complaint to the judge of probate within whose district such town is included. After receiving said complaint, the judge of probate to whom it is made shall forthwith appoint a time, not later than ten days after the receipt of said complaint, and a place within said district, for a hearing upon said complaint, and shall cause reasonable notice thereof to be given," etc. The act also specifies many other details to be observed by the judge of probate in respect to such hearing, for adjournments, for the certificate of physician, what shall be done in case the person complained of is found to be insane, and in its 6th section says: "Pending the proceedings for a hearing and examination, said judge may make and enforce such reasonable orders for the care and custody of the person complained of as said judge shall deem suitable and proper." The complaint made to the judge of probate for the district of Stamford concerning the plaintiff was made under this legislation, and the proceedings were pursuant to its provisions. There is a general claim by the plaintiff's counsel that the whole act is unconstitutional. It is, however, so obviously within the power of the legislature to make provisions for insane persons, and for their commitment to and confinement in an asylum for treatment and care, that we suppose counsel intend to attack this act no further than the provision respecting the care and custody of the person complained of pending the proceedings is an essential feature of it.

It is strenuously insisted that so much of the act as is relied on to justify the order given to Bolster and Schock is unconstitutional, for the reason that it may, as in this case it is claimed that it did, deprive a person of his liberty without due course of law. That constitutional provision is invoked which says that no person shall be deprived of his life, his liberty, or his property without the due course of law. Nothing can well be dearer to the law than the right of each person to his life, his liberty, and his property. For more than 600 years the law has been zealous and astute to protect these rights. The words of Magna Charta, which declare that every person shall be protected in the enjoyment of his life, his liberty, and his property, except as they might be declared to be forfeited by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land, furnish the rule. In some form of words this principle is now found in every one of the American Constitutions. No one does, or can, deny its binding force. But constitutional provisions, however often repeated, do not give to anyone an absolute estate in even these high privileges, which he can enjoy to the exclusion of others. These privileges must be enjoyed with just limitations,—with such limitations as are necessary to make their enjoyment by each consistent with the like enjoyment by all. The right of all is superior to the right of any one. These limitations are not deprivations of the right. They are regulations, so that no one person can insist on the right to the enjoyment of any one of these privileges, to the exclusion or the infringement of the right of any other person to the like enjoyment. The taking of life itself by a private person, and without warrant, may sometimes be justified. One may lawfully kill an assailant, if necessary to save his own life, or the life of his wife or children. Morris v. Platt, 32 Conn. 75. A burglar who in the night season, is attempting to break into a dwelling, may be killed, if his attempt can be frustrated in no other way. A husband or father who finds one attempting to commit rape on his wife or daughter may lawfully kill him to prevent the crime. 4 Bl. Com. 179, 180. Examples of this sort of regulation are more often found in the laws and ordinances which apply to property than elsewhere. Among them are the very many statutes and regulations which concern the use of property. The constitutional provision just stated has never been regarded as incompatible with the principle, equally vital, being essential to the permanent safety of society, that all property is held subject to the power of the state to regulate the use by the owner when that use is found to be injurious to the community. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 628, 665, 81 L. ed. 205, 211; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 32, 24 L. ed. 989, 991; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53. There are many cases in which the rights to the use of property must be exercised subservient to the public welfare. The maxim of the law is that a private mischief is to be endured rather than a public inconvenience. On this ground rest the rights of public necessity. Thus, if a common highway be out of repair, a passenger may lawfully go through an adjoining private inclosure. So it is lawful to raze houses to the ground to prevent the spreading of a conflagration, without being responsible in trespass or otherwise. Russell v. New York, 2 Denio, 461. There are many other like conditions. See 12 Coke, 13, 63; Maleverer v. Spinks, 1 Dyer, 366; Vin. Abr. title Necessity; 2 Kent, Com. 383; British East India Co. v. Meredith, 4 T. R. 794, 797; Respublica v. Sparhawk, 1 U. S. 1 Dall. 357, 363, 1 L. ed. 174, 177; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349; Cooley, Const. Lim. 739. So, too, public nuisances may be abated by anyone who is injured thereby. Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262; Wood, Nuisances, 768. To the same rule the vindication of our law that the property of a defendant in a civil suit may be attached on mesne process, and held till final judgment, must be referred. The various rules and statutes authorizing these limitations to the rights of property owners have always been regarded as police regulations, although they curtail it owner's use in some degree, and not unconstitutionally.

The right to personal liberty ought, perhaps, to be regarded as on a higher plane than the right of property; but the constitutional protection to one is precisely the same as to the other. The right to enjoy liberty is always limited by the duty which requires everyone to use his liberty in such a way as not to be detrimental to the public. There are many cases in which a man may be restrained of his liberty by anyone and without warrant. It is justifiable "if a man hold another to restrain him from mischief." Comyns' Dig. Battery, A. In Gleever v. Hynde, 1 Mod. 168, a private person without a warrant removed one who was disturbing a funeral service. His action was justified. In Hall v. Planner, 1 Lev. 196, the church warden removed the hat from the head of one who refused to uncover his head during divine service in a church on Sunday. This was held to be justifiable. In Hancock v. Baker, 2 Bos. & P. 260, the defendant broke and entered into the house of the plaintiff to prevent him from murdering his wife. This was justified. A person dwelling in a house infected by any contagious disease may be required by a constable to keep within his house, and if he disregard such command it may be enforced by a watchman, and if any hurt ensue by such enforcement the watchmen are thereby indemnified. 4 Bl. Com. 161. The health officer of a city may confine one who has been exposed to the smallpox to prevent the spread of that disease. Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264. "A private person may, without an express warrant, confine a person disordered in his mind, who seems disposed to do mischief to himself or any other person." Bacon, Abr. Trespass, D. p. 469. "It is universally conceded that every man for his own protection may restrain the violence of a lunatic, and anyone may, at least temporarily, place any lunatic under personal restraint, whose going at large is dangerous to others." Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 108. Clearly, this may be done as preliminary to the institution of judicial proceedings, by which a judgment for a permanent confinement may be obtained. 6 Southern Law Rev. Law, p. 112; Cooley, Torts, 179; Com., Draper v. Kirkbridge, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 393; Van Deusen v. Newcomer, 40 Mich. 90. "The right to restrain an insane person of his liberty is found in that great law of humanity, which makes it necessary to confine those whose going at large would be dangerous to themselves or others. In the delirium of a fever, or in the case of a person seized with a fit, unless this were the law, no one could be restrained against his will. And the necessity which creates the law creates the limitation of the law. In the case of an application to have a guardian appointed over the person and estate of an insane person, under the statute, some time must necessarily elapse before the appointment can be made, and during that time restraint may be necessary. If there is no right to exercise that restraint for a fortnight, there is no right to exercise it for an hour. And if a man may be restrained in his own house, he may be restrained in a suitable asylum, under the same limitations and rules. Private institutions for the insane have been in use, and sanctioned by the courts; not established by any positive law, but by the great law of necessity and humanity. Their existence was known and acknowledged at the time the Constitution was adopted. The provisions of the Constitution in relation to this subject must be taken with such limitations and must bear such construction, as arise out of the circumstances of the case." Chief Justice Shaw, in Re Oakes (Mass.) 8 Law Rep. 122, 124.

Limitations to the use of property, or to the personal liberty of another, in the different classes of cases to which the instances we have cited may be referred, have always been held not to infringe the constitutional provision now invoked. In none of them is there any deprivation of the right, but only its just regulation. These limitations serve to prevent such a use by one of his property or of his liberty as takes away from others their equal right to the use of their own. One who is prevented from injuring another cannot justly assert that he has himself been deprived of any right. An insane person, whose going at large is dangerous to others or to himself, and who is restrained, cannot maintain that he has been deprived of any right, or that he has suffered any injury. In most of the cases cited the act placing a restriction upon the liberty of another was by a private person, and the act has been held to be justified. But a private person can act only in an emergency, and then only at his peril,—the peril of being unable to prove the existence of the emergency which is his justification. Restrictive conditions of this kind upon the liberty or the use of property are sometimes absolutely necessary to the safety of all. A wise administration of government does not leave it to private persons to decide when these restrictions shall be exercised. Private persons may not be willing to take the hazard, and so statutes are passed which directly name or authorize a municipal board to appoint someone to judge of the emergency and direct the performance of those acts which any individual might do at his peril without any statute. Such a one is the agent of the law, and incurs no personal liability. Statutes of this kind, and in many states, have been upheld, and, so far as we know, without exception. Raymond v. Fish, 51 Conn. 80, 50 Am. Rep. 8; Dunham v. New Britain, 55 Conn. 378; Russell v. New York, 2 Denio. 461; Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262; Doe v. Schultz, 47 Barb. 64; Taunton v. Taylor, 116 Mass. 254; Train v. Boston Disinfecting Co. 144 Mass. 523, 59 Am. Rep. 113; Ex parte Shrader, 33 Cal. 279; Harrison v. Baltimore, 1 Gill, 264; Cooley, Const. Lim. 720, 721. That part of the 6th section of the act of 1889 under which the judge of probate acted is a statute of this kind. It named the judge of probate in each district as the agent of the law to decide whether such conditions existed as made it necessary to confine a person supposed to be insane for a temporary period. It does not violate any constitutional provision. It is clearly within the police power of the state.

The statute authorizes the judge to make reasonable orders for the custody of the person complained of, "pending the proceedings for a hearing and examination." If we should assume that this language did not authorize the order made on the 18th of December upon the mere presentation of the complaint, it clearly did not authorize the order as modified and confirmed on the 22d of that month, after a full hearing of all parties. The action of the judge upon the hearing was at least equivalent, so far as concerns the defendants Bolster and Schock, to the order of that day. We might, therefore, deem it immaterial to pass upon the validity of the order when first issued, —not because it could only affect the claim for damages for the unlawful custody from the 18th to the 21st, but because the statute under which it arises has since been altered, and the claim for damages, if valid, has been discharged by the family agreement.

It is further claimed that the order to Bolster and Schock was void for the reason that no proceeding for a hearing was pending at the time it was made. The "proceeding" was the application to the court of probate to have Mr. Porter declared insane and a fit person to be confined in some suitable asylum. This application was made to the court on the 18th day of December, 1893. With this application there was also presented to the court the affidavit of Dr. Geib that in his opinion Mr. Porter was insane, and liable at any time to do injury to himself or others. The court of probate thereupon made an order fixing the time for a hearing on the application, together with an order of notice to be given to Mr. Porter, and immediately thereafter, and before the same was served on Mr. Porter, issued the said order to Bolster and Schock. It appears that Bolster and Schock did not attempt to enter upon their duties under the said order to them until after service of the said application and order of notice had been made on Mr. Porter, so that the "proceeding for a hearing" was pending at all times while they were exercising any care or control of the plaintiff. But the argument is that the said order for care and control was void, for the reason that the proceeding was not pending at the moment that order was made service on Mr. Porter not then having been made. The argument depends on the case of Jencks v. Phelps, 4 Conn. 149, and the several cases in later reports which follow that one. It was held in that case that an "action" was not commenced till service had been made on the defendant. It was said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Cohens v. Virginia, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 264, 407, 5 L. ed. 257, 291, that an action or suit is the prosecution of some demand in a court of justice. An "action," then, requires two parties, —one who prosecutes the demand, and the other against whom the demand is prosecuted, —and something sought to be obtained by the former of the latter. In this sense it is no more than just that an action shall not be deemed to be commenced, so as to affect the defendant, until service has been made upon him. This is what was done in Jencks v. Phelps. It seems to us that the proceeding before the court of probate in the district of Stamford on the 18th day of December, 1893, was not an "action," in the sense in which that word was there used, and that the rule of Jencks v. Phelps does not apply. There were no parties; there was no demand, —nothing sought to be recovered by one against another. It is obvious that the definition of an "action," given by Chief Justice Marshall does not include, and was not intended to include, proceedings or actions in rem, nor proceedings in the nature of an inquest of office, and other like proceedings. By the said act of 1889 the judge of probate is made an agent of the law to decide whether or not a person complained of was insane and ought to be committed to an asylum. The judge was to act on the complaint in writing of any person; but the person complaining did not thereby become a party to the proceeding. The statute requires the judge of probate to give notice of the time and place of hearing to the party complaining, as much as it does to the party complained of. At no time in the progress of the inquiry is there any "action" pending in the court, nor are there any "parties," in the sense that these words are used in the case of Jencks v. Phelps. The proceeding was the inquiry by the court as to the sanity or insanity of the person complained of. It was an inquest of insanity. It was in the nature of a police regulation, for the care and restraint of a person insane or supposed to be insane. The proceeding was commenced when the court received the written complaint. So far as the court of probate was concerned, the proceeding was then pending. Any proceeding once commenced in any court in the regular way is pending in the court until it is in some way terminated. Webster, Dict. Until it is terminated the proceeding is in suspense; it is depending. Wentworth v. Farmington, 48 N. H. 207; Littlefield v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 8 Cliff. 371. Our own case of Huntington v. McMahon, 48 Conn. 174, shows clearly what the term "pending" means when applied to a court. Complaint had been made to a justice of the peace in the town of Winchester for the condemnation of certain liquors. The liquors had been seized, notice was given, and a hearing was had before the justice, at which certain parties appeared who claimed to be the owners of the liquors. The justice condemned the liquors to be destroyed. The owners took an appeal to the district court, and the liquors were committed to the keeping of a person named by the justice. The next day, or within a day or two, the owners brought a replevin for the liquors, and took them out of the possession of the person so named as the keeper. The case cited was an application to the said district court by the state's attorney that all the persons concerned in the action for replevin be punished for contempt of that court. On the hearing of the contempt proceedings, one claim made by the parties was that there could be no contempt of the district court, for the reason that the appeal was not pending in that court at the time the replevin was served. This court held that the appeal was pending in the district court as soon as the appeal was regularly taken from and allowed by the justice court, although it was long before the return day to the district court, and although it appeared that the appeal papers had not been filed with the clerk of that court, and that they had not even been made out by the justice, and that the bringing and serving of replevin was a contempt of the district court. We are of the opinion that the proceeding for a hearing was pending at the time the order to Bolster and Schock was issued.

The plaintiff argues that the order given by the judge of probate to Bolster and Schock was void on its face, and cites largely from authorities to sustain his claims. We are not able to agree with the plaintiff. It seems to us that he misjudges the character of that order. It is not a judgment. It is a temporary order, provisional, issued only as a precaution to provide against an emergency deemed liable to arise,—an order in its nature interlocutory, rather than final. It is a part of the procedure, and does not enter into the judgment or decree. It is not an adjudication. It is true that this order does not recite the affidavit of Dr. Geib, nor does it recite the fact that proceedings for a hearing as to the sanity of Mr. Porter were then pending. But the superior court could not shut from its eyes, nor can this court, the fact, which the record of the probate court discloses, that that court had that affidavit before it at the time this order was issued, and acted on it, nor that the proceedings for the hearing were at that time actually pending. To be sure, the order committed the plaintiff to the care and custody of the persons named; but it was not an order of commitment in execution, and therefore was not to be construed with the same strictness as are final orders. Rex v. Gourlay, 7 Barn. & C. 669. It was not void. In the case of Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262, an order was made by the board of health of that city declaring certain premises to be a nuisance, and ordering the same to be abated, because of the Asiatic cholera then prevailing in this city; and thereupon the mayor pulled the house down. The order was sustained, although it did not appear that it had ever been reduced to writing, or recorded, except by way of recital in an ordinance by the board.

During the trial the plaintiff offered evidence of certain acts done by one Thoms, on the ground that Thoms had been deputed by Bolster to do those acts. The defendants objected to this evidence, for the reason that the complaint did not charge the defendants with doing anything by their agent. The court sustained the objection. This ruling was in accordance with the rules established under the practice act. Prac. Book, p. 14, rule 3, § 1.

The Reverend Mr. Scoville testified that the plaintiff, within a year next before he was placed in custody, read a paper on John Calvin before a literary club in the city of Stamford, and that the paper "was considered by the members of the club as one of the strongest papers they had had." The defendants asked that this evidence be stricken out. The court so ordered. We think the evidence was rightly stricken out. It was hearsay.

Mr. Merritt testified concerning his action in making the complaint to the probate court, and in reply to a question by Mr. Fessenden, who was his counsel in this action, said: "I laid the facts before you, as my counsel, and before Dr. Geib, at your suggestion, as a competent medical man and as the family physician. Since that time I have done absolutely nothing, except as you directed me. I have been a mere instrument since that. In fact, I was a mere instrument before." Mr. Fessenden then asked this question: "Did you, in any way, directly or indirectly, instruct me as to the course of procedure, or any step I have taken in it, or any advice of counsel I have given in the matter?" The plaintiff objected to this question, but the court admitted it, and the witness answered: "I never did." This evidence was admissible. Mr. Merritt was charged with acting maliciously in making this complaint to the probate court. He had the right to show that he acted on the advice of counsel.

Counsel for the plaintiff asked of an expert witness, one Dr. Cowles, a hypothetical question. It was conceded, and the fact was so, that it involved assumptions concerning which no evidence whatever had been offered. The court excluded the question for the reason that a foundation for it had not been laid, and, upon the offer of counsel to subsequently present such evidence, the court decided not to admit the question until the basis for it had been laid. This ruling was not more than an exercise by the court of its discretion as to the order in which evidence should be put in. It is not a ground of error.

One part of the defendant's answer is a discharge of all the causes of action alleged in the complaint by the agreement of the parties. This defense sets up the agreement called the "Family agreement." After stating the purpose for which that agreement was entered into, its execution and delivery, and setting it forth in full as a part of the defense by making it an exhibit, and alleging that the defendants had fully kept and performed all their part of said agreement, this defense concludes in this way: "And the defendants say, upon the facts aforesaid, that by said agreement, and the proceedings thereunder, and by the performance by the defendants of the provisions and conditions thereof on their part to be performed, and by said acts of the defendants, the subject-matter of the present suit, and the plaintiff's claims or alleged rights of action described in plaintiff's complaint, and all of the controversies, questions, and claims between the plaintiff and the defendants, were fully and finally adjusted, settled, satisfied, and ended." The plaintiff, in his reply, admits the execution and delivery of the said agreement, and substantially admits the performance by the defendants of their part thereof, but asserts that "the execution of the said paper by the plaintiff was procured, induced, and compelled under the circumstances and by the false imprisonment and duress set forth in the various paragraphs of the complaint, and by the conspiracy, malicious arrest, fraud, and duress therein stated." To this replication the defendants rejoined by a denial. The issue so formed, as were all the other issues in the case, was found in favor of the defendants. The finding of facts on this part of the case is as explicit and clear as language can make it. The court says: "It was understood, intended, and agreed by all the parties to said negotiation and settlement, and to the said family agreement, that the same should accomplish a full and final settlement and adjustment of all the existing claims, questions, and differences between the parties thereto, and of all the legal proceedings then pending, and the subject-matter thereof, and of all the matters arising out of the proceedings instituted by Mr. Merritt,—the said complaint and application made to the judge of probate on the 18th day of December, 1893,—in favor of or against whatever party, and including all matters covered by the plaintiff's complaint, all of which antedated the said settlement." We are not able to see why this finding of the issue and of the facts is not a complete and absolute bar to the plaintiff's entire action. Had he desired to make the claim that the "family agreement" did not of itself operate to bar his action, because its terms do not warrant such a construction, and that the alleged intention that it should so operate was unavailing, because not so expressed in it, he should have demurred. So far as the plea of duress is concerned, the plaintiff was never in such a situation that it was legally impossible for him to make an agreement which would be binding on him. All those circumstances with which he was surrounded, so graphically and impressively set forth by his counsel in their brief, which constitute the duress and imprisonment complained of, and which would be likely to affect his freedom of action, were for the consideration of the trial court. From the finding of facts we know that the trial court did consider them, and, having so considered them, has found that "said family agreement was executed by the plaintiff freely and voluntarily, and under the advice of his friends and counsel, and without any influence having been brought to bear upon him by any person or persons, save only his friends and counsel, who, acting solely in his interests, advised and urged him to its execution." It seems to us that the plaintiff is bound by the family agreement; that he ought to keep it, and that he has no right of action for anything alleged in the present complaint.

There is no error.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants in error, as plaintiffs below, sued the plaintiffs in error, as defendants below, in the circuit court of Orange county, in assumpsit upon an account for work and labor and materials, the suit being instituted against the defendants as former copartners. All of the defendants appeared by attorney, and all joined in a plea of nil debet. Although this form of plea is expressly prohibited by our 68th rule of practice in common-law actions, the plaintiffs joined issue thereon. After thus joining issue the parties by consent had the cause referred to an attorney, as referee, for trial. On motion before the referee the defendants were allowed to amend their pleas. By virtue of this permit to amend, the defendants on May 28, 1889, interposed the following plea in abatement: "And now comes James A. Knox, one of the defendants, and for himself and the other defendants herein, for plea to above action says that the defendants never were partners trading as the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, but that the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company was and is a corporation duly and legally organized under the laws of Tennessee, and the said defendants therefore ask to be dismissed with their costs," etc. Issue being joined on this plea, the parties held a separate trial before the referee upon the special issue thus presented on the 23d of January, 1890. To sustain their plea the defendants introduced a certified copy from the secretary of the state of Tennessee of a charter of incorporation to the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, creating it a corporation of and in the state of Tennessee. They also introduced as a witness the defendant James A. Knox who testified, in substance, that he was secretary of the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company, and custodian of its papers; that the defendants sued herein were on the 1st of January, 1887, and still were stockholders in said corporation; that he was present when the Florida Orange Hedge Fence Company organized in Orlando on the 5th day of March, 1885; that he was a director by election on that date, and was one of the original stockholders; that they organized under the charter already offered in evidence. This comprised the entire evidence offered to sustain said plea. The referee overruled the plea upon the ground that a corporation cannot be legally organized in this state under a charter granted by another state. Upon overruling this plea the referee allowed the defendants until the first Monday in February, 1890, to file pleas. On the 3d of February, 1890, all of the defendants interposed the plea of never was indebted, and the defendant G. Taylor on that day filed also a special plea to the effect that he had no interest in the said company; that the only interest he has or has ever had therein is as administrator of the estate of one J. C. Fleming, deceased; that J. W. Childress, one of the original incorporators of the defendant company, gave the said Fleming in his lifetime fifty shares of the stock of said company, but failed to have same issued to him in his lifetime; that after his death he became administrator of the estate, and at the request of the heirs of the said estate he consented that said stock should be issued to him, but that instead of said stock being issued to him as administrator of said estate, the officers of said company issued them to him individually, but that he has no interest in the said stock except as administrator as aforesaid; and that neither he nor the said Fleming ever assumed any liability of the said company.

By agreement of counsel representing all parties the cause was set down for trial on February 17, 1890, and on that day the referee rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, the judgment being in the following form:

In the Circuit Court, 7th Judicial Circuit of Florida, Orange County.

A. G. Branham & Co.,

Collis Ormsby et al., Doing Business as the Florida
Orange Hedge Fence Co. }

On the 17th day of February, A. D., 1890, the above cause came on to be heard, and after argument of counsel and a careful examination of the testimony, I find that the defendants are indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $813.80, as principal, and $75.83 interest. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the plaintiffs do recover of and from the defendants the sum of $889.13 together with the further sum of $28.45 (costs) of suit.

H. C. Harrison, Referee.

The defendant then moved the referee to set aside his findings and to grant a rehearing of the cause upon the following grounds: "1. Because the findings of the referee are contrary to law. 2. Because said findings are contrary to the evidence. 3. Because the referee erred in overruling the defendants' plea in abatement. 4. That the referee erred in entering judgment while the plea of the defendant G. Taylor was not disposed of. 5. Because the referee did not report the findings of law. 6. Because the finding and judgment of the referee is vague and indefinite." Which motion the referee denied and refused. From this judgment the defendants take writ of error.

The errors assigned are: "1. That the referee erred in overruling the defendants' plea in abatement. 2. That the referee erred in overruling the defendants' motion for a rehearing."

The defendants are sued as, and sought to be charged as, copartners. The plea in abatement denies the alleged partnership, but says that defendants are, instead, members of an incorporated company chartered in and by the state of Tennessee. The proof adduced to sustain the plea shows that the individual defendants sued are stockholders in an incorporated company chartered in and by the state of Tennessee; that the company came to Orlando, in Orange county, Florida, and "organized" (in the language of one witness) there, electing a board of directors, etc., and that it undertook in Florida to carry on and conduct the business for which it had been incorporated in Tennessee; and that in the conduct of such business the debt sued for was contracted in Orange county, Florida. There is no proof that the defendants took any steps whatsoever to acquire corporate existence and authority in Florida, but they rely entirely upon the incorporation conferred by the state of Tennessee.

The law is settled "that a corporation can have no legal existence out of the boundaries of the sovereignty by which it is created. It exists only in contemplation of law, and by force of the law; and where that law ceases to operate, and is no longer obligatory, the corporation can have no existence. It must dwell in the place of its creation, and cannot migrate to another sovereignty." Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Miller v. Ewer, 27 Me. 509, 46 Am. Dec. 619; Freeman v. Machias Water Power & M. Co. 38 Me. 343.

It seems to be further well-settled that where a number of individuals assume to act in a corporate capacity in a state where they have not been clothed with corporate existence and authority, they cannot there be recognized as a legally constituted corporation, though they may have been duly incorporated in another state, and that such persons, in the state where they assume corporate capacity, will be treated as, and held to the responsibility of, partners, both in courts of law and equity. Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 81; Fuller v. Rowe, 57 N. Y. 23; Wells v. Gates, 18 Barb. 554; Hurt v. Salisbury, 55 Mo. 810; Richardson v. Pitts, 71 Mo. 128.

The proofs adduced to sustain the defendants' claim that their liability was that of members of an incorporated company instead of that of copartners, shows that they were incorporated in Tennessee; that they then came to Florida and organized here by electing a board of directors and a president and general manager, without becoming incorporated under Florida laws, and that they assumed to conduct here, in their corporate capacity, the business of planting and cultivating hedge fences, for which they had been incorporated in Tennessee, and that the work and labor sued for were done for them in and about the conduct of that business. Under these circumstances they are liable individually or as copartners here, and the referee correctly overruled their plea in abatement.

We do not think the findings and judgment of the referee are contrary to the law of the case, or to the evidence adduced therein, as is contended for in the motion for rehearing, the overruling of which is assigned as the second error. On the contrary, we think the judgment is fully sustained by the evidence, and the law of the case, as we have before seen, was with the plaintiffs.

The entry of judgment, by the referee without any express disposition of the special plea filed by the defendant G. Taylor, to the effect that the stock held by him in the defendant company was really held by him as administrator of a deceased party's estate, though it may have been technically erroneous, was not such error as will warrant a reversal of the judgment by this court. The same facts set up in the special plea, if they could have availed him as a defense under the circumstances of this case, could just as well have been adduced and taken advantage of under his plea of never was indebted, yet he offered no word of proof to sustain the position assumed in the special plea. Under these circumstances the special plea served no other purpose than to encumber the record, and no such error was committed in making final disposition of the cause without specially disposing of it, as would authorize us to reverse the judgment found. Walter v. Florida Sav. Bank & R. E. Exchange, 20 Fla. 826.

The fifth ground of the motion for rehearing, to the effect that the referee did not report the findings of law, is not supported by the facts disclosed by the record, even if the failure of a referee to report his findings upon the law questions presented furnished a valid ground of exception upon writ of error. The only question of law presented in the case was whether the defendants were liable as copartners instead of as a corporation, as presented by their plea in abatement, and the referee's findings upon this question are explicitly set forth in the record.

Under the sixth ground of the motion for rehearing, the defendants contend that the judgment is void because it is vague and indefinite in that it fails, in the body of the judgment, to give the names of the plaintiffs in whose favor it is rendered, or the names of the defendants against whom it is pronounced, they being referred to therein simply as the "plaintiffs" and "defendants" and that no valid execution can issue thereon to enforce the same, as it does not show from whom the adjudged amount is to be collected. There is no merit in this contention. The declaration gives accurately the names of each defendant; the judgment gives the style of the cause at its head with sufficient definiteness to show without doubt that the "plaintiffs" and "defendants" referred to therein are the same individuals named and designated as such in the declaration and throughout the proceedings composing the record in the cause. While it is best that a judgment should be so complete within itself as that the officer issuing the process to enforce it can see at a glance the parties for and against whom such process is to be issued, yet, if the parties for and against whom a judgment is rendered are so referred to therein as that a reference to its caption, or to the pleadings, process, and proceedings in the action, will make certain the names of the parties thus referred to, it is sufficient. Every judgment may be construed and aided by the entire record. 1 Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 50a; Smith v. Chenuit, 48 Tex. 455; Little v. Birdwell, 27 Tex. 688; Hays v. Yarrowborough, 21 Tex. 487; Wilson v. Nance, 11 Humph. 189.

Finding no errors in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Messrs. Alfred Budge and D. C. McDougal also for respondent.

Sullivan, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant who was the defendant in the court below, was convicted of the crime of bringing sheep into the state without having first obtained the certificate or permit of the deputy sheep inspector. He waived a jury trial, and the case was submitted to the court on a written stipulation of facts. The defendant was found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and 5 cents per head on 3,000 head of sheep, from which judgment this appeal was taken.

The appellant contends that said judgment is erroneous, because the act of the state legislature under which he was convicted is repugnant to certain provisions of the Federal Constitution: (1) To ¶ 1, § 2, art. 4, which provides that citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; and (2) to that provision of § 8, art. 1, which authorizes the Congress to regulate commerce. The defendant was convicted under the 4th section of an act entitled "An Act to Amend Sections 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, and 12 of an Act to Create the Office of Sheep Inspector for the State of Idaho; to Provide for the Appointment and to Define the Powers and Duties of Said Officer and His Deputies, and Fixing His Salary and the Compensation of His Deputies and Providing for the Prosecution of Offenses in Said Act," approved March 12, 1897 (see Sess. Laws 1897, p. 115), which act is commonly called the "Scab Law." Said 4th section is as follows: "That § 6 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows: Section 6. Any person, persons, company, corporation, or association, intending to bring, or cause to be brought from any other state or territory into any of the counties of the state of Idaho, any sheep, he or they must first notify the deputy sheep inspector of the district or county nearest to the point of entrance into this state; that at a fixed date he will be within 20 miles from the state line at a designated point, with said sheep for inspection; and it shall be the duty of the deputy sheep inspector to examine such sheep within three days, and if pronounced sound, to immediately dip such sheep once, and then upon being tendered his compensation as hereinafter provided, issue a permit allowing such sheep to enter this state subject to such regulations as are enforced on resident sheep. But if such sheep are found scabby or infected with any contagious or infectious disease, then the deputy sheep inspector must dip said sheep twice with an interval from eight to fifteen days between dipping, and then issue a permit for said sheep to enter said state under the same regulations as heretofore provided: provided, however, that all sheep must enter said state within three days from final dipping, otherwise permits so issued shall be null and void. And any person or persons violating any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction, they shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred ($100) dollars, or more than three hundred ($300) dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail, not less than two months, nor more than six months, or by both such fines and imprisonment; provided, that any person, persons, company, corporation, or association bringing or causing to be brought any sheep into any counties of this state in violation of the provisions of this act, shall be fined in addition to the penalty imposed in this section 5 cents per head, for every sheep so brought into this state, which shall be a lien on said sheep; and it shall be the duty of the deputy sheep inspector to seize and hold such sheep by such means as he deems best for a period of ten days, and if said sum is not paid within that period, to advertise and sell said sheep, or as many of the same as may be necessary to satisfy and pay such fine and costs." Said section makes it a misdemeanor for any person to bring any sheep into this state without having them first dipped by the sheep inspector. Section 6 of said act provides "that no person, persons, company, or corporation within the state of Idaho shall be required to dip his or their bands of sheep between the 1st day of December and until such time as he or they can shear such sheep in the following spring," while any person who brings sheep into this state between the 1st day of December and such time in the spring as such sheep can be sheared must have them dipped before bringing them in, whether the sheep are sound and healthy or not. And it is further provided in said section that "no person, persons, company, or corporation within the state of Idaho shall be required to dip a band or bands of ewes, or any part of them in which there are ewes with lambs, at any time between the 15th day of March and the 15th day of May following of any year; but they must be held in quarantine and kept separate from sound sheep, and the owner, owners, or controller shall be responsible for all damages as stated in this act, to be enforced and recovered as therein provided for." And it is also provided that sheep held in quarantine, which show any scab or contagious disease, shall be "spot or hand dressed" with some reliable medicine. The provisions of that section make a clear discrimination between sheep in Idaho and those that may be brought in between the dates designated. The alleged offense for which the defendant was convicted was for bringing sound and healthy sheep into the state without first having them "dipped" as directed by the provisions of said § 4.

It is contended that said act, and the act of which it is amendatory, are police regulations enacted for the purpose of the suppression and prevention of disease among sheep. The legislature, no doubt, had authority to enact laws for such purpose; but, in so doing, it must not come in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Section 2, art. 4, of the Constitution of the United States is as follows: "The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." And § 8, art. 1, provides, among other things, that the Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with Indian tribes." Numerous cases involving the construction of statutes similar to the one under consideration have been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. All decisions from that court give to the commercial clause of the Federal Constitution a most liberal and salutary construction. And all statutes passed professedly as police regulations have not been tested by the innocent titles they may have, but by their natural and probable effect upon interstate commerce; and, if found in any manner to harass or burden such commerce, they have been invariably declared void. The leading case in construing the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution is that of Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23. The construction given that provision by the great Chief Justice Marshall in that decision has not been questioned or doubted. It has been cited and approved in many cases. See Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 34 L. ed. 455, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 185; Brimmer v. Robman, 188 U. S. 78, 8 L. ed. 862, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 485; Voight v. Wright, 141 U. S. 62, 35 L. ed. 638; Schmidt v. People, 18 Colo. 78; Farris v. Henderson, 1 Okla. 384; Philadelphia & P. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania (The State Freight Tax) 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694. Mr. Justice Johnson, in a concurring opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 23, said: "If there was any one object riding over every other, in the adoption of the Constitution, it was to keep the commercial intercourse among the states free from all invidious and partial restraints." As defined in that opinion, the term "commerce" means, not only traffic, but also intercourse. When applied to states, it means commercial intercourse, as between them. It has been held that the nonexercise by Congress of its power to regulate commerce among the states is equivalent to a declaration by that body that such commerce shall be free from any restriction. Welton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347.

Applying the rule laid down in the foregoing authorities to the 14th section of the act providing for the appointment of a sheep inspector (see Sess. Laws 1895, p. 124), and the 4th and 6th sections of the act amendatory thereof (see Sess. Laws 1897, p. 115), and the facts of this case, it is made clearly to appear that said sections place unnecessary burdens and restrictions upon owners of sheep who desire to bring them into the state, as well as upon transportation companies, and greatly interfere with interstate commerce in the matter of the transportation and sale of sheep, and are therefore repugnant to the commercial clause of the Federal Constitution and void. Said § 4 requires any person, company, or corporation intending to bring sheep into the state to notify the deputy sheep inspector that at a fixed date he will have his sheep within 20 miles from the state line, at a designated point; and it then is made the duty of said inspector to examine such sheep within three days after such notification, and, if such sheep are found to be sound and healthy, to immediately dip them; and then, upon tender of his compensation, he shall issue a permit allowing such sheep to enter the state. But in case such sheep are found scabby, or infected with a contagious or infectious disease, then such inspector must dip them twice, with an interval of from eight to fifteen days between dipping, and then issue a permit. And it is provided that sheep must enter the state within three days from the final dipping; otherwise the permit shall be null and void; and for a violation of said law a penalty of fine or imprisonment, or both, are provided; and a further fine of 5 cents per head on all sheep brought into this state contrary to, or in violation of, said provisions, is imposed, and made a lien on the sheep. Said act assumes extraterritorial jurisdiction. It authorizes the deputy inspector to proceed into an adjoining state, and there inspect and dip sheep. The 14th section of the state sheep inspector law, approved March 9, 1895 (Sess. Laws 1895, p. 124), of which the act of 1897 is amendatory, is as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person, persons, company, corporation, or association, owning, controlling, or managing any ferry boat, toll bridge, car, steamboat, or other things used for transportation, to allow any sheep to be carried thereon, unless the party in charge of said sheep shall first produce a certificate from a deputy sheep inspector appointed under this act, that said sheep are free from scab, scabbies, and other infectious or contagious disease. Any violation of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor and punishable by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $250." Said section makes it a misdemeanor for any person, company, corporation, or association owning, controlling, or managing any ferry boat, toll bridge, car, steamboat, or other thing used for transportation, to allow any sheep to be carried thereon unless the party in charge of such sheep shall produce a certificate from a deputy sheep inspector. Any violation thereof is made a misdemeanor, and made punishable by fine. In order to procure a certificate or permit from a deputy sheep inspector under the provisions of the act of 1897, all healthy sheep must be dipped once; and said § 14 makes it a criminal offense for any transportation company to bring sheep into the state unless the person in charge of such sheep have a proper certificate from a deputy sheep inspector. Under the provisions of said acts, sheep cannot be shipped from Washington or Oregon, or from any other state, over the transportation lines in this state, without first unloading such sheep, and having the proper deputy sheep inspector inspect and dip them. To illustrate: Supposing a train load of sheep are being shipped from Oregon to Chicago over the Oregon Short Line Railroad, if said acts be valid the train must be stopped near the state line of Idaho, the sheep inspected, and, if healthy, dipped by a deputy sheep inspector once, and, if not free from disease, dipped twice. Thereafter, a proper certificate being given to the shipper of said sheep, the train may then proceed. Again, to illustrate: Supposing that Wyoming, Nebraska, Iowa, and Illinois had sheep inspector laws similar to those of Idaho, such sheep would have to be inspected and dipped before entering Wyoming, and again before entering Nebraska, and again before entering Iowa, and again before entering Illinois. It certainly does not require any argument to show that such acts would most seriously harass and burden interstate commerce, so far as the great sheep industry in the west is concerned. The statement of the proposition is sufficient to show to one familiar with the matter that it would not only take days, but weeks, to get a train load of sheep which were free from disease from the state of Oregon to market in the city of Chicago, and at an expense which even the present prosperous condition of the sheep industry could not long withstand. And, again, said § 4 prohibits the bringing of sound healthy sheep into the state, at any season of the year, unless they be first inspected and dipped; and the provisions of said § 6 recognize the fact that it is absolutely impracticable, and very dangerous to the lives of the sheep, to dip them during cold weather, or during the winter months. By requiring all sheep to be dipped before they can be brought into the state, a prohibition is thus set on bringing any sheep into the state during the winter months. The act thus unjustly discriminates against outside sheep, for it provides that sound sheep within the state need not be dipped, and diseased sheep need only be quarantined and "spot or hand dressed," while sound outside sheep can only be brought within the state after first being dipped, and diseased outside sheep must be dipped twice before they can be brought within the state. An unjust discrimination is made against bands of ewes that are out of the state, whose owners desire to bring them into the state. Said act does not require the dipping of the ewes that are in the state between the 15th day of March and the 15th day of May following, but it requires all ewes that are brought into the state between those dates to be dipped once if sound and healthy, and twice if infected with contagious disease. The danger of loss being so great, in dipping ewes between said dates said act is a virtual prohibition on bringing bands of ewes into this state between the dates specified therein. Said act admits that sound sheep, by inspection, may be distinguished from infected ones; that the inspector can easily determine whether a band of sheep is sound or not. It is admitted that the disease known as "scab" breaks out in open sores within ten days after exposure. It is also conceded that said disease is as prevalent in Idaho as it is in the surrounding states, and that Idaho sheep are the same as those of other states, and that scab is as prevalent and natural among sheep in Idaho as it is among the sheep of our neighboring states. In other words, the sheep of our neighboring states are no more the natural habitat for scab, or other infectious diseases to which sheep are subject, than are Idaho sheep. Those facts distinguish the case at bar from those cases in which the constitutionality of laws aiming to protect the cattle of certain states from the ravages of the disease commonly known as "Texas fever" is involved. It is recognized that Texas cattle are the natural habitat for said disease, and if they are excluded from a state, as well as cattle that have come in contact with them, the disease is wholly prevented. It is thus shown that that class of cases is distinguishable from the case at bar. The enactment of a similar statute to the one under consideration, by the states of Wyoming, Nebraska, Iowa, and Illinois, would result in closing the markets of Kansas City, Omaha, and Chicago to the sheep growers of our state. The burden placed upon the shipper or driver of sheep would be very great, if, upon arriving at a state line, he must notify a sheep inspector, and, in case such inspector pronounce the sheep sound and healthy, they must be dipped once before entering such state. Under the guise of inspection and quarantine, said sections place unnecessary burdens and restrictions upon bringing sheep into this state for any purpose whatever, or transporting them through the state to the markets of the east, and make unnecessary and prejudicial discriminations against sheep whose owners may desire to bring them into the state; and they are repugnant to the provisions of the Federal Constitution.

Said sections are void for that reason, and the judgment of the Lower Court must be reversed, and it is so ordered: The case is remanded, with instructions to the court below to set aside said judgment, and to discharge the appellant and dismiss said action. Costs of this appeal are awarded to the appellant.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

SANITARY DISTRICT OF CHICAGO,

Appt.,
v.

John A. COOK.

1. Parties can raise by exceptions any questions of law for decision as readily as by submitting propositions to be held as law, under Rev. Stat. 1893, chap. 117, § 1, providing that referees shall have authority to take testimony and report the same in writing together with their conclusions of law and fact, and that either party may except to such report.
2. Trade fixtures erected by a tenant upon the leased premises during the term of the original lease cannot be removed after the expiration of the term of a new lease which contained no reservation of any right or claim of the tenant to the fixtures, and does not recognize his right to remove them.
3. A covenant in a new lease that the tenant will keep the premises in good repair and deliver them up in as good condition as they were when entered upon prevents the removal, at the close of the new term, of trade fixtures placed on the premises by the tenant during the original term, where the new lease contains no reservation or recognition of such right, even if the right of removal would not be lost in the absence of such a covenant.

APPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, which reversed a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County disallowing compensation for certain buildings on property which complainant had undertaken to obtain by condemnation proceedings. Affirmed.

Statement by Carter, J.:

In September, 1892, the sanitary district of Chicago filed its petition in the circuit court of Cook county to condemn, for its right of way, among others, a number of tracts of land belonging to Thomas and Seth Piper and others and also two tracts, known in the case as Nos. 68 and 70, belonging to John A. Cook, on which there were certain buildings and other improvements. The sanitary district settled with the Pipers, while the suit was pending, for their interest in the land, and the verdict of the jury was subsequently rendered in the cause, awarding to the owner of tracts 68 and 70, who was John A. Cook, the appellee, the sum of $43,845, and finding that the value of the buildings, fences, and other improvements situated upon the tract 70 was $1,575.60. This last amount is the amount in controversy here, the money having been deposited in the Globe National Bank pending the determination of its ownership. In October, 1893, Cook served a notice on the district that he would, on a certain day, ask for an order requiring the money to be paid to him, claiming that he was the only person entitled to it. By agreement of the parties, made in open court, the cause was referred to Thomas Taylor, Jr., to take proof, and report to the court his conclusions of law and fact. It was afterwards stipulated by the parties that all irregularities in the order of reference, taking testimony, making objections to the report, and filing exceptions thereto, be waived; and it was agreed that the same should have the full force and effect of a reference by agreement, pursuant to chapter 117 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, providing for the appointment of referees in common-law cases. It was also stipulated that the improvements consisted of a large stable and hay barn, dwelling, corn crib, cow house, some fences, well, pump, and drinking trough.

The evidence before the referee disclosed that the improvements were put on the land several years prior to 1888 by the Pipers; that the barn was constructed of eighty telegraph poles set in the ground, to which the rest of the lumber was attached; and that the stable was largely made of scantlings set in the ground; and that it would be impossible to move the buildings without tearing them to pieces. It seems that the Pipers had either a five or ten year lease, during which time they put on these improvements. Neither this lease nor its contents was given in evidence. After the lease had expired, and in 1888, a new lease was made between the same parties, for a period of five years, which was afterwards extended from time to time until the sanitary district took possession by virtue of the condemnation proceedings. This lease did not reserve to the tenant the improvements, but it contained the following: "And, as additional rents, said Piper covenants and agrees at his own expense to keep in good repair the fences upon said demised premises. And the said party of the second part further covenants with said party of the first part that the said party of the second part has received said demised premises in good order and condition, and that at the expiration of the time in this lease mentioned, or sooner determination thereof by forfeiture, he will yield up the said premises to said party of the first part in as good condition as when the same was entered upon by said party of the second part, loss by fire or inevitable accident or ordinary wear excepted, and also will keep the said premises in good repair during this lease at his own expense." The testimony further showed that, during the time negotiations were pending between the district and the Pipers and Cook in regard to acquiring their interests in the premises, the attorney for the Pipers disclaimed their ownership of the improvements; that the attorney for Cook at first claimed that his client did not own them, but, after seeing the lease, he informed the district that he did claim them; that a dispute at the trial of the cause as to their ownership, and before a settlement was reached with the Pipers, led the jury to make a separate finding as to the value of the improvements. The district made a settlement with the Pipers, and took a warranty deed for the tracts belonging to them, and also a quitclaim for certain tax titles held by them, including in said quitclaim all their interest in any building situated on the land of John A. Cook, and in the leasehold of the same land. This clause was put in the deed at the request of the attorney for the district, the attorney for the Pipers at the same time disclaiming that they had any rights in the improvements. He testified positively that nothing was allowed in the settlement for these improvements. The district claims the money by virtue of the settlement with the Pipers and the quitclaim deed to these improvements. The referee made his report, finding that the buildings and improvements were attached to the freehold, and erected with the intention of becoming fixtures; that, by reason of the tenant accepting a new lease without reserving any right to remove them, they had become a part of the real estate; that there was no estoppel against Cook by reason of the admissions of his attorney, the same having been retracted and corrected before the final settlement was made with the Pipers; that, at the time of making such settlement, the district knew of Cook's claim of ownership, and that their value was not included in the settlement with the Pipers; and that Cook was entitled to the money. All of the findings of the referee, as well as his recommendations, were objected and excepted to. The referee's recommendations were overruled, and judgment for the amount in controversy was entered in favor of the district. From this judgment, Cook appealed to the appellate court for the first district, and that court reversed the judgment, and remanded the cause, with instructions, the effect of which was to direct the circuit court to find that Cook was entitled to the money, and to enter judgment therefor in his favor. The sanitary district then took this appeal to this court.

Messrs. F. W. C. Hayes and Seymour Jones for appellant.

Mr. Arthur B. Wells, for appellee:

Improvements of a permanent character erected on land, designed for its better enjoyment, are deemed a part of the land.

Dooley v. Crist, 25 Ill. 551.

This rule is relaxed in the case of improvements erected by a tenant during his term for use in his business, and which are so annexed that they can be removed without injury to the land.

Taylor, Land. & T. 8th ed. § 549.

The removal of these improvements would not leave the premises in as good condition as they were prior to their erection.

Chase v. New York Insulated Wire Co. 57 Ill. App. 205.

A tenant can remove trade fixtures erected by him during his term provided he removes them before the expiration of his term, or, in case he is allowed to remain in possession after the expiration of the term, without any new lease being executed, or the old lease is renewed, his right continues as long as under such circumstances he retains the possession.

Mason v. Fenn, 18 Ill. 525.

But if he accepts a new lease without reserving the right to so remove his trade fixtures he is held to have abandoned that right.

People v. Brown, 67 Ill. 435; Winslow v. Cooper, 104 Ill. 239; Knapp v. Jones, 143 Ill. 382.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As the appellate court made no finding of facts in its judgment of reversal, we must assume that it found the facts to be as found by the circuit court. Appellant here contends that, as no propositions to be held as law in the decision of the case were submitted to the trial court, no questions of law are presented here, and, as all questions of fact have been finally settled, nothing can be done by this court but to affirm the judgment. We are of the opinion that the report of the referee of his conclusions of law and fact under the statute, and the objections and exceptions to that report, raised for decision all such questions of law as fully as could have been raised by propositions of law had they been presented. The statute (Rev. Stat. 1893, chap. 117, § 1) provides that the referees "shall have authority to take testimony in such cause, and report the same in writing, together with their conclusions of law and fact, to the court," and that either party may except to such report. Appellant itself filed eight exceptions to the report, raising questions of law which were sustained by the court in overruling the recommendations of the referee, and rendering judgment for the district. Under this statute, parties can raise by exceptions any question of law for decision as readily as by submitting propositions to be held as law. There was but little dispute as to the evidence.

The only questions of law raised relate—First, to the effect of the subsequent leases of Cook to the Pipers of the premises containing the buildings, etc., after the expiration of the lease under which such buildings were erected by the Pipers; and, second, to the question whether or not Cook was estopped from claiming these improvements by the declarations of his attorney disclaiming his ownership. Conceding that it is settled by the evidence that the Pipers erected the buildings, etc., on the leased premises while holding under a former lease, as agricultural or trade fixtures, and had the lawful right to remove and retain them while holding under such former lease, the question remains whether such right was not lost by the expiration of such lease without such removal, and the taking of the subsequent leases in evidence which contained no reservation of such right, but, on the contrary, contained the covenants before set out, binding the lessees to keep up the fences, to keep the premises in good repair, and to deliver up the same in as good condition as they were when entered upon. The record does not show the contents of the original lease.

We have been cited to no case, and know of none, in which the precise question here presented has been considered by this court. In Mason v. Fenn, 13 Ill. 525, it was said (p. 529): "As between landlord and tenant, improvements put on the demised premises by the latter, for purposes of trade or manufacture, and which can be detached without material injury to the estate, may be removed by him before he quits the possession." As to this proposition there can be no doubt. But the great weight of authority seems to be that where, at the expiration of a lease during which trade fixtures have been erected on the premises by the tenant, a new lease is taken of the same premises, containing no reservation of any right or claim of the tenant to the fixtures still remaining on the premises, and without recognizing the right of the tenant to remove them, such fixtures, erected under the former lease, cannot be removed by the tenant during or at the end of the new lease, notwithstanding his actual possession of the premises has been continuous. Fitzherbert v. Shaw, 1 H. Bl. 258; Heap v. Barton, 12 C. B. 274; Thresher v. East London Waterworks Co. 2 Barn. & C. 608; Sharp v. Milligan, 23 Beav. 419; Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59; Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 178; Watris v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694; Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478; Hedderich v. Smith, 103 Ind. 208, 58 Am. Rep. 509; Marks v. Ryan, 63 Cal. 107; Taylor, Land. & T. § 552; Ewell, Fixtures, 174, 175; Tyler, Fixtures, 487-439; Wood, Land. & T. § 532. The reason given is "because the fixtures set up on the premises at the time of the lease are part of the thing demised, and the tenant, by accepting a lease of the kind without reserving his right to the fixtures, has acknowledged the right of his landlord to them, which he is afterwards estopped from denying."

The only cases contra are Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, and Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501. In Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, leases had been executed for a certain term, all expiring on the same date, in which leases there was a provision allowing the lessees time for the removal of the buildings they might erect. Afterwards, the lessor having sold his real estate to another, a new lease was taken from the vendee, to expire at the same time as the former leases; and no reason appeared for doing so, unless it was to obtain some lots not included in the old leases. Judge Cooley, after stating the rule that the tenant must remove trade fixtures during the term, or while he still has a right to regard himself as occupying in the character of tenant, before surrendering possession, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But why the right should be lost when the tenant, instead of surrendering possession, takes a renewal of his lease, is not very apparent. There is certainly no reason of public policy to sustain such a doctrine; on the contrary, the reasons which saved to the tenant his right to the fixtures in the first place are equally influential to save to him on a renewal what was unquestionably his before. What could possibly be more absurd than a rule of law which should in effect say to the tenant who is about to obtain a renewal: 'If you will be at the expense and trouble and incur the loss of removing your erections during the term, and of afterwards bringing them back again, they shall be yours; otherwise, you will be deemed to abandon them to your landlord.' He then cited Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 59, and proceeded to review the authorities therein cited, to show that they do not bear out the decision of the California court. However, the case of Thresher v. East London Waterworks Co. 2 Barn. & C. 608, which he distinguishes, is directly in point in the case at bar. This case, he said, "was decided upon the construction of a covenant contained in the new lease, by which the tenant undertook to repair the erections and buildings, and at the end of the term the premises so repaired, etc., to leave and yield up, etc." In commenting on Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, he used the following language: "The case of Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, is in accord with the case in California. In that case, Mr. Justice Allen, speaking for the majority of the court, says: 'In reason and principle, the acceptance of a lease of the premises, including the buildings, without any reservation of right, or mention of any claim to the buildings and fixtures, and occupation under the new letting, are equivalent to a surrender of the possession to the landlord at the expiration of the first term. The tenant is in under a new tenancy, and not under the old; and the rights which existed under the former tenancy, and which were not claimed or exercised, are abandoned as effectually as if the tenant had actually removed from the premises, and after an interval of time, shorter or longer, had taken another lease, and returned to the premises.' This is perfectly true if the second lease includes the buildings; but, unless it does so in terms or by necessary implication, it is begging the whole question to assume that the lease included the buildings as a part of the realty. In our opinion, it ought not to be held to include them, unless from the lease itself an understanding to that effect is plainly inferable."

The supreme court of Wisconsin, in the case of Second Nat. Bank v. O. E. Merrill Co. 69 Wis. 501, cited Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 38 Am. Rep. 362, with approval. Still, in the opinion it was said: "For the reason that the great preponderance of the evidence in this case clearly shows that it was understood that the tenant's right to his fixtures and machinery should remain in him notwithstanding the acceptance of a new lease, and because there is nothing in the terms of the new lease which must necessarily be construed as a letting by the landlord to the tenant of such fixtures and machinery, and an acceptance by the tenant of a lease of the same, with a covenant to return them to the landlord at the end of the lease, we think the right of the tenant to remove the trade fixtures and machinery placed upon said premises by him has not been lost; that such fixtures and machinery are still owned by him and that he has the right to remove the same."

In another part of the opinion the court said: "If he [the tenant] accepts the lease which in express terms recognizes the right of the landlord to the fixtures, and he agrees to pay rent for their use thereafter, and keep them in repair, and surrender their possession at the end of the new term, a strong case would be made out in favor of a surrender of the fixtures to the landlord by the acceptance of such new lease; and it would require very clear evidence that, notwithstanding the acceptance of such new lease, there was an agreement that the title to the fixtures should remain in the tenant. If it should be admitted that the general words of description in the new lease would under ordinary circumstances be a lease of the fixtures as well as of the land and buildings, still the lease only raises a presumption that it was intended to cover the fixtures, and it is open to proof whether it was in fact intended to cover such fixtures, or whether they were intended by both parties to be excepted therefrom."

In Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, the doctrine of Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 38 Am. Rep. 362, as stated in the opinion of Judge Cooley, is disapproved in the following language: "We cannot go along with him in his reasoning. We are not able to discover anything 'absurd' in the rule laid down by the other authorities. . . . If it was the intention of the parties in this or any other similar case, that the right to remove fixtures should continue, nothing was easier than to insert in the lease a clause to that effect, and it seems to us reasonable to infer from the absence of such a clause that it was their intention that this right should no longer continue. . . . We neither know of, nor can we recognize, any 'public policy' which ought to induce the courts to place a different construction or give a different effect to a lease between landlord and tenant from that given to other contracts between other parties, or to set aside a well-settled rule or principle of law, in order to promote the interests of either party thereto." In this case the terms of the lease were: "The premises known as the 'City Hotel,' . . . together with all the rights, appurtenances, and privileges thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining;" and the court said, in construing the same: "We take it then to be clear that the descriptive terms in this lease are sufficient to convey to the lessee the fixtures in dispute if they had been previously placed upon the premises by the landlord, or had been left there by a previous outgoing tenant. There is, it is true, no express covenant on the part of the lessee to keep the premises in repair, and restore them in good condition."

The Texas court of civil appeals, in Wright v. MacDonnell, 27 S. W. 1024, quotes the general rule, and says that Carlin v. Ritter, 68 Md. 478, answers and completely overthrows Judge Cooley's position. But the supreme court of Texas, on appeal, in the same case (38 Tex. 140), while conceding the rule as established by the weight of authority, inclines to the Cooley theory, and says: "The opinion of Judge Cooley in the former case is an able presentation of that side of the controversy, and is very difficult to answer. But as we view the case before us, it is not necessary for us to determine the naked question. The rule recognized by the majority of the courts is neither inflexible nor arbitrary. It must yield to the intention of the parties to the lease, as deduced from the language employed, when viewed in the light of the circumstances attending the transaction."

In Marks v. Ryan, 68 Cal. 107, the case of Kerr v. Kingsbury, 39 Mich. 150, 33 Am. Rep. 362, is cited; but the court after citing Watrous v. First Nat. Bank, 124 Mass. 571, 26 Am. Rep. 694; Loughran v. Ross, 45 N. Y. 792, 6 Am. Rep. 173, and Ewell, Fixtures, 174, followed the weight of authority, and adhered to the doctrine of its former decisions, as laid down in Merritt v. Judd, 14 Cal. 60, and Jungerman v. Boese, 19 Cal. 355.

We see no reason for departing from the general common-law rule, and must hold that the Pipers lost their right to the improvements by accepting the new leases, and that they did not pass to the sanitary district by the quit-claim deed. Besides, the covenants in the new leases would seem to put the question in this case beyond the realm of reasonable controversy. Even if it be conceded that the attorney of Cook had authority to bind him by the representations or admissions made to the attorney of the district that Cook had no claim to the improvements, still, as the statement was corrected and withdrawn before the appellant had acted upon it to its prejudice, and, by the later action of both parties on the trial in the condemnation proceedings, the ownership of the improvements was treated as a disputed question, to be left for future determination, we see no grounds from which an estoppel against Cook could arise.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

CHICAGO LIVE-STOCK EXCHANGE.

1. Efforts to prevent competition, and to restrict individual effort and freedom of action, in trade and commerce, are restrictions hostile to the public welfare, not consonant with the spirit of our institutions, and in violation of law.
2. A by-law of a live-stock exchange limiting the number of solicitors that any member shall employ, with a provision for its enforcement by fine, suspension, or expulsion from membership, is an unlawful restriction on freedom of trade and business.
3. An act of a corporation tending to produce injury to the public by affecting the welfare of the people is an abuse of its corporate franchise, for which the charter of the company may be forfeited by an information in the nature of quo warranto.

defendant in a quo warranto proceeding to oust defendant from its franchises for abuse of its charter powers. Reversed.

Statement by Phillips, Ch. J.:

On January 24, 1894, Jacob J. Kern, as state's attorney of Cook county, filed in the circuit court of that county a petition upon the relation of William McIlhany for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto against the Chicago Live-Stock Exchange. From a judgment denying a prayer of and dismissing that petition, an appeal was prayed and allowed by this court.

The material facts shown by the petition are as follows: "Appellee here (respondent below) is a corporation incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois. The charter states that the object for which the corporation is formed is to establish and maintain a commercial exchange; to promote uniformity in the customs and usages of merchants; to provide for the speedy adjustment of all business disputes between its members; to facilitate the receiving and distributing of live stock, as well as to provide for and maintain a rigid inspection thereof, thereby guarding against the sale or use of unsound or unhealthy meats; and generally to secure to its members the benefits of co-operation in the furtherance of their legitimate pursuits." The petition charges that all of the live-stock commission merchants who do business at the stock yards in the city of Chicago are members of said corporation, and that through such members said corporation has and exercises entire and absolute control over all the live-stock commission business transacted at said stock yards; that because of the control which said corporation has acquired over the live-stock commission business it is impossible for anyone who is not a member of said corporation to transact a live-stock commission business at said stock yards; that relator is engaged in the live-stock commission business at said stock yards, and is a member of said corporation; that he paid for said membership, and the same is worth, the sum of $500; that said corporation, without any power, right, or authority, has assumed to enact the following rule or by-law: "Sec. 7. There shall be no solicitor employed who is not a member of this exchange. There shall be no solicitor employed except on a stipulated salary, which shall not be contingent on commission earned. Members of the exchange shall file with the secretary thereof, within five days of the time of employment, the name and postoffice address of their traveling solicitors. Members shall not employ to exceed three traveling solicitors for each firm in the states of Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota. Members of a commission firm may solicit in the aforesaid states, provided they be counted as the solicitors allowed therein, and provided further, that they comply in all respects with the restrictions governing such solicitors. It shall be a violation of this rule for any solicitor representing or claiming to represent a commission firm located in another market to solicit for any Chicago firm in the states before named, and members shall be held responsible for any violation of this section by their partners or employees at other market centers, and shall be held accountable for the acts of any solicitor who, under the guise of soliciting for a branch house, invades the territory above described, and solicits for a Chicago firm. Members may employ an unlimited number of solicitors to solicit outside of the foregoing prescribed territory, provided they comply in all respects with the restrictions governing solicitors. It shall be a violation of this rule for any nonresident member or stockholder of any commission firm to solicit for any commission firm in which he may be interested, unless he be duly registered and employed as a solicitor under the rules and regulations provided. It is provided further that members representing commission firms or incorporated companies shall be held responsible for any violation of this rule by the nonresident partners or stockholders of said firms or corporations."

The petitioner charges that the above rule operates in restraint of trade, and interferes with the just rights of relator and other members of said corporation in the management and conduct of their business; that for the enforcement thereof said corporation has enacted that "any member of this exchange, or firm in which he may be a partner, violating any of the provisions of this rule, shall be fined not less than $250 nor more than $1,000 for the first offense; for a second offense, not less than $500 nor more than $1,000; and, if either of such fines is not paid within three days, said firm shall be suspended from membership until same is paid. For a third offense they shall be expelled from membership in the exchange." The petition further charges that the business of relator, as well as the business of a large number of other members of said corporation, extends into the territory comprising the states mentioned in the above rule; and that relator and the other members of said corporations have, and by law ought to have, the right to conduct and extend their business in said territory, and for that purpose to employ such and so many solicitors as they may see fit; that relator and a large minority of the other members of said corporation desire to conduct their business in said territory in open competition; that relator and others of the members of said corporation have engaged solicitors who are not members of said corporation; that said corporation threatens to enforce the provisions of the above rule against relator and said other members, and to expel them from said corporation; that such action will ruin the business of the members against whom it is taken. The prayer is for leave to file information in the nature of quo warranto against said Chicago Live-Stock Exchange, requiring it to appear, and show by what right it assumes to exercise the privilege and franchise of enacting said rule or by law.

On the filing of this petition the court entered a rule directing the respondent exchange to show cause why the petition should not be granted. The exchange filed its answer to the rule, verified by the affidavit of its secretary. The facts disclosed by the answer show that the exchange does no business of any kind itself, but is an organization for the mutual benefit of its members in the fields indicated by the objects stated in its certificate of incorporation; that it has a membership of about 700 persons, mainly live-stock commission merchants; that each of its members voluntarily sought such membership, and agreed, in joining it, to abide by such by-laws and rules as it might make; that the exchange has no market, and conducts no market; that the Union Stock Yards are the separate and exclusive property of another and different corporation, viz., the Union Stock Yard & Transit Company, a corporation for pecuniary profit, organized by a special act passed February 13, 1865; that upward of 80,000 persons are employed in the yards, of whom only a small number are members of the exchange; that the exchange has no property at the stock yards except a leasehold of one room for a term of one year; that its rules are adopted in order to carry out the objects of its creation above set forth; that its rules are operative upon and apply to such persons only as have voluntarily sought and obtained membership; that the powers of the exchange to make rules, and the validity of its rules establishing uniform rates of commission to be charged by its members, and determining that they may deal as live-stock commission merchants only with members of the exchange, have already been inquired into in this court, and sustained, both in proceedings by quo warranto and by injunction, judgment in the latter case being affirmed both by the appellate and supreme courts. The answer then sets up the substance of the opinion of this court. It also alleges that many evils formerly existed which the rule as to solicitors would be calculated to prevent; among others, a tendency to destructive rivalry in the number of solicitors who are sent out into the country by members to solicit shipments of live stock to their respective employers, amounting to a war of solicitation by competing houses, in which those unable to carry it on were defeated and driven out of business, and business demoralized, and left in the hands of the victors in the war; that dishonest and irresponsible and disreputable solicitors were employed, who used dishonest, irresponsible, and disreputable methods, and misrepresented the character and credit of rivals; that the business of commission men is confidential, and based on a trust relation, rendering it difficult to ascertain and prove the acts of dishonest solicitors, but that such acts bring discredit on the entire trade, and often brought on bitter disputes between members, and led to the sale of diseased live stock; that the rules requiring uniformity in the rates of commission and forbidding rebates of commission to shippers were frequently violated by commission merchants who resorted to the device of appointing consignors as solicitors of their own shipments, and paying to shippers rebates of commission under the guise of compensation for services as solicitors, and that the appointment and payment of compensation to alleged solicitors was also used as a collusive device by money lenders to cover usurious loans to commission merchants, and by railroad employees to cover extortion and unjust discrimination in the use of transportation facilities; that these rules in question would tend to prevent these evils, and to settle disputes and promote uniformity and co-operation among the members; that membership is a voluntary matter, and that any dissatisfied member can withdraw at any time; that each member, by joining the association, freely and voluntarily surrendered a portion of his natural liberty in the methods of doing this particular business, in order to secure the greater advantages of co-operation, uniformity, mutual protection, the settlement of disputes, and exclusion of the disreputable methods and disease products from the business.

The questions presented upon the petition and answer were: (1) In enacting said rule or by-law, has appellee abused its corporate franchises? (2) Conceding that the enactment of such rule or by-law is an abuse of appellee's franchises, can that abuse be corrected through an information in the nature of quo warranto? The trial court held that the by-law is valid, and thereupon rendered a judgment denying the prayer of the petition, and dismissing the same. From that judgment the cause comes on appeal to this court.

Messrs. Jacob J. Kern and Moran, Kraus, & Mayer, for appellant:

The practical effect of the by-law is to take from appellee's members their individual control over their respective businesses, and vest that control in appellee.

This was illegal.

Huston v. Reullinger, 91 Ky. 333.

In all classes of business, the employer and employee should be allowed to contract with each other, unrestrained by others who may demand that the one shall give more or the other receive less, and, as a general rule, when restrictions are placed upon their rights by combinations or associations of men, they will be regarded as in violation of law, and void.

Whenever a corporation uses its corporate powers to promote or consummate acts which are in contravention of the public policy of the state, it abuses its corporate franchise.

The word "unlawful," as applied to corporations is not used exclusively in the sense of malum in se, or malum prohibitum. It is also used to designate powers which corporations are not authorized to exercise, or contracts which they are not authorized to make, or acts which they are not authorized to do.

It does not follow that when a state seeks to punish a corporation for violating the public policy of such state, the courts will refuse relief on the ground that the acts showing the violation would not have been illegal if performed by an individual.

State, Atty. Gen., v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. R. Co. 45 Wis. 579.

In a proceeding against a corporation by quo warranto for having formed with others a monopoly in the shape of a "trust," no actual public injury need be proved, but it will be presumed, when an agreement is shown which, if carried out, will obviously result to the public detriment.

If a corporation does an act, or enters into a contract, which is in restraint of trade and in contravention of public policy, there is involved a public interest which the state may and must protect by proceedings in quo warranto.

Messrs. Peck, Miller, & Starr for appellee.

Phillips, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This corporation organized as stated in its certificate of organization was formed to establish and maintain a commercial exchange, to promote uniformity in the customs and usages of merchants, to provide for the speedy adjustment of all business disputes between its members, to facilitate the receiving and distributing of livestock as well as to provide for and maintain a rigid inspection thereof, thereby guarding against the sale or use of unsound or unhealthy meats, and generally to secure to its members the benefits of co-operation in the furtherance of their legitimate pursuits. The purpose of this corporation, as expressed in this certificate of incorporation, is undoubtedly, if carried out to the fullest extent, in the interest of the people. The common law refused to recognize restrictions upon trade and business among the citizens of a common country. Under this rule of the common law the right of the laborer to dispose of his skill and industry, and to contract in reference to the same with whom he pleased and at such contract rates as might be agreed on, was recognized, and not allowed to be trammelled with restrictions which interfered with individual action and liberty. Combinations and associations of men have no right to place restrictions upon the right of an individual to contract and engage in business employing such means and agencies as are not prohibited by law. The natural flow of trade and commerce must be unrestricted, and men engaged therein may accelerate its current by all means not unlawful. To this end men engaged in trade and commerce may advertise, employ men to solicit business, and offer rewards and inducements to secure trade without violating the law of the land; and in so doing are exercising a right which is in the interest of the public, because competition cannot be hostile to public interest. Efforts to prevent competition and to restrict individual efforts and freedom of action in trade and commerce are restrictions hostile to the public welfare, not consonant with the spirit of our institutions, and in violation of law. We said in Fraser v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492: "The privilege of contracting is both a liberty and a property right, and if A is denied the right to contract and acquire property in a manner which he has hitherto enjoyed under the law, and which B, C, and D are still allowed by the law to enjoy, it is clear that he is deprived of both liberty and property to the extent that he is thus denied the right to contract. Our Constitution guarantees that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Article 2, § 2. And says Cooley: 'The man or the class forbidden the acquisition or enjoyment of property in the manner permitted the community at large, would be deprived of liberty in particulars of 89 L. R. A. primary importance to his or their pursuit of happiness.'" It was also held in Mors v. Bennett, 140 Ill. 69, 15 L. R. A. 361: "Whatever may be the professed objects of the association, it clearly appears, both from its Constitution and by-laws, and from the averments of the declaration, that one of its objects, if not its leading object, is to control the prices to be charged by its members for stenographic work, by restraining all competition between them. Power is given to the association to fix a schedule of prices which shall be binding upon all its members, and not only do the members, by assenting to the Constitution and by-laws, agree to be bound by the schedule thus fixed, but their competition with each other, either by taking or offering to take a less price, is punishable by the imposition of fines, as well as by such other disciplinary measures as associations of this character may adopt for the enforcement of their rules. The rule of public policy here involved is closely analogous to that which declares illegal and void contracts in general restraint of trade, if it is not indeed a subordinate application of the same rule. As said by Mr. Tiedeman: 'Following the reason of the rule which prohibits contracts in restraint of trade, we find that it is made to prohibit all contracts which in any way restrain the freedom of trade or diminish competition, or regulate the price of commodities or services.'" In Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 66, 22 L. R. A. 340, it was said: "Property, in its broader sense, is not the physical thing which may be the subject of ownership, but is the right of dominion, possession, and power of disposition which may be acquired over it; and the right of property, preserved by the Constitution, is the right, not only to possess and enjoy it, but also to acquire it in any lawful mode, or by following any lawful industrial pursuit which the citizen, in the exercise of the liberty guaranteed, may choose to adopt. Labor is the primary foundation of all wealth. The property which each one has in his own labor is the common heritage, and, as an incident to the right to acquire other property, the liberty to enter into contracts by which labor may be employed in such way as the laborer shall deem most beneficial, and of others to employ such labor, is necessarily included in the constitutional guaranty." In other jurisdictions the rule is the same. In King, Coates, v. Coopers Co. Wardens, 7 T. R. 543, it was held that a by-law limiting the number of apprentices which any member of the company might take was void. In the Case of Ipswich Tailors, 11 Coke, 58, a corporation known as the Tailors of Ipswich enacted a by-law to prohibit any tailor from exercising his trade until he had presented himself before the corporation, and proved that he had served seven years as an apprentice. This by-law was held void, as being in restraint of trade. See also Gunmakers' Soc. v. Fell, Willes, Rep. 834. Sustaining the same proposition are Stanton v. Allen, 5 Dento, 434, 49 Am. Dec. 282; People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9, 28 Am. Dec. 501; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173, 8 Am. Rep. 159; People, Gray, v. Medical Soc. of Erie County, 24 Barb. 570. A case similar to that now under consideration was before the court of appeals of Kentucky in Hua- ton v. Reutlinger, 91 Ky. 888. There the Louisville Board of Underwriters passed a by-law which, among other provisions, prohibited a local company from employing more than one solicitor, and regulated the manner in which the salary of such solicitor was to be paid. For a violation of this by-law the offending member of that board forfeited all rights as a member of the association. A local company which had employed more than one solicitor sought to enjoin the enforcement of the forfeiture on the ground that the association had no authority to control the members in the employment of solicitors, etc. A decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill, which, on appeal, was affirmed, the court saying: "The majority of the members, under the guise of producing harmony in this business association, have taken from these individual members the right to determine how many men they shall employ in their private business, and then only such as the association may think fit for the position; nor can they employ a solicitor for a less period than six months, or offer a solicitor an employment within twelve months after the solicitor has severed his connection with any other member; are compelled to discharge those in his employ if he has more than one, and, if these by-laws are enforced, have placed their business under the control of the majority vote of the association, a power the exercise of which was not given by the fundamental law of the order, and doubtless not contemplated when the association was formed. . . . The common-law rule, recognized and adopted when business relations were not so multiplied and extensive as now, and when less necessity existed for enforcing it, condemned all such restrictions upon trade and business intercourse with men as is found to exist in this case. The right of one to control his own property as he pleases, and to employ those necessary to aid him in his business upon such terms as may be agreed on, when not in violation of the law of the land, is the rule of the common law; and the right of the laborer to dispose of his skill and industry to whom he pleases, and for the price agreed on, is embraced within the same rule. In all classes of business the employer and employee should be allowed to contract with each other, unrestrained by others who may demand that the one shall give more or the other receive less, and, as a general rule, when restrictions are placed upon these rights by combinations or associations of men they will be regarded as in violation of law, and void." Where a corporation is created there goes with it the power to enact by-laws for its government and guidance, as well as for the guidance and government of its members. The power is necessary to enable a corporation to accomplish the purpose of its creation. But by-laws must be reasonable, and for a corporate purpose, and always within charter limits. They must always be strictly subordinate to the Constitution and the general law of the land. They must not infringe the policy of the state, nor be hostile to public welfare. The by-law in this case is a restriction on freedom of trade and business. It trammels competition, and prohibits an individual from contracting and engaging in business and using such agencies and means as he may desire not hostile to general law. It is not required for corporate purposes, nor is it included within the purposes declared in the certificate of incorporation. It was therefore unlawful, as this organization had no right to exercise the power of enacting it under its franchise. It is not every misconduct on the part of a corporation, or act not consonant with the purposes of its creation, that will destroy its life. An act, to thus result, must be one which tends to produce injury to the public by affecting the welfare of the people. Where this results, there is an abuse of corporate franchise. People v. North River Sugar-Ref. Co. 121 N. Y. 582, 9 L. R. A. 88. Attempts to place restrictions on trade and commerce and to fetter individual liberty of action by preventing competition, are hostile to public welfare, and affect the interests of the people. Such attempts by a corporation are an abuse of its corporate franchise. Public policy requires that corporations, in the exercise of powers, must be confined strictly within their charter limits, and not be permitted to exercise powers beyond those expressly conferred. The state provides for the creation of corporations. The corporation is its creature, and must always conform to its policy. This duty on the part of corporations to do no acts hostile to the policy of the state grows out of the fact that the legislature is presumed to have had in view the public interest when a charter was granted to the corporation, and no departure from its charter purposes will be allowed which would be hurtful to the public. Where such act is done by a corporation, the state may proceed to claim a forfeiture of its charter by an information in the nature of quo warranto. The petition for leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto should have been granted.

The judgment of the Circuit Court was therefore erroneous, and is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to grant leave to file the information.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

Aaron ROSE, Appt.,
v.
Hyman WOLLENBERG, Respnt.

(.....Or.....)

A contract between cosureties fixing the proportion and extent of their several or correlative liability as between themselves is not within the statute of frauds.

(March 16, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Douglas County in favor of defendant in an action brought to compel defendant to pay to plaintiff money which plaintiff had been compelled to pay as surety on the official bond of V. L. Arrington in excess of what he had contracted to pay. Reversed.

NOTE.—Effect of statute of frauds upon contracts between sureties to fix their shares of liability.

The case of Thomas v. Cook, 8 Barn. & C. 723, 8 Moody & R. 444, though perhaps not strictly one of contract between sureties to fix their shares of liability, seems to have furnished the principles involved in and which govern this subject, a promise to indemnify being equivalent, as between themselves to a promise to take the whole liability as the promisor's share. In that case it was held that a promise by one who requests another to execute a bond with him and a third person to indemnify him against all loss by reason thereof is not a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another which must be in writing under the statute of frauds, but merely a promise to indemnify, as the promise is given to the debtor, and not to the creditor, and the promisee may recover from the promisor the whole of the money which he is compelled to pay by virtue of the bond.

In Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & El. 453, 2 Perry & D. 430, 4 Jur. 169, however, the reasons given for the rule laid down in Thomas v. Cook, 8 Barn. & C. 723, 8 Moody & R. 444, were said to be unsatisfactory, and were not adopted in that case, but that case was not one of an agreement between sureties. But in Cripps v. Hartnoll, 4 Best & S. 414, 10 Jur. N. S. 200, 11 Week. Rep. 953, 32 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 381, 8 L. T. N. S. 765, the court refused either to overrule Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & El. 453, 2 Perry & D. 430, 4 Jur. 169, or to say that it entirely supported it, but distinguished it upon the ground that in the case at bar the bail was given for the appearance of a criminal, and not for the purpose of answering a debt or default in a civil case.

And in Reader v. Kingham, 13 C. B. N. S. 844, 32 L. J. C. P. N. S. 108, 9 Jur. N. S. 797, 7 L. T. N. S. 789, 11 Week. Rep. 866, which was a case of a promise of indemnity by a third person to a surety, the rule with the reasons on which it was based, of Thomas v. Cook, 8 Barn. & C. 723, 8 Moody, & R. 444, were adopted and the doctrine of Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & L. 453, 2 Perry & D. 430, 4 Jur. 169, was substantially overruled.

And that rule has since been followed by the great majority of the cases both in the United States and in England, though the reasons for the adoption of such rule given in such cases have not always been the same.

Thus, an agreement by which a person becomes

Statement by Wolverton, J.:

The facts out of which this case arose are, in effect, as follows:

On June 21, 1892, the plaintiff and defendant became sureties upon the official bond of one V. L. Arrington, who had theretofore been elected treasurer of Douglas county. Arrington defaulted, and on December 28, 1893, judgment was taken against him and his bondsmen, which was satisfied by plaintiff and defendant each paying one half, or $11,828.65. As touching the contractual relation of the parties with each other, the plaintiff alleges "that, at the time plaintiff and defendant so became such sureties on said official bond of V. L. Arrington, it was agreed and stipulated by and between plaintiff and defendant that their liabilities, as between themselves, as sureties on said official bond of V. L. Arrington, should not be joint or equal, but that the liability of plaintiff should be a one-third proportion, and that of the defendant should be a two-thirds proportion, of any liability that surety on the promise and undertaking of another surety on the same instrument, that he would indemnify him from all loss, is a contract of indemnity, and not within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing. Rae v. Rae, 6 Ir. Ch. Rep. 494; Apgar v. Hiler, 24 N. J. L. 812; Ferrell v. Maxwell, 28 Ohio St. 383, 22 Am. Rep. 398; Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 462.

The indemnity promised is to secure his own default or liability independently of the promise in question. Ferrell v. Maxwell, 28 Ohio St. 383, 22 Am. Rep. 398.

And it does not contradict or vary the terms or legal effect of the obligation, and may be proved by parol, and is a bar to an action by the party making the promise against his cosurety for contribution. Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 462.

And if such cosurety is compelled to pay he may recover the whole from the promisor. Apgar v. Hiler, 24 N. J. L. 812.

So, a contract by which one of the sureties upon an official bond of a third person agreed to hold the other harmless from all liability and loss thereon, in consideration of which the latter became a surety thereon, forms no part of the bond itself, but is a distinct and original contract of general indemnity which need not be in writing under the statute of frauds, and which is provable by parol. Hoggatt v. Thomas, 35 La. Ann. 298.

And a promise by a surety upon an administrator's bond to his cosurety to save him harmless is not a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or misdoing of another person upon an agreement that is not to be performed within one year, required by the Massachusetts statute of frauds to be in writing, and is a valid defense in an action against the surety signing in consideration thereof for contribution. Blake v. Cole, 22 Pick. 97.

And an agreement by one about to become a surety upon such a bond, who calls upon another to join him, that if he will do so he will indemnify him against any loss, to which the other assents and signs the bond, is not a promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another within the statute, but an original contract between them that the promisee should be indemnified against the bond. Jones v. Shorter, 1 Ga. 294, 44 Am. Dec. 649.

So an agreement by a surety upon a promissory note that if another would also become surety might occur, under said bond, to said sureties." Plaintiff, by this action, seeks to recover the difference between one third and one half of the liability incurred, amounting to $4,008.55. The following is a copy of the bond, omitting matter of inducement and formal parts:

We, V. L. Arrington, as principal, and Aaron Rose and Hyman Wollenberg, hereby undertake that if the said V. L. Arrington shall not faithfully pay over, according to law, all moneys that may come into his hands by virtue of said office, that we, or either of us, will pay the state of Oregon the sum of thirty thousand (30,000) dollars.

V. L. Arrington. [Seal.]
$10,000.00. Aaron Rose. [Seal.]
H. Wollenberg. [Seal.]

The sureties joined in the justification; the plaintiff justifying for $10,000, and the defendant for $20,000.

The allegation above quoted having been put in issue by the answer; a jury was called, whereupon the plaintiff, after putting the bond thereon he would indemnify him from all loss and harm is an original undertaking, and not an undertaking upon his part to answer for the debt of another, and need not be in writing under the statute of frauds. Horn v. Bray, 51 Ind. 556, 19 Am. Rep. 743.

And an undertaking to become cosigner of a note, and to pay it at maturity, in consideration of which another signs it, is not a promise to pay the debt of another within the statute which is required to be in writing, where the object of the note was to raise money for the promisor, though the ultimate purpose was to make use of it for the benefit of third persons who were first signers of the note, and for which such promisor was to obtain security in his own name and for his own benefit as for an advance made by him personally. Potter v. Brown, 35 Mich. 274.

And one who executes a note jointly with the principal debtor as his surety, and intrusts it to his principal to be used, impliedly authorizes him to issue it as it then is or to procure such further security as would make it available, and for that purpose to accept such further terms as the party signing it might prescribe, and he cannot object where the principal debtor procures the signature of another surety upon the agreement that the first surety should indemnify him against loss, and such stipulation need not be in writing, and parol evidence is admissible to establish it. Oldham v. Broon, 28 Ohio St. 41.

So, an agreement between the first indorser and the second indorser of a promissory note, that the second indorser would bear half of the loss which might accrue from nonpayment by the drawer, is a collateral contract by parol, and parol evidence can be given to prove it. Phillips v. Preston, 48 U. S. 5 How. 273, 12 L. ed. 152.

And an agreement between the first and second indorsers of a promissory note that if the first indorser would pay the note at maturity the second would deliver goods to him to the amount so paid is valid and based upon a sufficient consideration, and is not an agreement to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another which must be in writing under the statute of frauds, but an independent agreement based upon a new consideration moving between the contracting parties. Sanders v. Gillespie, 59 N. Y. 260.

And an agreement between the first and second indorsers of a promissory note, made on being in-in evidence, testified as a witness, in his own behalf, in substance, that Arrington, Wollenberg, and the county clerk G. A. Taylor, were present when he signed the bond, and that the figures "$10,000.00" were placed in front of his name at the time he signed, and, continuing, said: "I was to assume $10,000, and Wollenberg $20,000. This is the way I understood it." And upon cross-examination he further said: "All the contract I suppose I had was when I signed for one third, and he for two thirds. I suppose I had to pay one third, and him two thirds. That is all the contract. . . . I signed for security for Mr. Arrington, and at the same time I said, distinctly, that I would not go for more than one third, and Mr. Wollenberg said he would go for $20,000." Arrington testified as follows: "Two or three days before the signing of the bond,—several days before,—I went to Marks' store, there, and asked him if he was willing to sign as my surety again; and I went into the bank, and asked S. C. Flint if he was willing to go on my bond. Mr. Wollenberg was there, and he expressed himself there voluntarily; says, 'I am willing, and will go on your formed by the maker that he would be unable to pay it at maturity, that in consideration of an assignment by the maker of his property giving preferences to the note they would pay it and look to the assignment for remuneration, which was in terms joint with nothing to show that it was not intended to create a joint obligation, terminates the relation of the parties as first and second indorser, and deprives them of recourse to the maker beyond the assignment, or from a recourse as against each other, and is not a collateral undertaking within the meaning of the statute of frauds. Westfall v. Parsons, 16 Barb. 643.

So, a request to become special bailor for a person who had been arrested in a civil action, made by one who was bound to indemnify him from arrest, is an original undertaking and not within the statute of frauds, and the promisee is entitled to recover against him for expenses he had been put to in endeavoring to obtain a surrender of the person arrested. Harrison v. Sawtel, 10 Johns. 242, 6 Am. Dec. 387.

And a promise by the directors of a corporation to one of their number to induce him to indorse a corporate note, that they will respond to him and save him harmless from all loss incurred by indorsing except his appropriate share, which is to be borne by himself, is an original undertaking not within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing. Cortelyou v. Hoagland, 40 N. J. Eq. 1.

And an agreement made by a surety on a note of a private corporation which was secured by mortgage on its real estate with his cosureties, in consideration of the assignment to him of certain stock, that he would pay the note and all other debts of the corporation upon which they were liable as sureties, does not terminate the relation of principal and agent between the corporation and the promising surety, and upon payment of the mortgage note by one subsequently becoming surety to the payee he is entitled to subrogation to the rights of the mortgagee, and acquires the right to enforce the mortgage as against the corporation and a priority as against creditors thereof. McDaniels v. Flower Brook Mfg. Co. 22 Vt. 274.

But a promise by the members of a voluntary association who were tenants under a lease, made to one of their number who had signed a guaranty of the payment of the rent, that they would take the responsibility of his signature upon themselves, is an agreement to answer for the debt or default of bond.' He asked me who else were going on. I told him Aaron Rose and Asber Marks. . . . I asked them all to meet me there [at the clerk's office] on the 21st of June, so as to put the jurat on the bond. I asked Rose and Wollenberg to meet me there on that morning to justify on the bond. When this matter in regard to the signing occurred, Mr. Marks was not there. I went into my room, out of the clerk's office, for my hat, to go and get Mr. Marks to complete the business. When I came out of the room, Mr. Wollenberg met me in the corridor, and said: 'You need not go for Mr. Marks. I will take the rest of the bond.'" The witness further stated, in effect, that, after the defalcation, Wollenberg admitted his liability on the bond to the extent of $20,000, and, upon cross-examination, that at the signing, and in the presence of Taylor, Wollenberg, and himself, "Mr. Rose said he would be liable for one third of the bond, and instructed Mr. Taylor to prefix the figures '$10,000,' as he would sign for one third of the bond." G. A. Taylor, the clerk, gave his version of the execution of the bond as follows: "As near as I can remember the matter, these parties came into the office, and wished to fix the bond out before me,—the justification; and they told me—I do not know which one it was told me—how they wanted it fixed, and how it should read; and, according to the instructions received from the parties at that time, I filled it out, and fixed it in the amount of $10,000 and another which must be in writing expressing consideration therefor within the New York statute of frauds, and no recovery can be had thereon where the consideration is omitted, though contribution might have been compelled if the guarantor had been sued upon the lease or upon a promise to pay rent. Baker v. Dillman, 12 Abb. Pr. 318.

So, an agreement by a surety whose land had been sold under execution for the debt of the principal and bid in by the other surety, by which he was to take an assignment of the bid and pay off the debt, is not a contract to pay the debt of another which must be in writing under the statute of frauds. Hockaday v. Parker, 8 Jones, L. 19.

And a promise made by one of two persons believing themselves to have similar interests dependent upon the settlement of the same question, made to the other, that if he would commence and carry through a suit in his own name to settle such question he would pay one half the expense incurred by him therein, in consequence of which the other brings and prosecutes such suit to a final termination, is not a promise to answer for the debt of another which must be in writing within the statute of frauds. Dorwin v. Smith, 35 Vt. 60.

And an undertaking between creditors working together for the protection of their claims, whereby they agreed to share equally any loss which either may sustain in enforcing his claim, is a collateral undertaking within the meaning of the statute of frauds providing that no action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or misdoing of another, unless the promise be in writing signed by the person to be charged. Spear v. Farmers' & M. Bank, 156 Ill. 555.

So, in Jones v. Letcher, 13 B. Mon. 368, it was held that a surety of an executor procuring another surety to be bound with him upon his promise to save him harmless is liable thereon, and that a third surety who is released from responsibility on the contract on account of payments made is a $20,000, and put the figures '$10,000' in front of Mr. Rose's name at the request of the parties. I do not know which one told me to do that." This is, in substance, all the testimony offered; and, the plaintiff having rested, the defendant moved for nonsuit, which was granted by the court, and judgment entered against plaintiff for costs, from which he appeals.

Messrs. R. Mallory and W. W. Cardwell for appellant.

Mr. J. W. Hamilton, for respondent:

It is necessary to prove the contract alleged in the complaint, which is in effect that the defendant Wollenberg agreed to indemnify and save harmless plaintiff from paying any greater amount than one third of the loss, if any should be sustained by reason of signing said bond. The evidence of plaintiff plainly contradicted these allegations. In such cases upon a failure of the testimony being insufficient to sustain a verdict, the judgment of nonsuit is proper.

Cognell v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Or. 417; Buchanan v. Beck, 15 Or. 571; Brown v. Oregon Lumber Co. 24 Or. 817.

Where the sureties on a bond bind themselves severally for a certain amount, each is liable up to that amount for any debt he may be bound for as surety.

New Orleans v. Waggaman, 81 La. 299; Fulton v. State, 14 Tex. App. 34.

competent witness to prove the promise; but while the statute of frauds was not interposed as a defense the court said that it did not perceive any valid objection to such testimony.

And in Hook v. Richeson, 115 Ill. 432, it was held that an arrangement between cosureties for the distribution of the burden of their joint liabilities among themselves will not affect or defeat their rights against their principal, and though the statute of frauds was not pleaded there is nothing in the case to show that the arrangement was in writing.

In Bissig v. Britton, 59 Mo. 204, 21 Am. Rep. 379, however, it was held that a promise by one who has already signed a replevin bond as surety in order to make it good made to another, that if he would also sign it he would hold him harmless from all damages arising therefrom and from all liabilities incurred on account thereof, is a promise to answer for the debt or default of another within the Missouri statute of frauds, and is invalid unless in writing. Following Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & Al. 453, 2 Perry & D. 430, 4 Jur. 169, supra.

And the same rule has been adopted in Virginia.

Thus a promise by one surety to indemnify another who has become cosurety with him in an official bond at the promisor's request falls within the provision of the statute of frauds requiring that a promise to answer for a debt, default, or misdoing of another, must be in writing to be enforceable by action, and the surety to whom the promise is made, where he is compelled to pay the debt, cannot recover of his cosurety who made the promise anything beyond his aliquot share of the loss occasioned by the default of the principal. Wolverton v. Davis, 85 Va. 64.

In that case it was said that there is no foundation for any distinction between a promise by a stranger to the debt to indemnify a surety which is prima facie within the statute of frauds and a promise by one who is himself surety also and therefore answerable for the default of the principal independently of his promise. F. H. R.

At the time of the payment of this liability by Rose and Wollenberg, it was in the form of a judgment against both. Neither party could dispute their liability, the judgment being conclusive as to both.

1 Freeman, Judgm. 4th ed. § 256.

A verbal promise to indemnify against loss in becoming surety for a third person is a special promise to answer for the debt, default, or mis-carriage of another person, and no action can be maintained on such promise.

Easter v. White, 12 Ohio St. 219; Kingsley v. Balcome, 4 Barb. 181; Nugent v. Wolf, 111 Pa. 471; Brown v. Adams, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 51, 18 Am. Dec. 36.

If the surety voluntarily pays, he cannot recover from cosurety.

Baylies, Sureties & Guarantors, p. 327, § 7; Hichborn v. Fletcher, 66 Me. 209, 22 Am. Rep. 563; Bancroft v. Abbott, 3 Allen, 524.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented by this record is whether the alleged agreement between the plaintiff and defendant "that the liability of plaintiff should be a one-third proportion, and that of the defendant should be a two-thirds proportion, of any liability that might occur under said bond to said sureties," not having been entered into in writing, is within the statute of frauds and perjuries, and therefore void; and, if not, another question arises, and that is whether the evidence presents a prima facie case, sufficient to go to the jury. It is settled by Durbin v. Kuney, 19 Or. 71, that as between cosureties, where one of their number has paid more than his proportion of the common liability, no special agreement having been entered into between themselves, the law raises an obligation upon the part of the cosureties to repay him the excess which he has been compelled to pay, upon the principle that, where there is a common liability, equality of burden is equity. Formerly equity alone entertained jurisdiction to compel contribution, but latterly courts of law, having borrowed the jurisdiction, are competent, in most cases, to administer relief. It is said in the case cited "that the doctrine of contribution does not depend upon contract, but is bottomed and founded upon principles of natural justice. The contract on which they are codebtors, or sureties, only expresses the relation between them and their creditor, and is entirely distinct from the right of contribution, which exists between themselves." While the law, upon principles of natural justice, raises the obligation of equitable contribution among cosureties, it by no means follows that they are inhibited from fixing or determining their relative liabilities by express contract or agreement among themselves. Indeed, the right to enter into any agreement in respect of such liability as their discretion or judgment may dictate is not questioned. The important question is whether such contracts or agreements are within the statute of frauds, requiring all contracts for the debt, default, or mis-carriage of another to be contained in some note or memorandum in writing expressing the consideration, signed by the party to be charged. It is well settled that the true relations existing between joint, or joint and several, promisors or obligors upon a note or bond, or other instrument of writing, can be shown by parol, whether principals or sureties. The writing is paramount, and fixes liability, as it pertains to the payee or obligee; but, as between the makers or obligors, their correlative undertakings, whether in the capacity of principals or sureties, may be otherwise established. The principal, who has obtained the benefit of the contract, or suffered the forfeiture of his bond or obligation, is always bound to indemnify his surety who has sustained loss upon his account, and he cannot interpose the statute of frauds to prevent it. But when we go a step further, to the proposition which involves the undertaking of one surety to indemnify another, in whole or in part, against liability upon their principal's obligation, or, as is alleged in the case at bar, an agreement between themselves fixing upon a different ratio of liability than that which the law raises or implies, we find much contrariety of opinion and authority, as respects the enforcement of such undertaking or agreement where it rests in parol.

The earliest case to which our attention has been called is that of Thomas v. Cook, 8 Barn. & C. 728. It there appeared that one person requested another to become surety with him for a third party, under promise of indemnity against payment. In deciding it, Bayley, J., says: "Here the bond was given to Morris as the creditor, but the promise in question was not made to him. A promise to him would have been to answer for the default of the debtor. But it being necessary for W. Cook, since deceased, to find sureties, the defendant applied to the plaintiff to join him in the bond and bill of exchange, and undertook to save him harmless. A promise to indemnify does not, as it appears to me, fall within either the words or the policy of the statute of frauds." This was in 1828. In 1839 Green v. Crenwell, 10 Ad. & El. 453, was decided by the same court, which may be taken to have overruled Thomas v. Cook. At least, the reasoning of that case was severely criticised. The case was this: The plaintiff, at the request of defendant, and under his promise to indemnify and save him harmless, became surety for one Hadley upon a bail bond in a civil action. The defendant did not join as cosurety. The undertaking was held to be within the statute. The court distinguishes Thomas v. Cook by reason of the fact that both the plaintiff and defendant therein joined as cosureties. Subsequent authorities have assigned as a reason for the distinction that, where the defendant is cosurety, he is, as such, and without any special promise, liable already to contribute, and that his special promise to pay the whole may be regarded as but a matter of regulation of contribution between the two sureties. In Browne, Stat. Fr. 4th ed. § 161a, it is argued that the reason is not well assigned, because—"First, that, though called regulation of a contribution, it is really a promise to pay what he was not otherwise liable to pay for a third party; and, secondly, that he was never liable to contribute at all except by force of the relation of cosuretyship into which he entered, and owed no antecedent debt or duty of his own." These cases gave rise to the subsequent divergence of opinion on the subject treated therein, and the decisions of courts of different jurisdictions are to be largely distinguished, in that they have followed the one or the other of these early authorities. Reader v. Kingham, 13 C. B. N. S. 844, a later English case, decided in 1862, and arising out of a similar state of facts, although not overruling, is in direct conflict with Green v. Cresswell. In Cripps v. Hartnall, 4 Best & S. 414, the court would not say that it could lend its support to Green v. Cresswell. But in a much later case, decided in 1874 (Wildes v. Dudlow, L. R. 19 Eq. 198), Green v. Cresswell was expressly overruled, and Thomas v. Cook approved and followed. In that case the son, at the request of his father, became surety for a third party, the father not signing as a co-surety; and it was held to be an original contract for indemnity, and within the statute of frauds. By a very recent case (Guild v. Conrad [1894] 68 L. J. Q. B. 721), decided in 1894, it was held that Green v. Cresswell was no longer binding, but that Thomas v. Cook was good law. So that it may be said that in England the doctrine has been finally settled in harmony with the latter case.

The authorities among the states of this country are much divided upon the subject. Among the earlier cases to be found is Chapin v. Merrill, 4 Wend. 657, decided in 1880. The facts stated are that plaintiff, at the request and upon the solicitation of the defendant, and under a promise of indemnity, entered into an undertaking, under seal, with one Asa Ransom, by which they covenanted with a mercantile firm that if they would supply one Asa Ransom, Jr., with goods, they (the co-sureties) would pay such an amount unpaid by Ransom, Jr., not exceeding $2,000, as should be due the firm. The defendant had no interest in the goods. Marcy, J., in deciding the case, says: "The contract on which this action is brought is not, in my opinion, within the statute of frauds. The action is brought on the parol undertaking of the defendant to save the plaintiff harmless. . . . The promise in this case was original, and not a collateral undertaking, but had it a sufficient consideration? It is not disclosed that the defendant received any benefit from what was done by the plaintiff; nor is it necessary, as I conceive, that he should, to make him liable. In Tomlinson v. Gill, 1 Ambl. 330, and Read v. Nash, 1 Wils. 305, it does not appear that the defendant did or could derive any benefit from their undertakings, yet they were held liable on them. The consideration was the harm to the plaintiffs. In this case the consideration was the assumption of the plaintiff of a responsibility on which he was obliged to pay about $600. This is an abundant consideration for the undertaking on which this action is brought." This case was subsequently overruled by the supreme court of New York. (Kingsley v. Balcome, 4 Barb. 181), which latter was a case wherein plaintiff became bail upon arrest, at the request of defendant, who promised to indemnify and save him harmless. The opinion is based, to some extent, upon the express authority of Green v. Cresswell, 10 Ad. & El. 458. In a later case (Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 462), decided in 1855, it was held that a surety who became such (upon a tax collector's bond) at the request of his co-surety, and under promise of indemnity, could not be required to contribute, the co-surety having paid the whole loss. Denio, J., says: "The cases where the person making the promise was himself bound for the default of the third person are uniform in holding the contract to be unaffected by the statute." Thus distinguishing Green v. Cresswell and Kingsley v. Balcome, and following Thomas v. Cook, the court concludes: "I am of opinion that where a person is about to become bound by writing to answer for the default of a third party, and he procures another to be bound with him in the same obligation by promising to indemnify him, that this is an original promise, and not within this branch of the statute of frauds." The same result was reached in a Massachusetts case (Blake v. Cole, 22 Pick. 97), based upon a similar state of facts. In a later case from the same state (Aldrich v. Ames, 9 Gray. 77), in which the facts are not stated, except that the promise was made for a valuable consideration, Shaw, Ch. J., says: "The theory of the statute of frauds is this, that when a third party promises the creditor to pay him a debt due to him from a person named, the effect of such a promise is to become a surety or guarantor only, and shall be manifested by written evidence. The promise in such case is to the creditor, not to the debtor. For instance, if A, a debtor, owes a debt to B, and C promises B, the creditor, to pay it, that is a promise to the creditor to pay the debt of A. But in the same case should C, on good consideration, promise A, the debtor, to pay the debt of B, and indemnify A from the payment, although one of the results is to pay the debt to B, yet it is not a promise to the creditor to pay the debt of another, but a promise to the debtor to pay his debt. This rule appears to us to be well settled as the true construction of the statute." These earlier cases are sufficient to illustrate the distinguishing features between the prevailing antagonistic opinions in this country.

The leading and perhaps the best considered cases to be found which follow in the wake of Green v. Cresswell and Kingsley v. Balcome are Easter v. White, 12 Ohio St. 219; Bissig v. Britton, 59 Mo. 204, 21 Am. Rep. 379; Macey v. Childress, 2 Tenn. Ch. 438; and Nugent v. Wolfe, 111 Pa. 471, 56 Am. Rep. 291. The Ohio case was decided long prior to the English case of Wildes v. Dudlow, while the Missouri case was almost concurrent in time with it, but without knowledge of its announcement, and was not in any manner controlled by it. The other two cases cite it with disapproval. The clearest illustration of the principle maintained by these cases is to be found in Nugent v. Wolfe. The First National Bank of Ravenna, Ohio, had obtained judgment against Powers & Co. Nugent went security for Powers & Co., as he alleges, at the request of Wolfe, accompanied with a verbal undertaking or agreement to save Nugent harmless in his undertaking for Powers & Co. with the bank. The court in deciding the case, says: "There is no testimony, nor was any offered, to show that defendant had any personal interest in the judgment on which bail was entered, or that he held property or funds that should have been applied to the payment thereof. So far as appears, it was the proper debt of Powers & Co., and the substance of defendant's agreement is that he would see that they paid it, and, if they failed to do so, he would pay it for them. It was literally a promise to answer for the default of Powers & Co. Plaintiff's liability as bail for stay was merely collateral to the debt in judgment, and had in contemplation nothing but the payment thereof to the bank."

The cases which are usually classed as following Thomas v. Cook and Chapin v. Merrill may be subdivided into three classes, in consideration of the grounds upon which each is apparently sustained. First. It is held that where the inducement for the promise of indemnity is a benefit to the promisor which he did not before, or would not otherwise enjoy, as where he has a personal, immediate, and pecuniary interest in the principal transaction, and is therefore himself a party to be benefited by performance on the part of the promisee, the contract is not within the statute, and may be supported by a verbal undertaking. In reality the undertaking is to pay a debt which is, in substance, the debt of the promisor. Smith v. Delaney, 64 Conn. 264; Davis v. Patrick, 141 U. S. 479, 35 L. ed. 826; Reed v. Holcomb, 81 Conn. 360; Potter v. Brown, 35 Mich. 274; Hilliard v. White (Tex. Civ. App.) 31 S. W. 553; Emerson v. Slater, 68 U. S. 22 How. 43, 16 L. ed. 365. The doctrine established by these authorities does not seem to be at variance with Green v. Cresswell and Kingsley v. Balcomb. See Waterman v. Reeseter, 45 Ill. App. 155, 165. It cannot be true, as has been intimated, that a new and independent consideration, moving from the promisor to the promisee, will support a verbal promise; for this does not meet the statute, as the writing or memorandum which the statute requires must itself be supported by a consideration. See Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412, 414. Second. The promise of indemnity is not a contract with the creditor to answer for the default or miscarriage of the debtor, but is independent of the principal contract or obligation, and constitutes an entirely distinct and separate undertaking, with which the creditor has nothing to do, and which cannot avail him or redound to his benefit in any manner. In such a case the assumption of the liability by plaintiff is itself a sufficient consideration to support the promise, regardless of any subservient interest of the promisor, or of the fact of his becoming cosurety with the promisee, and it need not be in writing. Mills v. Brown, 11 Iowa, 314; Dunn v. West, 5 B. Mon. 376; Lucas v. Chamberlain, 8 B. Mon. 276; Holmes v. Knights, 10 N. H. 175; Jones v. Bacon, 72 Hun, 506; S. C. on appeal, 145 N. Y. 446; George v. Hoskins, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 63; Shook v. Vanmater, 22 Wis. 582; Vogel v. Melms, 81 Wis. 306, 11 Am. Rep. 608; Boyer v. Soules, 105 Mich. 31; Minick v. Huff, 41 Neb. 516; Tighe v. Morrison, 116 N. Y. 270, 5 L. R. A. 617; Wildes v. Dudlow, L. R. 19 Eq. 198, and Chapin v. Merrill, 4 Wend. 657. Third. Where the promisee, under the promisor's agreement to indemnify and save harmless, becomes jointly liable as cosurety with him for the same obligor, such an agreement is held to be an original undertaking, and not within the statute. As sustaining this proposition, Thomas v. Cook is directly in point. See also Horn v. Bray, 51 Ind. 555; Appar v. Hiler, 24 N. J. L. 812; Chapeze v. Young, 87 Ky. 476; Adams v. Flanagan, 86 Vt. 400; Baldwin v. Fleming, 90 Ind. 177; Houck v. Graham, 123 Ind. 277; Barry v. Ransom, 12 N. Y. 462; Jones v. Letcher, 13 B. Mon. 363; Oldham v. Broom, 28 Ohio St. 41; Brandt, Suretyship, § 226; Mickley v. Stock-sleger, 10 Pa. Co. Ct. 845; Blake v. Cole, 22 Pick. 97.

It is within this latter class that the case at bar must be grouped. The authorities have not concurred entirely in the reasoning which is supposed to support the doctrine upon which these cases proceed. Chancellor Cooper in Macey v. Childress, 2 Tenn. Ch. 438, says they "may be safely rested on the well-established doctrine that a surety may by parol limit the extent of his liability as between him and the other parties to the paper." Mickley v. Stock-sleger distinguishes Nugent v. Wolfe, in that the latter case "was in no way connected with the original cause of action; he was not a party liable, and it did not appear that he had any personal interest in the judgment on which the plaintiff was the only bail for the stay of execution." Mr. Browne ventures a reason for which he declares that none other exists so satisfactory or consistent with the spirit of the statute. The reason is alike applicable to the second and third classes above enumerated. The troublesome element in the cases is that by the hypothesis there are, or are to be, two different persons concurrently liable to the plaintiff to do the same duty. He says: "The implied obligation of the third party exists only by force of, and incidental to, the special contract between the plaintiff and defendant," and "that the statute contemplates only obligations of the third party previously existing or incurred contemporaneously with the defendant's special promise, or afterwards, as the case may be, but always existing, or to exist, independently of any contract of guaranty between the plaintiff and defendant: an obligation which exists, or may exist, whether any contract be made between the plaintiff and defendant or not; not an obligation which comes into existence only as a legal incident of the contract which they have made." Browne, Stat. Fr. § 162.

But, seek where you will for a plausible footing upon which to found the obligation so as not to come within the purview of the statute of frauds, the distinction taken in Green v. Cresswell, of Thomas v. Cook, that the promisee became likewise bound upon the obligation with the promisor, as cosureties, and for this reason, if not also for the reason upon which the second class is supported,—that it is not an undertaking with the creditor,—the indemnity is not within the statute, whether adequate or not, has taken deep hold in the judicial mind, and the undoubted weight of authority in this country is grounded upon it. Indeed, the doctrine is even regarded as settled. Mr. Throop, in his treatise on the Validity of Verbal Agreements (§ 474), says: "As the result of the conflict of authority upon this question [speaking generally of contracts of indemnity against a surety's liability], nothing can be regarded as definitely settled, except, perhaps, that, where the promisor and promisee are about to unite in an instrument as sureties for the third person, the promise to indemnify is not within the statute." If one cosurety can, by a verbal undertaking, indemnify another in whole against the obligation of the latter, without suffering the interdiction of the statute, he may also in part, as the greater includes the less; and thus it is that cosureties may, by contract, agreement, or understanding between themselves, limit and fix the proportion and extent of their several or correlative liability, and it is competent to establish the agreement by parol. So we conclude that it was competent for the plaintiff and defendant to enter into such a contract or agreement as is set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and the fact that it is not in writing cannot be taken as an objection against its enforcement.

Now as to the question whether, in view of the evidence, the court erred in taking the case from the jury and sustaining the motion for nonsuit. Without intimating any opinion as to the weight and effect to be given to the testimony,—that being a matter for the jury to determine,—and without recapitulation here, let it suffice to say that we deem the evidence introduced competent and sufficient to go to the jury for their consideration whether or not there was such an agreement entered into between the parties touching their correlative liabilities as plaintiff has alleged by his complaint. Tippin v. Ward, 5 Or. 453; Brown v. Oregon Lumber Co. 24 Or. 317; Vanbeber v. Plunkett, 26 Or. 562, 27 L. R. A. 811; Baldwin v. Fleming, 90 Ind. 177.

Let an order be entered remanding the case for a new trial.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

Patrick HAGGERTY, Appt.,

v.

Mary J. WAGNER.

(.....Ind.....)

1. A wife's inchoate interest under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652, in real property owned by her husband as a tenant in common, may be extinguished by a partition sale notwithstanding the Indiana statutes make no provision for the partition of her inchoate right and the courts are not authorized to direct the payment of any part of the proceeds to her upon such a sale.

2. A statute providing that a judicial sale of a man's property in a suit to which his wife is not a party shall not prejudice her dower rights has no effect in case of a sale for partition of land in which he has an undivided interest, where another statute designating the persons to be made parties to partition proceedings does not recognize her as a necessary one.

3. The interest of a woman in an undivided share of real estate held by her husband in common with others, which is contingent on her surviving him, does not bring her within the provisions of a statute authorizing persons to be made parties to partition proceedings who are "necessary to complete determination or settlement of the questions involved,"—especially where there is no authority to award her any of the proceeds of the sale.

4. The inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant of real estate is subject to the liability of the husband's estate to be devested by a partition sale.

5. The effect of the deed in a partition

NOTE.—The Indiana law as to rights of wife in husband's property is peculiar to itself. For the kindred question of dower, see Flowers v. Flowers (Ga.) 18 L. R. A. 76, and note; also Butler v. Fitzgerald (Neb.) 27 L. R. A. 232.

sale is not reduced to that merely of co-owners so as to leave the property subject to the inchoate dower rights of their wives, by a statute providing that the conveyances shall bar all claims of such owners to said lands as effectually as if they themselves had executed the same.

6. The inchoate right of a wife under Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652, in land held by her husband as a cotenant, may be barred by a partition sale in an action to which she was not a party, notwithstanding Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2663, providing that no sale of the husband's property by virtue of any decree to which she shall not be a party shall affect her rights, as that section applies only where the wife is a necessary party, which she is not in such action.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to obtain partition of certain real estate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ayres & Jones and Caroline B. Hendricks, for appellant:

The wife's inchoate interest in husband's real estate is a matter subject to legislative control.

Noel v. Ewing, 9 Ind. 37; May v. Fletcher, 40 Ind. 575; Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355; Lawrence v. Miller, 1 Sandf. 516, Overruled 2 N. Y. 245, upon another point; Jackson v. Edwards, 7 Paige, 386; Davis v. Lang, 153 Ill. 175; 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 208, *158; Story, Conf. L. § 109; Park, Dower, 5.

The wife's inchoate right is an incident of the husband's seisin, and this seisin may be terminated at any time by authority of the legislature in sale under partition.

Moore v. New York, 4 Sandf. 456; Jackson v. Edwards, 23 Wend. 498.

It is an incident to an estate held in common that the tenant can be compelled to make partition.

Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, 64 Am. Dec. 262; Potter v. Wheeler, 18 Mass. 506; 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 208, *158.

The law gives the wife an inchoate interest in the real estate of her husband as against the voluntary act of the husband, and not as against legislative provision for the general good.

Jackson v. Edwards, 22 Wend. 519; Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 552, 67 Am. Dec. 355.

The wife is not a necessary party, and her appearance in suit could not affect her interests therein.

Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 404, 16 L. R. A. 776; 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 208, *158; Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, 64 Am. Dec. 262.

It was the legislative intent to divest the wife of her inchoate interest without making her a party to the proceedings.

Davis v. Lang, 153 Ill. 175; Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355; Hinds v. Stevens, 45 Mo. 209; Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, 64 Am. Dec. 262.

Mr. T. E. Johnson, for appellee:

Mrs. Wagner had an inchoate interest in the land at the time the partition proceedings were instituted in May, 1856, which interest under the rulings of this court she took by purchase.

Richardson v. Schultz, 98 Ind. 435.

The title of the wife, when it vests, is absolute as against a grantee of the husband, so that it does not merely encumber the land, but tears up the title from the very roots.

Bever v. North, 107 Ind. 548; Tanguay v. O'Connell, 132 Ind. 63; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2508.

Ample provisions are made for the ascertaining and the settling the rights of the parties in the land, and if the land cannot be divided without damage to the owners, and consequently has to be sold, the court has power to adjust and secure the rights of the parties in the proceeds of such sale.

Milligan v. Poole, 35 Ind. 63; Martindale v. Alexander, 26 Ind. 104, 89 Am. Dec. 458; Schissel v. Dickson, 129 Ind. 149.

To give validity and effect to a partition all persons interested should be made parties to the suit.

Milligan v. Poole, 35 Ind. 63.

The inchoate rights of the wife are as much entitled to protection as the vested rights of the widow.

Fletcher v. Holmes, 32 Ind. 537; Mills v. Van Voorhies, 20 N. Y. 420; Bell v. New York, 10 Paige, 49.

Of the right of a surviving wife to one third of the land of which the husband was seised during coverture, she cannot be deprived by any act of the husband alone; and any attempt to defraud her of her marital rights cannot receive the sanction of the law.

Johnson v. Miller, 47 Ind. 376, 17 Am. Rep. 699.

Dower was given by our statutes for the support and maintenance of the widows, and to permit any act of the husband to lessen or injure that right would be in direct opposition to the spirit and meaning of the law.

Runk v. Hanna, 6 Ind. 22; Knapp, Partition, p. 238; Foltz v. Wert, 103 Ind. 413; Elliott v. Cole, 113 Ind. 393; Verry v. Robinson, 25 Ind.

19, 87 Am. Dec. 346; Francisco v. Hendricks, 28 Ill. 67.

Where the inchoate right of dower is affected by decree, the wife is a necessary party to the action.

Damm v. Moon, 48 Mich. 510; Rosekrans v. Rosekrans, 7 Lans. 486; Greiner v. Klein, 28 Mich. 17.

Neither the husband nor the court, nor any other human power, can compel the wife to relinquish her right of dower, inchoate though it may be, when she is asking the aid of the court.

Royston v. Royston, 21 Ga. 172; Lawson v. De Bolt, 78 Ind. 567.

The universal rule of the courts of Ohio, with the single exception of Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355, has been that a wife's inchoate dower rights can in no regard be affected by an action at law or in chancery, to which she is not a party.

McCabe, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee sued appellant in the superior court for partition of lots 16 and 17 in Hannaman's south addition to the city of Indianapolis, and to quiet her title to her alleged proportion thereof. The action was commenced May 3, 1894. The issues formed were submitted to and tried by the court, resulting in a special finding of facts, upon which the court stated conclusions of law favorable to the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered pursuant to the conclusions of law, in favor of the appellee. The conclusions of law are assigned for error.

The material facts found are, in substance, that appellee, Mary J. Wagner, and said Peter Wagner were married on November 22, 1855, in Clay county, Indiana, where they lived together as husband and wife until May 11, 1887, when said Peter died intestate, leaving an estate of less than $5,000, and left surviving him said Mary J. as his widow, together with five children. At and prior to May 16, 1856, said Peter Wagner, the husband of appellee, was the owner in fee simple of an undivided interest in a tract of land of about 6 acres, situated in Marion county, Indiana, out of which the lots in dispute have been carved. At said date he and some ten other persons held the aforesaid tract, undivided, as tenants in common. On said May 16, 1856, proceedings for partition were instituted by said Peter Wagner and others of his cotenants against the cotenant George Wagner in the common pleas court of said county. At the trial of that cause the land sought to be partitioned was found not to be susceptible of division, and the same was by the court ordered to be sold as an entirety, and David S. Beaty was appointed a commissioner to make the sale thereof; and in pursuance of such order he sold said real estate to William Smith, and executed to him a commissioner's deed for the same, which deed was approved by the court, and duly recorded, and the proceeds arising from the sale were paid to and divided among the parties to the action according to their respective shares and rights. The appellee, the wife of said Peter, at the time said former action for partition was commenced, was not in any manner made a party plaintiff or defendant to said action, nor did she join in any manner therein, neither was she notified of the pendency thereof, and had no knowledge of said partition proceedings until after the death of her said husband. She never joined her husband at any time in the conveyance of any part of said real estate, nor in any manner or form did she dispose of her inchoate interest therein by her own act. Through meane conveyances from said Smith and his grantees, appellant, Patrick Haggerty, was seised by deed of conveyance of said lots 16 and 17. The conclusions of law are to the effect that appellee, Mary J. Wagner, is the owner in fee simple of an undivided one third of her deceased husband's interest in said real estate, and that appellant, Patrick Haggerty, is the owner of the residue thereof.

The ground upon which the conclusion that appellee, Mary J. Wagner, is the owner of a moiety of the real estate in question is based, as we learn from appellee's brief and a written opinion filed by the learned judge of the trial court, is that, by failure to make her a party to the prior partition proceedings, her inchoate interest in said lands as the wife of Peter Wagner was not extinguished by the partition sale. The question thus raised is a new one in this court, the same never having been directly decided before, nor has the question ever previously been before or considered by this court. The question has been considered and decided by other courts of last resort under statutes somewhat similar to our own. Some of those courts have decided the question one way, and some the other. We therefore feel called upon to consider the question upon principle before reviewing the decisions. The question, primarily, is this: Is it necessary, in a partition suit between cotenants, where one of the cotenants has a wife living at the time the partition proceedings are had, to make such wife a party thereto in order to make such proceedings binding on her in case she outlives her husband, and becomes his surviving widow? The discussion has taken a wide range, involving a consideration of various statutes. Great stress is laid upon Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2491), which was in force at the time the prior partition proceedings took place. It provides, among other things, that "a surviving wife is entitled, except as in § 17 . . . excepted, to one third of all the real estate of which her husband may have been seised in fee simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined, in due form of law." The only exception in § 17 is in favor of creditors where the real estate exceeds in value $10,000, in which case the widow, as against such creditors, only takes one fourth, instead of a third, and where such real estate exceeds in value $20,000 she takes, as against such creditors, one fifth, instead of a third. These exceptions have no application to the facts in this case, and hence no bearing. The sweeping language that she is entitled to one third of all real estate of which her husband may have been seised in fee simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined in due form of law, is subject to exceptions not mentioned in the statute of descents, which arise out of other laws and the evident intent of the legislature. For instance, it has no force where the husband's title was devested before the section took effect. Taylor v. Sample, 51 Ind. 423. And where liens existed on the lands at the time the marriage took place, such liens may be enforced so as to extinguish her inchoate interest in the land, even though she do not join with her husband in any form of conveyance of the land. Armstrong v. McLaughlin, 49 Ind. 370; Eiseman v. Finch, 79 Ind. 511. And the same is true where the lien existed at the time the husband became seised of the land. Kissel v. Eaton, 64 Ind. 248; Godfrey v. Cragcraft, 81 Ind. 476; Vandeender v. Moore, 146 Ind. 44. And so it has been held by this court, and correctly, we think, that, where land was conveyed by its owner to another, so that other could mortgage it to the school fund to secure a loan for the benefit of the grantor, and then such grantee conveyed the land back to the grantor, without the wife of such first grantee joining in the conveyance, and afterwards he died, leaving his wife surviving him, she was not entitled, under this section, to any part of such land, though she came within the very letter of the statute, because, in analogy to the common-law inchoate right of dower, the seisin of the husband was only instantaneous, and hence insufficient to create the inchoate right. Johnson v. Plume, 77 Ind. 166. Again, where real estate is appropriated upon compensation in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or in case of the dedication of lands of the husband to public use in making highways, canals, railroads, streets, and the like, the inchoate right of dower, or its substitute, the inchoate right of the wife to one third in fee simple in her husband's lands, is extinguished without her joining in any deed therefor, or being made a party thereto in any manner or form. Duncan v. Terre Haute, 85 Ind. 104; Indianapolis v. Kingsbury, 101 Ind. 200, 51 Am. Rep. 749. In the first one of the two cases last cited above it is said, on pages 106 and 107, that "the courts of this country seem to have uniformly held, when the question has come before them, that when lands are appropriated by the exercise of eminent domain, or what is said to be equivalent to it, the dedication of lands to public use, the dower of the wife is defeated. Gwynne v. Cincinnati, 8 Ohio, 24, 17 Am. Dec. 576; Moore v. New York, 4 Sandf. 456, affirmed in the court of appeals, 8 N. Y. 110, 59 Am. Dec. 473; Jackson v. Edwards, 7 Paige, 386; 1 Scribner, Dower, pp. 550-555. Dillon, in his treatise on Municipal Corporations, 2d ed. § 459, says: 'As dower is not the result of contract, but is a positive legislative institution, it is constitutionally competent for the legislature to authorize lands to be taken by a municipal corporation for a market, street, or other public use, upon an appraisal and payment of their value to the husband, the holder of the fee, and such taking and payment will confer an absolute title devested of any inchoate right of dower. Nor is a widow dowerable in lands dedicated by her husband in his lifetime to the public, where the dedication is complete, or has been accepted and acted upon by the municipal authorities.' Washburn, in treating of the various modes in which dower may be defeated, says: 'One mode in which dower may be defeated remains to be mentioned, and that is, by the exercise of eminent domain during the life of the husband, or, what is equivalent to it, the dedication of land to the public use.' [1 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. p. 269]. In Moore v. New York, 4 Sandf. 456, the court, in speaking of a former decision, says: 'We then held that the wife's right of dower was merely inchoate during the life of the husband, and that she had no vested or certain interest in his lands. The right being merely an incident to the marriage relation, it seems to us that while this right is thus inchoate, and before it has become vested by the death of the husband, any regulation of it may be made by the legislature, though its operation is, in effect, to divest the right; the marriage relation itself being within the power of the legislature to modify, or even abolish, it.'"

These several exceptions to the full force and effect of the section of our statute of descents quoted above manifestly arise out of other statutes and laws creating rights in other persons paramount to the inchoate right of the wife in the lands of her husband. Dower having been abolished by the Revision of 1852, it has often been said by this court that the provision made for the widow in her husband's real estate by the same revision was a substitute for dower, and many of the rules that had been previously applied to dower have since been applied to the substitute. Two provisions in favor of the widow in lieu of, or as a substitute for, dower in her husband's real estate, have been made by the revision of 1852, and since re-enacted, and now in force. One of them is the section already quoted, and the other is the old § 17 of our statute of descents (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2640; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2483). This section provides that, "if a husband die testate or intestate, leaving a widow, one third of his real estate shall descend to her in fee simple," etc. The widow takes, under this section, as heir of her husband. Rusing v. Rusing, 25 Ind. 63; May v. Fletcher, 40 Ind. 575; Bowen v. Preston, 48 Ind. 367; Brown v. Harmon, 78 Ind. 412; Derry v. Derry, 74 Ind. 560; Hendrix v. McBeth, 87 Ind. 287. But the widow does not take, under § 27 old number (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2652, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2491), first above quoted, as heir, but by virtue of her marital rights. Bowen v. Preston, 48 Ind. 367; Brannon v. May, 42 Ind. 92; Johnson v. Miller, 47 Ind. 376, 17 Am. Rep. 699; Hendrix v. McBeth, 87 Ind. 287; McKinney v. Smith, 106 Ind. 404. And therefore the interest the widow takes under said section is more like dower than the interest which she takes under the other section, where it provides that one third of her husband's real estate shall descend to her. This provision impliedly requires that her husband shall die seised of the real estate mentioned therein, because it could not descend from him to her if he did not die seised of it. The other section, and the one here involved, only requires it to be real estate of which her husband may have been seised in fee simple at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined in due form of law. That was the precise quality of dower at common law, except that it was a life estate in one third of all lands "as were her husband's at any time during the coverture." 1 Greenl. Cruise, *165. In Johnson v. Plume, 77 Ind. 166,—being a case where the surviving widow was asserting her right to land once owned by her husband, and in the conveyance of which she had not joined him, founding her claim on the same section relied on by the appellee here,—this court, after quoting the section, said: "By the terms of this statute a surviving wife is entitled to one third of all the real estate of which the husband was seised at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she did not join. The appellee's husband was seised of the land in dispute, and, as she did not join him in the conveyance made to James Gallately, she is within the letter of the statute; and, if the statute is to be literally construed, her claim must prevail. At the common law a widow was entitled to dower in all lands of which her husband was seised at any time during coverture, and in the conveyance of which she did not join. This was the law in this state before the present statute was enacted. Since its enactment she is entitled to a third in fee. The statute merely enlarges her rights, by substituting a third in fee for a dower interest, but does not otherwise change them; therefore, she cannot claim a third in fee in any lands in which she could not have claimed dower before the adoption of the statute. At the common law she could not claim dower in lands held by her husband as trustee, nor in such as he had held by an instantaneous seisin. These rules apply under the statute, and, if the appellee's husband's seisin was instantaneous, or that of a trustee, she cannot recover." As before observed, it was held that the seisin of the husband was for a particular purpose, and therefore a mere instantaneous seisin, and hence she could not recover.

No reason has been suggested, nor can we think of any, why the inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant of real estate may not be extinguished by a partition sale without making her a party, as well as in cases where the husband's title is divested before the section took effect, in cases where liens existed on the land at the time the marriage took place, in cases where liens on the land existed at the time the husband became seised, in cases where his seisin was only for a temporary purpose, and in cases where the husband's land is appropriated upon compensation in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or in cases of the dedication of lands of the husband to public use in making highways, canals, railroads, streets, market places, cemeteries, and the like. But it is earnestly and ably contended by appellee's learned counsel that another section (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499), imperatively requires the wife to be made a party in such a case, or the proceedings will be void as to her. That section was in force when the prior partition proceedings took place, and it reads as follows: "No act or conveyance, performed or executed by the husband without the assent of his wife, evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof in the manner required by law; or any sale, disposition, transfer, or encumbrance of the husband's property by virtue of any decree, execution, or mortgage to which she shall not be party (except as provided otherwise in this act), shall prejudice or extinguish the right of the wife to her third of his lands or to her jointure, or preclude her from the recovery thereof, if otherwise entitled thereto." It is not claimed—as it could not reasonably be—that the first clause of the section is applicable to the case. But the last clause is relied on with great confidence by the appellee. It is earnestly insisted that the latter clause expressly provides that no decree to which she shall not be a party "shall prejudice or extinguish the right of the wife to her third in his [her husband's] lands." Plain and imperative as this language is, it must receive a construction, because, as we have already seen, this court has held in the various cases above mentioned that the wife's inchoate interest in her husband's land may be extinguished by proceedings to which she was not a party; and this, too, while the section just quoted was in full force. This section must be construed along with a section of the Code of Civil Procedure hereinafter referred to, and relied on by appellee as establishing the law as to necessary parties in partition proceedings. The reason why the two sections must be construed together is that they relate to the same subject, namely, necessary parties to actions resulting in judgments and decrees. The reason why this section cannot be so construed as to require persons to be made parties who are unnecessary is that to do so brings it into conflict with the section of the Code already referred to. The law requires us to construe these two sections in pari materia, and to give effect to each, if possible. State v. Rackley, 2 Blackf. 249; Indiana Central Canal Co. v. State, 53 Ind. 575; Stout v. Grant County Comrs. 107 Ind. 243. To construe the section last quoted so as to require persons to be made parties who are unnecessary parties is to bring it into conflict with the section of the Code referred to. But it may be harmonized with that section by construing its requirements as to parties to relate to such parties, and to such parties only, as are necessary parties. Any other construction requires us to conclude that the legislature intended to declare by law that in certain cases persons should be made parties to certain actions who are wholly unnecessary, and that a failure to make unnecessary parties should cause the overthrow of the judgments and decrees of the courts in such proceedings. It is too clear for controversy that the legislature had no such intention. And the inquiry naturally arises, why it is not necessary to make the wife a party when her husband's land is to be taken to make a public highway, or when the same is to be appropriated upon compensation for a railroad right of way? The only answer to this question is that, if she were made a party, there is nothing that she could do to protect her inchoate interest. There is no answer she could make that would qualify or prevent the appropriation. She could only answer, "I am the wife of the owner," and that fact would be disclosed by the complaint, if she were made a party. There is no issue she could tender, and no issue could be tendered to her. Therefore, if she were made a party to such a proceeding, she would not be a party to any issue, nor could she, as such a party, do anything to protect her inchoate right. The cases to which we have referred show that the section last cited has not been given such a broad scope in meaning by this court as to allow a surviving wife to recover her third in lands of her husband, taken without her becoming a party thereto, in the various modes of appropriation enumerated above, though its sweeping language would, at first blush, seem to warrant a contrary ruling. The leading idea in the section is that she must be a party to certain acts or proceedings touching her inchoate interest. It evidently was not intended by the latter clause of the section to make any new law on the subject of necessary parties. The provision was enacted in view of the law as it then and still exists as to parties. In other words, it would be absurd to suppose the legislature meant that the wife should be made a party in those cases where it could affect nothing, as well as those cases where it could. And the law requires us to adopt that construction which leads to no absurdity, if the statute is susceptible of such a construction. Jeffersonville v. Weems, 5 Ind. 547; Storms v. Stevens, 104 Ind. 46. There are many cases within the purview of the section, if the wife was made a party, wherein it would enable her to protect her inchoate interest. But we have seen that this court has held, in the face of the section in question, that in appropriations of the husband's land by the exercise of the power of eminent domain, or in dedication of lands for public uses on compensation, the inchoate interest of the wife is extinguished without her consent, and without making her a party. This is at least an implied holding that there are cases falling within the unqualified language of the section where the wife's inchoate interest may be extinguished without her consent, and without making her a party. This holding can only be upheld on the ground that the requirement of the section that she be made a party, without which her right is not extinguished, must be so construed as to require her to be made a party in those cases only in which, if a party, she could prevent the extinguishment of her inchoate right, or in some way secure some benefit to herself on account of that right. Where she could not accomplish any of these things if made a party, it is idle to say that the legislature intended by the section quoted to require her to be made a party, and for failure to do such an idle and nugatory act her interest should not be extinguished and the partition sale be overthrown. We shall hereafter see that it could not possibly benefit her to make her a party to partition proceedings of lands where her husband is a cotenant, any more than in cases of appropriation of her husband's land in the exercise of eminent domain, or in dedications thereof to public uses.

Some reliance is placed by the appellee upon the Code of Civil Procedure to support the contention that she was a necessary party to the partition sale. 2 Gavin & H. Stat. § 626, then in force, required the pleadings and practice in partition proceedings to conform to the Code. Two sections of the Code as it then and now stands are relied upon to establish that appellee was a necessary party to the partition proceedings. 2 Gavin & H. Stat. § 17, p. 45, provides that "all persons having an interest in the subject of the action . . . shall be joined as plaintiffs." Appellee's husband was one of the plaintiffs in the partition proceedings resulting in the sale, but her learned counsel do not say whether she ought to have been a plaintiff or a defendant. Her counsel also quote and rely on § 18, p. 46, 2 Gavin & H. Stat., which provides that "any person may be made a defendant who has, or claims, an interest in the controversy, . . . or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the questions involved." The latter clause of this section is confessedly the one, and the only part of either section, that has any bearing on the question before us. And it requires no one to be made a party defendant except he be a necessary party. This lands us back where we started, to begin afresh with the inquiry who are necessary parties? We have already seen that the wife is not a necessary party to proceedings to appropriate her husband's land, and to dedications thereof for public uses. This court has indirectly decided in Paulus v. Latta, 93 Ind. 84, that she is not a necessary party either in partition suits where her husband is a cotenant, or in appropriation or dedication cases, in holding that her inchoate interest is not the subject of an action. On page 88 of that case it is said: "The appellee suggests that the complaint contains a good cause of action against Paulus to remove the cloud upon her inchoate interest as the wife of the defendant Latta. But such inchoate interest is not a present estate. It cannot be conveyed by itself. McCormick v. Hunter, 50 Ind. 186. It gives no right of entry. Strong v. Bragg, 7 Blackf. 62. It is not the subject of an action; it constitutes no diminution of the husband's present estate; he may convey his entire estate without her, and the purchaser will hold it subject only to be divested of one third of it on certain contingencies." If the inchoate interest of the wife is not the subject of an action while the husband lives, it would seem to follow that it would not be the subject of a defense. And even one of the cases cited by appellee—Thompson v. McCorkle, 136 Ind. 484, and 497—affords strong support to this position in holding that, "by virtue of this statute, during the lifetime of the husband, the wife had an inchoate right in the real estate in controversy contingent upon her surviving him, and which could not become absolute except by his death. Her claim during the entire interval was in such a position that it could not be asserted by anyone. The case was not one of mere disability growing out of coverture. Strictly speaking she had no estate in the premises, it was a mere expectancy." If she had no estate in the premises, had nothing but a mere expectancy, which could not be asserted by anybody, what necessity was there to make her a party? Certainly none, if we are to follow logic and sound reason. If there was no necessity to make her a party, then she was not a necessary party within the meaning of the provisions of the Code of 1852, quoted above. Barbour, Parties to Actions, at page 330, says: "No one need be made a party plaintiff in whom there exists no interest; and no one need be made a party defendant from whom nothing is demanded. . . . A mere contingent interest is insufficient. . . . No one need be made a party who disclaims all interest, . . . nor one who would not be at liberty to answer, and contest the right to the relief prayed for." The author cites the following adjudged cases that fully support the text: Kerr v. Watts, 19 U. S. 6 Wheat. 550, 5 L. ed. 328; Bailey v. Ingles, 2 Paige, 278; Lee v. Colston, 5 T. B. Mon. 245.

Now let us inquire whether the appellee could have effected anything in the way of the protection of her inchoate interest if she had been made a party. All the authorities on both sides of the question we are discussing agree in holding that the inchoate right of dower, or the inchoate right of the wife to one third of her husband's land, subsists by virtue of the seisin of the husband, and that this right is always subject to any encumbrance, infirmity, or incident which the law attaches to the seisin, either at the time of the marriage or at the time the husband became seised. A liability to be divested by a partition sale is an incident which the law affixes to all estates of cotenants, and the inchoate right of the wife of such cotenant is subject to this incident, unless it is superior to, and independent of, the husband's title; and that would hardly be contended for by anyone. They also likewise agree that, if she is made a party, she cannot prevent a partition, and, in a proper case, she cannot prevent a partition sale. They also agree that, in case the real estate can be divided according to the interests of the cotenants, the decree is binding on the wife of a cotenant without making her a party to the proceedings. It is also agreed by the authorities referred to that the wife's interest in the husband's share, without her presence in court, or any order of court, will at once attach to the portion set off to him. This concession carries with it the logical sequence that the wife of a cotenant is not a necessary party to a partition proceeding, whether there is a sale or not. But, suppose she is made a party in such a case where a sale is to take place, what can she do? The partition statute then and still in force practically answers the question. It provides that "the moneys arising from such sale, after payment of just costs and expenses, shall be paid by such commissioner to the persons entitled thereto, according to their respective shares." 2 Gavin & H. Stat. p. 865, § 23. We have seen that the wife of a cotenant has no share in the lands of her husband while he lives. Therefore no money can be paid to her on such a sale, even if she be made a party, unless there is some other statute or law that modifies or radically changes this statute by expanding its provisions so as to require the payment of only a part of the proportion of the proceeds of the sale due to the cotenant, according to his share of the real estate, who has a wife, and requiring the balance to be paid to her. We know of no such statute. On the contrary, the only law that confers on her the interest she holds in her husband's real estate is the section of the statute first above quoted. By it all her rights in her husband's real estate of which he was seised at any time during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she did not join, is created and conferred; and by it her rights therein must be measured and limited; and by it no right in such real estate can ever become consummate or vested in her so to enjoy, possess, or control it unless she becomes his surviving widow. If, therefore, any portion of it is handed over and delivered to her to enjoy and possess before the happening of that event, it must be by virtue of judge-made law. And it is universally agreed that judge-made law is bad law, not because such law may not be just, but because under our system of jurisprudence and by the Constitution all lawmaking power has been carefully withheld from the courts, and exclusively vested in the legislature. See Const. art. 4, § 1; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 97 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 97); also Const. art. 3, § 1; Rev. Stat. 1894, § 96 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 96). It is true that such inchoate interest, while it cannot be conveyed separate from her husband's title, yet she may release it by joining with her husband in the conveyance of his real estate. And the release thus made by the wife is a sufficient consideration to support a promise to her. Jarboe v. Severin, 85 Ind. 496; Green v. Groves, 109 Ind. 519; Worley v. Sipe, 111 Ind. 288; Howlett v. Ditts, 4 Ind. App. 28; Worth v. Patton, 5 Ind. App. 272.

But that is the subject of contract and not the institution of the statute. If the courts undertake to hand over to the wife a portion of the husband's share of the proceeds of a partition sale, it may result in giving her a part of her husband's real estate to own and control, though the event never happens upon which her right to do so is, by the statute, expressly made to depend, namely, to become his surviving widow. Either of two contingencies may happen by which she may never become his surviving widow. One is, she may die first; and the other is that the marriage may be dissolved by a divorce. And yet, if any portion of the husband's share of the proceeds of a partition sale were given her by the court, she would be possessing and controlling it in violation of the statute that creates, measures, and limits her rights in her husband's real estate. It was wisely supposed by statesmen and lawyers that it required an express legislative enactment to make the inchoate interest of the wife become absolute, and vest in her during the life of the husband, as seen by the act of 1875, in case of judicial sales of her husband's real estate. Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2669 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2508). That act does not apply to this case so as to enable the courts to give the wife a portion of the husband's share of the proceeds of a partition sale, for two reasons: First, it was not in force when these proceedings took place; and, secondly, the second section thereof provides that it shall not apply to sales of real estate upon judgments rendered prior to the taking effect of the act, nor to any sale of real property of the aggregate value of $20,000 and over, except to so much of such real property as shall not exceed in value the sum of $20,000; thus indicating the legislative intent to deal with creditors' judicial sales, and not partition judicial sales. So the conclusion seems absolutely irresistible that there is no law in this state authorizing the courts to award to the wife of a cotenant any portion of her husband's share of the proceeds of a partition sale. On the contrary, the express provision of the partition statute then and now in force, imperatively requires, as we have seen, that the whole of his proportion of the proceeds of the sale, according to his share in the real estate, shall be paid over to him. Therefore the latter clause of § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499), which is the same as § 85 of the law of descent of 1852, providing that no "sale, disposition, transfer, or encumbrance of the husband's property, by virtue of any decree, . . . to which she shall not be a party, . . . shall prejudice or extinguish the right of the wife to her third in his lands," etc., must be held to have no application to a case like the present, where to have made her a party could not have availed her anything, and to apply only to such cases as those in which it would have been of some possible benefit to her to have made her a party.

Some of the authorities, in view of this line of reasoning, intimate that her inchoate interest cannot be extinguished by a partition sale, whether she be made a party or not. Whether it can or not must be determined by a consideration of the probable legislative intent as disclosed in the several statutes referred to. To hold that it could not would involve the necessity of holding that the mere inchoate right, the mere expectancy, the mere possibility of a vested or consummate estate, without ever vesting or becoming consummate, may destroy the absolute vested estate of the husband, or a part of it. If such a sale cannot extinguish her inchoate right, even though she be made a party, then her husband's interest must sell for much less—perhaps a third less—than its actual value. She may die before her husband, or be divorced, in either of which cases her inchoate interest is gone, and one third in value of her husband's interest is gone for nothing; in other words it is destroyed by trying to keep alive a mere possibility of an estate in her. This brings us to the question as to whether one of these rights is paramount to the other. The authorities holding that a partition sale extinguishes the wife's inchoate right hold that the right to partition in a cotenant is paramount to the inchoate right of the wife, for the reason, we presume, that her interest or right exists by virtue of her husband's seisin, and therefore is subject to the incidents, encumbrances, and infirmities attaching to that seisin, the right to compel partition by sale being one of the incidents attaching to such seisin. But there is another reason why the right to partition by sale is paramount to the inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant, and that is, the cotenant's title is an actual present existing estate in the real property, whereas the inchoate right of the wife therein is only the possibility of such an estate accruing to the wife, dependent upon uncertain future events which may never happen, and therefore such estate may never exist. To hold that the cotenant's right to partition is not paramount to his wife's inchoate right is to hold that a present absolutely existing estate is not superior and paramount to a mere possibility of the existence of such an estate; that a mere possibility of an estate, which may never ripen into such estate, may destroy an absolutely existing estate. In other words, it is to hold that the mere shadow may destroy the actual existing substance. The right of partition, where a sale is necessary, and the inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant, cannot both exist. One or the other of these rights must give way, and be submerged. It ought not—in reason it cannot—be the paramount right. Therefore it must be the inferior right that is submerged.

In support of the contention that a partition sale, in the absence of the wife of a cotenant as a party, was intended not to extinguish the wife's inchoate right, we are cited to § 21, p. 365, 2 Gavin & H. Stat., which has been substantially continued in force by the Revision of 1881. It reads thus: "Whenever it shall appear to the court that the purchase money for the land sold has been duly paid, the court shall order such commissioner, or some other person, to execute conveyances to the purchaser, which shall bar all claims of such owners to said lands as effectually as if they themselves had executed the same." Great confidence in this statute seems to be entertained by appellee's learned counsel as affording strong support to his contention—that is, that by its terms the deed in a partition sale is to have the same force and effect as if the owners themselves had executed the same, and no more; and, if the owners themselves had executed the deed, it could not extinguish or release their wives' inchoate rights therein. But it is believed that this confidence is wholly misplaced, for two reasons, at least: If the intent of the statute is to give no greater effect to the deed than if executed by the owners, then it establishes the unreasonable proposition intimated in some of the decisions that the inchoate right of the wife of a cotenant cannot be extinguished by such a sale, even though she were made a party; because if the deed is to have no greater effect than if made by the owners, then it is to have no greater effect than if executed by the cotenant without his wife, she not being an owner. If she is an owner, within the meaning of the statute, then her right is barred, for the statute makes the deed "bar all claim of such owners to said lands." Secondly, the manifest intent of the legislature, as disclosed by an examination of the whole partition statute, was that the deed should be effectual to convey the land to the purchaser absolutely. And the language employed is sufficient to make the deed have that effect in the generality of partition sales, and such sales alone were evidently in the mind of the legislature when they employed the language they did. And yet a full consideration of the whole statute leaves no doubt in the mind that the intent was to make the deed effectual to convey the land absolutely to the grantee, because everyone knows that many—very many—cotenants are married women, infant, idiots, and persons who are non compos mentis, and, as owners, wholly incapacitated, to make a deed that would convey their interest in the land. The married woman could not convey, for want of her husband joining with her therein. And the strict language of the statute is that the deed is to be as effectual as if the owners had themselves executed the same; and yet no one could be found that would contend that a partition sale and deed would be ineffectual to convey the title of a cotenant who is a married woman, an infant, a non compos mentis, or a lunatic, under the operation of the statute quoted. This must be so, because it was the evident intent, as gleaned from the several parts of the whole statute, that a partition sale and deed should be effectual to convey the land of the several owners absolutely, and vest the owners' title thereto in the purchaser. The settled law requires us to give effect to that intent, so as to make it prevail over the literal import of particular terms used, and control the strict letter of such terms when the letter would lead to injustice, as would be the case here. Smith v. Moore, 90 Ind. 294; Indianapolis v. Huesels, 115 Ind. 581; Lime City Bldg. Loan & Sav. Assn. v. Black, 136 Ind. 544; May v. Hoover, 112 Ind. 455; Parvin v. Wimberg, 180 Ind. 561, 15 L. R. A. 775; Storrs v. Stevens, 104 Ind. 46, Stout v. Grant County Comrs. 107 Ind. 343.

It follows from what we have said that upon principle the partition sale and deed in question vested in the purchaser the entire title to the real property in question, and extinguished the inchoate interest of the appellee herein.

We will now consider how the question stands upon authority. It is claimed that the rule established by the courts of New York is that a partition sale does not extinguish the contingent right of the wife of one of the cotenants. The decisions of that state are conflicting. The condition of the adjudications on the question in New York is so accurately and tersely stated by Mr. Freeman in his work on Cotenancy and Partition, in § 474, at pages 630, 631, that we appropriate his language: "Hence we find Chancellor Walworth stating that 'as a feme covert cannot be bound by a decree against her husband in a partition suit to which she is not a party, it seems to be proper, in all cases where a sale of the property will probably be necessary, that the wife should be joined with her husband as a party to the suit, so that the purchaser's interest in the premises may be charged with her contingent claim of dower.' But Vice Chancellor McCoun, of New York, held that it was immaterial whether the wife was made a party to the suit or not, 'because a decree for sale and conveyance by a master will not bar her right of dower in her husband's share of the lands in the event of her surviving him.' He justified this decision on the ground that as nothing in the statute of that state expressly declared 'a divestment of the dower initiate of a wife of a joint tenant or tenant in common upon a sale, nothing so materially affecting her legal rights ought to be taken by implication.' The same vice chancellor, in a subsequent case, expressed similar views, and sustained them with some very clear and satisfactory reasoning. On appeal this portion of the vice chancellor's decision was reversed by the chancellor, who determined: (1) That the statutes of the state, though containing no direct provisions on the subject, clearly contemplated that the wife's right of dower should be discharged by the partition sale, 'and that a purchaser under the judgment or decree will be protected against any future claim on her part, both in equity and at law;' (2) that it was the duty of the court to make such disposition of the sale 'as may be necessary to secure to the wife a fair equivalent for the value of her contingent right of dower, in case she survives her husband.' From this decision of the chancellor an appeal was prosecuted to the court of errors. In this court the only opinions given were those of Bronson, judge, and Verplanck, senator. The former agreed with the vice chancellor, holding (1) that the wife's right of dower was not affected by the sale; (2) that the direction to invest a just portion of the proceeds of the sale for the benefit of the wife was an assumption of legislative prerogative. Senator Verplanck concurred with the chancellor. Both the judge and the senator united in the view that the decision of this question was immaterial, and the case was, therefore, disposed of on other grounds. So the question of the effect of a sale in partition upon the dower interests of the wives of cotenants, in the absence of provisions in the statutes directly controlling the subject, may be considered as still unsettled in New York. Its further discussion was rendered unnecessary by the passage, in the year [1840] succeeding the final decision of Jackson v. Edwards, of a statute providing for the interest of the wife in accordance with the suggestions and directions contained in the opinion of the chancellor, to which we have before referred. But in other states where the question has arisen the courts have been disposed to treat the sale in partition as conveying title paramount to the wife's right of dower." And that is what the New York statute provides for. So it must be regarded that, the New York decisions being both ways, and no final determination of the question ever having taken place in the court of last resort in that state, the adjudications there do not place that state on either side of the question.

In Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355, it is held in a very able opinion by Brinkerhoff, J., speaking for the whole court, that a partition sale and deed without making the wife of a cotenant a party extinguishes her inchoate right of dower under statutes similar to our own, and passes the entire estate to the purchaser. Appellee's learned counsel contend that the case just cited has been overruled by the supreme court of Ohio in the following cases: Black v. Kuhlman, 30 Ohio St. 196; Unger v. Leiter, 32 Ohio St. 210; Dingman v. Dingman, 39 Ohio St. 172; Mandel v. McClave, 46 Ohio St. 407, 5 L. R. A. 519. We have examined these cases, and find they do not even touch the subject, much less do they overrule the doctrine laid down in Weaver v. Gregg that a partition sale extinguishes the inchoate right of dower of the wife of one of the cotenants without making her a party. The following cases hold to the same doctrine 89 L. R. A. announced by the Ohio supreme court: Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, 64 Am. Dec. 262; Hinds v. Stevens, 45 Mo. 209; Davis v. Lang, 153 Ill. 175; Sire v. St. Louis, 22 Mo. 206; Mitchell v. Farriah, 69 Md. 285; Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 404, 16 L. R. A. 776. The only case of a court of last resort holding a contrary doctrine is Greiner v. Klein, 28 Mich. 12, and this adjudication stands alone against the great current of adjudged cases in the United States. It alone supports appellee's contention. There is sufficient difference between the Michigan partition statute and our own to furnish some plausible reasons for reaching the conclusion arrived at by the Michigan supreme court, and especially as the Michigan statute was literally borrowed and copied from the New York partition statute and at the time the Michigan decision was made the prevailing view of the New York courts was such as to lead to the Michigan decision. And yet the reasoning is very faulty by which the majority of the Michigan court reached their conclusion. An able dissenting opinion was delivered by Justice Campbell in a course of reasoning so conclusive and unanswerable as to greatly weaken, if not destroy, the force of the prevailing opinion as authority outside of the state of Michigan. We therefore conclude that the overwhelming weight of judicial opinion is against appellee's contention.

Washburn on Real Property states the law thus: "The wife of a tenant in common holds her inchoate right of dower so completely subject to the incidents of such an estate, that she not only takes her dower out of such part only of the common estate as shall have been set to her husband in partition, but if, by law, the entire estate should be sold in order to effect a partition, she loses by such sale all claim to the land, although no party to such proceeding." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 208, *158. We therefore conclude, both upon principle and the overwhelming weight of authority, that appellee was not a necessary party to the former partition proceedings, and that the sale and deed therein extinguished her inchoate right to one third of her husband's share therein. Hence the superior court erred in its conclusions of law.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to restate its conclusions of law in conformity to this opinion, and to render judgment accordingly.

Jordan, J., dissenting:

I am compelled to dissent from the conclusion reached in the opinion for the majority of the court in this case. The material and undisputed facts are, in brief, as follows: Appellee, Mary J. Wagner, and Peter Wagner were married on November 22, 1855, in Clay county, Indiana, where they lived together as husband and wife until May 11, 1887, on which date the husband died intestate, leaving an estate of less than $5,000, and left surviving him, as his widow, said Mary J., together with five children. At and prior to May 16, 1856, Peter Wagner, the husband, was the owner in fee of an undivided interest in a tract of land of about 6 acres situated in Marion county, Indiana, out of which the lots in dispute have been carved. At said date he and some ten other persons held the aforesaid tract, undivided, as tenants in common. On said 16th day of May, 1886, proceedings for partition were instituted by said Peter Wagner and others of his cotenants against their cotenant George Wagner in the common pleas court of said county. At the hearing of the cause the land sought to be partitioned was found not to be susceptible of division, and the same was by the court ordered to be sold as an entirety, and David S. Beaty was appointed a commissioner to make the sale; and in pursuance of such order he sold said real estate to William Smith, and executed to him a commissioner's deed for the same, which deed was approved by the court, and duly recorded, and the proceeds arising from the sale were paid to and divided among the parties to the action according to their respective shares and rights. Appellee, the wife of said Peter, at the time said action for partition was commenced, was not in any manner made a party plaintiff nor defendant to said action, nor did she join in any manner therein; neither was she notified of the pendency thereof, and had no knowledge of the said partition proceedings until after the death of her said husband. She never joined her husband at any time in the conveyance of any part of said real estate, nor in any manner or form disposed by her own act of her inchoate interest therein. Through mesne conveyances appellant became the owner of the lots now in controversy. The only question presented, under the above facts, for decision, is: Was Mrs. Wagner's inchoate interest in the land as the wife of Peter Wagner, one of the tenants in common, extinguished by the judicial sale in the partition proceedings to which she was not a party, and is she, by virtue of the decree in said action, barred from asserting her interest in the lands after the death of her husband? Counsel for the appellant affirm that the inchoate right of the wife must yield to the requirements of the paramount vested interests of more than one, when under the provision of the statute which compels partition among cotenants, her husband's land is sold by order of the court, in order that the proceeds may be distributed among such tenants; that in such actions the presence of the wife of any of the latter as a party to the partition proceedings was not intended or contemplated by the legislature in the enactment of the statute relating to the partition of lands. Upon the part of the appellee it is contended by her counsel that, where the premises are ordered sold in such actions, she is a proper and necessary party in that event, in order that the commissioner's deed may convey a perfect title, and, if not a party to the action, her inchoate interest is not barred. It is a well-settled rule that when actual partition is made of lands in which the husband holds an undivided moiety, the inchoate interest of the wife therein will instantly attach to the share allotted in severalty to her husband, unless fraud has been practised upon her in the partition proceedings. This result does not depend upon any order or action of the court, but equity will shift this interest of the wife to the part set off to the husband without the former being a party to the proceedings. By this result her right is protected and preserved without her presence as a party to the suit. The result and effect of the decree, when the wife is not a party, and the property in common is ordered by the court to be sold, is a debatable proposition, upon which the authorities conflict. This leads to an examination and review of those bearing upon this question. In Jackson v. Edwards, 7 Paige, 886, the holding seems to be that a sale so made does not divest the inchoate right of dower, for the reason, as expressed by the chancellor, that the court possessed no power to compel the wife to accept provisions out of the proceeds of the sale in lieu of her interest and consequent right to the enjoyment of the land itself. This case (Jackson v. Edwards) was carried to the supreme court of New York. See 22 Wend. 498. Two opinions were given in this last appeal, one by Judge Bronson and the other by Senator Verplanck. The former doubted whether the right of the wife to dower would be barred when the lands of the husband were ordered sold in a partition suit, though she be made a party thereto. Senator Verplanck was of a different opinion, and said, on page 517: "I agree, however, with the positions of the chancellor that a sale in partition divests the inchoate rights of dower of the wife of a tenant in common if she has been made a party to the suit; and that purchasers under the judgment or decree will be protected against all future claims on her part." (The italics are my own). And further, in this connection, on page 519, the learned senator said: "But the policy of the law is clearly only the protection of the wife's dower against the abuse of the husband's power and his acts. Now, a sale in partition cannot be the mere act of the husband. It must be shown to be necessary for the general benefit of all interested in the lands. To such a necessity, when allowed by the court, the husband's right of property gives way, either with or without his consent; then the inchoate right of dower, being but an incident, must follow. It does so, not only in this case but in many analogous ones, where private property is taken, . . . and pecuniary compensation allowed, as in lands taken for streets in cities, for roads or for canals. In this instance of a partition sale the sale is not allowed to be made for the purpose of divesting the wife's dower, but it is made because the interest of numerous joint owners demands it. The wife's future claim of dower is then divested, not by the act of her husband, but by the necessary operation of law." The judges in this case, it appears, were all of the same opinion that the wife's dower right could not be extinguished by a decree in an action to which she was not a party, but differed as to whether such a result could be obtained, even though she were a party to the proceeding. The statute of New York relative to partition was amended in 1840 so as to authorize the making of the wife a party to such actions, and providing, further, that in the event of the sale of the premises, her dower interest should pass to the purchaser, and that she should be remunerated therefor out of the proceeds of the sale. See Jordan v. Van Epps, 85 N. Y. 427. In the states of Ohio and Missouri it is held by the courts that sales made in actions for partition extinguish the wife's right of dower as against the purchaser, although she was not a party to the action. Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 855; Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202, 64 Am. Dec. 262. In the decision of Lee v. Lindell, 22 Mo. 202 (which was by a divided court, Leonard, J., dissenting), the fact that the statute did not require the wife to be a party seems to have exerted much influence upon the court in reaching the conclusion which it did. It is there said: "There being no law requiring her to be made a party, it is not perceived how the arbitrary use of her name can impart validity to a proceeding which without it, would not affect her." The case of Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 855, apparently controlled to a great extent the decisions in other cases to which we refer. The rule asserted in the Ohio case was followed in Davis v. Lang, 153 Ill. 175; and in Holley v. Glover, 36 S. C. 404, 16 L. R. A. 776. In Rouland v. Prather, 53 Md. 282, in which the wife was held to be bound, the order of sale was made prior to the marriage, although the sale of the land was subsequent. The Maryland court of appeals in this case, referring to and quoting from Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 855, said: "It is not necessary for us to hold that a wife who was not a party to the suit, as was the case there, would be bound in this state, and that the purchaser in such case would be protected by the decree and sale; and we do not mean, by making the quotation, to be understood as so deciding, for in this case no marriage had taken place when the decree was passed, and no inchoate right even had attached before the decree was obtained. As a matter of fact, the widow had knowledge of the decree, sale, and distribution of the proceeds of sale. So far as the distribution of proceeds of sale was concerned, she was brought in and made a party by the interlocutory petition of her husband's creditors to subject his portion to the payment of his debts. She could and ought then to have applied for a portion, in money, in lieu of her dower. . . . If she had been brought in before sale, all she could have obtained would have been an allowance in money." In the appeal of Mitchell v. Farriah, 69 Md. 285; Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 855, was again referred to. But the question as to whether it was necessary to make the wife of the tenant a party to the proceedings in partition was held to be not necessarily in controversy. Judge Brinkerhoff, delivering the opinion of the court in Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 855, said: "The fact that the wife was not a formal party to the proceeding in partition, does not, we think, at all alter the case. The terms of the statute do not require that she should be made a party, and we see no good reason why it should be required. On the whole, our view of the question is this: The right of dower in the wife subsists in virtue of the seisin of the husband; and this right is always subject to any encumbrance, infirmity, or incident which the law attaches to that seisin, either at the time of the marriage or at the time the husband became seised. A liability to be divested by a sale in partition is an incident which the law affixes to the seisin of all joint estates and the inchoate right of the wife is subject to this incident. And when the law steps in and divests the husband of his seisin, and turns the realty into personalty, she is, by the act and policy of the law, remitted, in lieu of her inchoate right of dower in the realty, to her inchoate right to a distributive share of the personalty into which it has been transmuted." In Greiner v. Klein, 28 Mich. 12, it has been held that a sale in a partition suit to which the wife of one of the tenants was not made a party did not serve to bar her of the right of dower. In this decision, Cooley, J., and Christianity, Ch. J., concurred with Judge Graves. Campbell, J., dissented. Graves, J., speaking for the court, said: "Before acceding to the view that such a right may be extinguished through a suit in partition by the husband, instituted and carried to completion without her being a party or being represented and without her having any chance to be heard, we ought to find the rule of law compelling it most clear and decisive. It may be said that the provisions of the partition law are not so framed and arranged, unless we go outside and supplement the law by judicial legislation, as to make it practicable to guard the wife's right, whether she be a party or not where a sale becomes necessary. Were this to be admitted, it would not follow that we should assume the legislature to have intended that the right should be invaded and destroyed in her absence. At the utmost, nothing further could be inferred than that, having made no adequate provision to protect her right in the event of a sale, it was not designed that a sale should interfere with the right." A standard author on Judicial Sales says: "Nor will a sale in partition cut off the dower of a married woman, not made a party, although her husband be made such." Rorer, Jud. Sales, p. 168, § 402, citing, in support of the text, Greiner v. Klein, 28 Mich. 12; Wilkinson v. Parish, 3 Paige, 653; Jackson v. Edwards, 23 Wend. 498. In Knapp, Partition, p. 35, the author says: "The wife must be made a party. She has an inchoate right of dower in the lands owned by her husband, and she must be either plaintiff or defendant in the action. The court, before it will order a sale of land in partition, requires that all those that have an interest in them shall be made parties to the action, to the end that the purchaser may get a perfect title. Hence the wives of those entitled to the land should be made parties,"—citing Knapp v. Hungerford, 7 Hun, 588. Again, on page 108, the same author says: "The wives of the several owners are proper parties, but not necessary parties, except in case where a sale of the premises may be necessary, and in such a case the party suing may properly make his own wife a defendant. The other defendants have no right to complain, . . . if she does not." The decisions to which I have referred appear, to some extent at least, to rest or depend rather upon local laws and local procedure than upon any settled principle. To determine what should be the declared rule governing the case at bar resort must be had to our own statutes relative to the interest of the wife in the husband's lands, and the character of such contingent interest, as disclosed by former decisions of this court, must be considered. An examination must also be made of the statute under which the partition proceedings in 1856 were instituted, and the procedure by which such actions were, by the Code of 1852, intended to be controlled. Section 2652, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2491), of our law of descent, in force since 1852, secures to the wife of a deceased husband one third in fee simple of all the real estate of which he may have been seised during the marriage, and in the conveyance of which she may not have joined in due form of law. Section 2660 of the same statute (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499) provides that "no act or conveyance, performed or executed by the husband without the assent of his wife, evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof in the manner required by law; nor any sale, disposition, transfer, or encumbrance of the husband's property, by virtue of any decree, execution, or mortgage, to which she shall not be party (except as provided otherwise in this act), shall prejudice or extinguish the right of the wife to her third of his lands, . . . or preclude her from the recovery thereof, if otherwise entitled thereto." In Grisson v. Moore, 106 Ind. 296, 55 Am. Rep. 742, in reference to these sections, Mitchell, J., speaking for the court, said: "The inchoate right of the wife attaches as an incident to the seisin of the husband during marriage. It cannot be divested or defeated by any act or charge of the husband, nor otherwise, except in the manner above provided. It can only be barred by a conveyance in which she joins, or by some proceeding to which all estates are subject, such as the exercise of the power of eminent domain and the like. Her interest in lands thus owned and conveyed by the husband, in the conveyance of which she has not joined, becomes consummate on his death. It accrues by virtue of the marital relation. She does not take as heir in lands so conveyed. Rank v. Hanna, 6 Ind. 20; Verry v. Robinson, 25 Ind. 14, 87 Am. Dec. 348; May v. Fletcher, 40 Ind. 575; Brannon v. May, 42 Ind. 92; Bowen v. Preston, 48 Ind. 367; Derry v. Derry, 74 Ind. 560; Hendrix v. McBeth, 87 Ind. 287; Mark v. Murphy, 76 Ind. 534." In the appeal of Bever v. North, 107 Ind. 544, it was held that the wife's interest in her husband's real estate was not an encumbrance, but an estate in the land. This court, per Elliott, J., there said: "The estate of a wife, under our statute, is more than a right of dower, for it is paramount to the estate of one claiming through her husband, and sweeps entirely away all title of the purchaser to one-third interest given her by the statute. The estate of the wife is not a mere encumbrance, but is an interest in the land which goes beneath the title acquired by a purchaser from her husband. Mark v. Murphy, 76 Ind. 534. When the rights of the wife prevail, the title of the purchaser from the husband disappears. If this title does disappear, then, of course, the purchaser had no title which he could convey, and he cannot be permitted to aver, as against his grantee, that it was part of the consideration of the deed that the grantee should not acquire title to the land owned by the wife of a former owner unless he paid her for it. We cannot regard the interest of the wife as an encumbrance, for it is an estate in the land itself. We cannot regard the estate of the wife as a mere right of dower, for there is no reversionary interest in the party who claims through the husband. The title of the wife, when it vests, is absolute as against a grantee of the husband, so that it does not merely encumber the land, but tears up the title from the very roots. It is not like the lease of a life estate, for there the reversion is in the lessor, and he succeeds to the fee upon the determination of the life estate. Here the fee never vests in the grantee of the husband. We cannot, therefore, regard as of controlling force the authorities which hold dower rights and life estates to be mere encumbrances." Where the husband is seised of lands during the coverture, but the same have been conveyed without the wife joining, under § 2491, supra, she does not take as heir, but as a purchaser for value, as marriage is the highest consideration known to the law. Richardson v. Schulte, 98 Ind. 429, and authorities cited; Grisson v. Moore, 106 Ind. 296, 55 Am. Rep. 742. In Thompson v. McCorkle, 186 Ind. 484 and 497, it was held that the wife's inchoate interest was not, under the facts there stated, divested in the real estate of her husband sold for taxes. On page 499, 186 Ind., this court said: "It is true the legislature may declare that a wife's inchoate interest shall be divested by a tax sale, and a conveyance of the land thereunder, but our lawmakers have not so provided, and until it has been so enacted by clear and express words her contingent interest should not be destroyed by judicial decision. This interest is in lieu of, and is analogous to, dower, except it has been enlarged from a life estate to a fee, and is guarded with more jealous care by legislative enactment and judicial decision."

These decisions will fully serve to show the character of the interest with which the wife is vested in the realty of her husband under the provisions of the statutes of this state, and the manner in which it is favored and protected under the law as interpreted by the adjudications of this court. Courts of sister states hold similar views in regard to the dower interest of the wife in the lands of the husband. Judge Bradbury, speaking for the court, in Mandel v. McClave, 46 Ohio St. 407, 5 L. R. A. 519, on page 414, 46 Ohio St., said: "It is property; its value can be ascertained. More than this, it is a favorite of the law. . . . A provision for her support. . . . She is a purchaser. The inception of her right. . . began with the marriage and seisin of the husband; . . . this favorite of the law is entitled to protection equal to that accorded to her other property." To the same effect is the holding of the court in Black v. Kuhlman, 30 Ohio St. 196; Unger v. Leiter, 32 Ohio St. 210. In Shell v. Duncan, 81 S. C. 547, 5 L. R. A. 821, on page 567, 81 S. C., of the opinion of Mr. Justice McIver, it is said: "Nothing that the husband may do can in any way affect it. From this, it follows that when the right, title, and interest of the husband is sold, either directly by himself or through the medium of an officer of the law, the purchaser takes no more than what was sold—the right, title, and interest of the husband, which does not include the dower interest,—and hence the purchaser must take his title subject to the wife's right of dower." See 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 885. In Simar v. Canada, 53 N. Y. 298, 13 Am. Rep. 523, on page 304, 13 Am. Rep. 526, of the opinion of the court, it is said: "We think that it must be considered as settled in this state, notwithstanding Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, 59 Am. Dec. 478, and some dicta in other cases, that, as between a wife and any other than the state, or its delegates or agents, exercising the right of eminent domain, an inchoate right of dower in lands is a subsisting and valuable interest which will be protected and preserved to her, and that she has a right of action to that end." It is seen that this interest is an actual one in the lands of the husband, which, in the event of the death of the latter, passes into a fee, and that it is considered by the law in the sense of property, and as such, ought to be accorded protection by the court. Keeping in view the principles enunciated by the decisions heretofore cited, and the sweeping force and effect of the above-mentioned sections of the statute of descent, I may proceed, in the light of these, and other statutes and decisions to which I will refer, with the investigation of the cardinal question involved. It is clear that when this inchoate right once attaches to the real estate of the husband, there is no privity of the wife with him respecting such interest in his lands. It is a universal, undisputed rule that a judgment or decree of a court is not binding on anyone not a party thereto, or in any way represented by, or in privity with, a party to the action or proceedings. Hence it cannot be said that the appellee herein is concluded upon the grounds of privity with her husband. An act concerning the partition of lands was approved May 20, 1852. 2 Gavin & H. Stat. p. 361. The first section of this statute provided that "all persons holding lands as joint tenants, or tenants in common, etc., may be compelled to divide the same in the manner provided in this act." The second section provided that the petition should set forth a description of the premises, and the rights and titles of the parties therein interested. Section 18 made provision for the sale of the lands, in discretion of the court, when the commissioners reported that a division could not be made. Under § 20 such sale was required to be made by a commissioner appointed by the court. Section 21 provided upon the payment of the purchase money "the court shall order such commissioner," etc., "to execute conveyances to the purchaser which shall bar all claim of such owners to said lands as effectively as if they themselves had executed the same." (The italics are mine.) Section 23 provided for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale by the commissioner to the persons entitled thereto, according to their respective shares, under the direction of the court. On June 18, 1852, an act concerning the civil procedure of courts and their jurisdiction was approved, being the Code of 1852. See 2 Gavin & H. p. 83; § 626 of this Code providing that "actions may be brought for the partition of lands held by joint tenants and tenants in common in all cases, and the pleadings and practice in such actions shall conform to the provisions of this act." By § 17 it was required that "all persons having an interest in the subject of the action, and in obtaining the relief demanded, shall be joined as plaintiffs," etc. Section 18 provided as follows: "Any person may be made a defendant who has, or claims, an interest in the controversy, adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the questions involved." Section 22 provided that: "The court may determine any controversy between the parties, before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had, without the presence of other parties, the court must cause them to be joined as proper parties," etc. It appears that under the requirements of § 626, supra, the pleadings and practice in partition suits must conform to the provisions of the Code, which certainly included those provisions pertaining to parties to an action. In Martindale v. Alexander, 26 Ind. 104, 39 Am. Dec. 458, it is said: "The Code provides a uniform proceeding for all existing rights, whether in law or equity, including the partition of real estate." In Milligan v. Poole, 35 Ind. 64, in referring to proceedings in partition, it is said: "Ample provision is made for ascertaining and settling the rights of the parties interested in the land, and if the land cannot be divided without damage to the owners, and consequently has to be sold, the court has power to adjust and secure the rights of the parties in the proceeds of such sale. And whether those rights be legal or equitable, they are equally within the cognizance and protecting power of the court. . . . To give validity and effect to a partition, all persons interested should be made parties to the suit. If they are not, their interests will not be affected by the proceeding, but will remain as before. See also Schissel v. Dickson, 129 Ind. 139. This court in construing § 18 of the Code, supra, in Buttinger v. Bell, 65 Ind. 445, declared that, "the parties who ought to be and must be made defendants under this section of the Code, as we construe it, are the parties in interest adverse to the plaintiff, an interest involved in the issues, and who, of necessity, will be and must be affected by the judgment in the cause. So, also, any person 'who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the questions involved' must, by the letter of the statute, be made a defendant to the action. These are the rules which govern pleadings in chancery in relation to necessary parties, and these rules were substantially re-enacted in our Code of Practice, as applicable alike to all suits at law as well as in equity, 'without distinction between law and equity.' Newcomb v. Horton, 18 Wis. 566; Story, Eq. Pl. chap. 4; Lube, Eq. Pl. chap. 3; Mitford, Eq. Pl. 164; and Moak's Van Santvoord's Pl. 105."

The question in regard to the necessity of making the wife of a cotenant a party in an action in partition seems to have been again considered and decided by the supreme court of New York in the case of Ripple v. Gilborn, 8 How. Pr. 456. The case of Jackson v. Edwards, 22 Wend. 498, and the purpose of the statute of 1840 were both referred to and considered by Crippen, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in that appeal. In the course of the opinion in that case it is said: "The next question in the case is whether the plaintiff's wife is a necessary party to the action. The statute declares that the widow shall be endowed of the third part of all the lands whereof her husband was seised of an estate of inheritance at any time during the marriage." Rev. Stat. 4th ed. chap. 1, pt. 2, title 8, § 1. By the 16th section of the same act it is declared that no act, deed, or conveyance, executed or performed by the husband without the assent of his wife, evidenced by her acknowledgment thereof, in the manner required by law, to pass the estate of married women, and no judgment or decree confessed by or recovered against him, and no laches, default, covin, or crime of the husband, shall prejudice the right of the wife to her dower, or preclude her from the recovery thereof. The wife, in equity, has an inchoate right of dower resting upon the contingency of her surviving her husband; and in cases of partition, when the premises cannot be divided, and are ordered to be sold, the inchoate right of the wife becomes vested in her, so that she is at once entitled to her equitable portion of the avails of such sale. . . . I have examined the case in 7 Paige, of Jackson v. Edwards, with much care. The chancellor in that case has very fully discussed the question as to the rights of the wife in cases of partition, and I am unable to see, according to the law of that case, how the plaintiff can go on with this action without making his wife a party plaintiff. I am satisfied that the act of 1840 (chap. 177) in no manner interferes with the question of parties to the action. It only provides for settling the rights of married women, by adopting the same rule suggested by the chancellor, in the case above cited, for ascertaining the value of the inchoate right of dower of married women in the premises, in cases where a sale is ordered, and of securing to them the money, by investment, etc. This act also authorizes a married woman to release her contingent inchoate right of dower to her husband. I have no doubt that the provisions made by this statute were induced by the law as expounded and settled by the chancellor, in the case of Jackson v. Edwards, above cited. It was argued in January, 1839, and no doubt decided prior to the passage of the act of April 28, 1840. I regard it as a legislative approval and confirmation of the law as expounded by the chancellor. If the plaintiff's wife is not brought in as a party to the action, I am not aware of any course of practice by which the court is to be informed that he has a wife who is entitled to an inchoate right of dower in the premises. It may be that on an application in behalf of the wife, at any time before the money arising from the sale of said premises, if one should be ordered, is paid over by the purchaser, her interest therein might be protected by an order of the court; probably the same result might be attained on the application of the purchaser to the court, in order to protect him in his title. Allow that such proceedings might be had, it only goes to show more emphatically the necessity and propriety of bringing in the plaintiff's wife as a party to the action, in order that the premises shall be freed by the decree and sale, of all entanglements with the claim of the plaintiff's wife, and she at the same time be properly secured in her equitable rights, arising from a sale of said premises. It seems to me that the most simple and direct practice, as well as that required by the strict rules of law, is to make all persons parties, who have, by any means or contingency, an interest in the premises. Barbour, in his Chancery Practice, directs that whenever there is a married woman having merely an inchoate right of dower, it is advisable that she be made a party to the action, especially if a sale will be necessary. 2 Barbour, Ch. Pr. 288. Whether a sale will be ordered or not is a question that cannot be determined at the commencement of the action. All necessary parties should be joined at the time the suit is brought, and, if omitted, the defendant may demur, in case the defect appears upon the face of the complaint, and, if not, may appear, and object by plea and answer. Braker v. Devereaux, 8 Paige, 518, and also the cases cited to the first point. The plaintiff in this action joined the defendant's wife as a party thereto, in order that her right of dower might be barred by the proceedings therein and by the judgment of the court; no doubt the same necessity exists for bringing in the plaintiff's wife and making her a party, and for the same reasons. Whittaker, in his Practice, says that all persons directly or indirectly interested in the corpus of the estate must be made parties, including the wives of parties living, in respect to their inchoate right of dower. (Whittaker, Pr. & Pl. 60). This authority seems to be directly in point, and is undoubtedly correct. If a sale of the premises shall be ordered, it is entirely clear that a complete determination of the rights of the parties cannot be had without the plaintiff's wife being brought into the case at some period of its prosecution." The legislature which enacted our statutes of descent substantially adopted the provisions of § 16 of the statute of New York referred to in the opinion of the court in the case from which I have just quoted, and incorporated them into § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499). In view of this fact, the above decision of Ripple v. Gilborn, placing an interpretation on this section of the New York statute, from which our statute was borrowed, is entitled to much weight in the solution of the question here involved; for it is a familiar rule, in general, that where a statute of one state is borrowed from that of another, it will be held by the courts of the borrowing state to have the meaning and force given it by the courts of the state from which it was borrowed. Valparaiso v. Gardner, 97 Ind. 1, and 49 Am. Rep. 416, and authorities cited.

The provision of the partition statute of 1852, which authorized the court, in its discretion, to order a sale of the premises when they were not susceptible of division, is but a recognition, to an extent, of the old chancery rule, which permitted courts of equity in proceedings for partition to do equity upon consent of all parties in interest, by ordering a sale of the land in lieu of partition, and dividing the proceeds instead, except the power under the statute does not depend upon the consent of parties. In a suit in chancery for partition the decree was only binding upon those parties who were before the court, and those whom they virtually represented; and the interests of third persons were not affected. In the exercise of equity jurisdiction in cases of partition, the court was vested with extensive power to bring all interested parties before it, in order that complete justice might be attained. Story, Eq. Jur. 11th ed. § 656; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1890. By no means is it an easy matter to trace accurately the distinction between necessary, and what may be termed merely as proper, parties to an action. Each case, in a greater or lesser degree, must depend upon the facts and circumstances upon which it rests. We think, however, that it is evident, in view of the provisions of the Code relative to parties to an action, and to which the practice in partition suits, by § 626, supra, is required to conform, that, in the event a sale of the lands is ordered, the wife of a tenant in common is not only a proper, but a necessary, party defendant, in order to protect her interest involved; and also that there may be a complete determination of the controversy, and that the decree and conveyance thereunder may pass a perfect title to the purchaser; and it is the duty of the court, under such circumstances, to cause her to be made a party, and, in the event that she is not, her rights are not barred. This, we think, was the manifest intent of the legislature. We are confirmed in this conclusion when we consider the fact that this body at the same session, and only a few days prior to the approval of the act of 1852 concerning partition, passed the statute of descents, which embraced § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499). There is no reasonable presumption that the legislature intended, in the very teeth of the prohibitory features of this section, that, in the exercise, of the power granted to the court under the partition statute to decree a sale of the land, the presence of the wives of the tenants as parties might be dispensed with, and still that their inchoate interests therein should be devested and barred. A feature in the Ohio and Missouri cases referred to was the fact that the statutes of those states made no provision for making the wives of the tenants parties to a partition proceeding. The force, therefore, of these decisions, in view of the requirements of the Code of 1852, to which I have referred, is materially impaired, and they cannot be accepted as controlling. In Weaver v. Gregg, 6 Ohio St. 547, 67 Am. Dec. 355, it was said that the wife was remitted to her share of the proceeds of sale in lieu of her dower. But if she is in no manner a party, or notified of the pendency of the action, how may she have an opportunity to demand her interest in the proceeds, and thereby protect her rights? When is she entitled to her day in court, and a protection of her right under due process of law?

It is virtually asserted in the prevailing opinion of my Brother McCabe that it would be an idle ceremony to make the wife of a cotenant a party in partition proceedings, as she could not be heard to oppose either partition in kind or the sale of the lands. That she could not defeat a partition is true, but that she is entitled to oppose the sale of the premises by showing that they are susceptible of division is in reason and justice, under the laws of this state, undoubtedly her right. She is interested in the part to be set off to her husband, in case a partition in kind is made, and she should, therefore, also have the right, certainly, to be heard in exposing any fraud or inequality in the proceedings affecting the moiety apportioned to her husband. That she had an interest in the subject of the partition—the land sought to be partitioned—is not, and cannot be, controverted. That, in the event it was ordered to be sold, she had an interest in the relief demanded, is equally evident; and a complete determination of the controversy, in this respect at least, could not be had without her presence. Therefore, under such circumstances, the provisions of the Code referred to required her to be joined as a party. Under the holding that the wife's right will be barred by the order of sale to which she is not a party, an opportunity might be presented for two or more husbands, holding valuable property as tenants in common, by acting in concert to procure, through a partition suit, a sale thereof, without making their wives parties thereto, and the money arising from such sale might be dissipated, or seized by creditors of the husbands, and the wives of the latter be afforded no notice of such action, or opportunity to protect their interests, if any, in such proceeds. The case at bar affords a fair illustration of the result that might follow as it appears that the appellee had no knowledge of the partition sale until after the death of her husband. Certainly, the legislature did not intend that such rank injustice should result to the wife when it ingrafted upon the statute the equitable rule permitting the court to order the sale of the real estate. But it is claimed by counsel for appellant that a holding that the wife is not barred by the sale under the circumstances would result as a hardship upon the purchaser at such sales. In answer to this it may be said that the original purchaser of the land in question, through whom appellant claims, was bound to know, under the law, what and whose interests he acquired by the sale and conveyance in controversy. He was bound to know that § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499), denied the right to divest her of her inchoate interest in the land under a decree of sale to which she was not a party. He was bound to know what title passed to him by the commissioner's deed, as provided by § 21 of the partition statute. With all these presumptions existing against him, he apparently did not investigate the question of title, or make any application to the court to be relieved from his purchase. The court will not compel a bona fide purchaser to complete his purchase, and accept a deed, when it appears that the title to the land will be doubtful, and may subject him to a contest to protect it. See Harlan v. Stout, 23 Ind. 488, and the many authorities cited in footnote to Toole v. Toole (N. Y.) 2 L. R. A. 465; S. C. 112 N. Y. 338.

When the force and effect of these several statutes to which I have referred are considered, and the fact that the right of the wife in the real estate of the husband under the laws of this state has heretofore been regarded and held by this court as an actual contingent interest therein, that she holds such interest as a purchaser for value, and that the law favors her in the protection thereof, the conclusion is irresistible, in my opinion, that appellee is not barred by the decree and sale from asserting her interest in the lands in dispute. Such holding is in harmony with reason, justice, and the laws of our state. She was endowed by the statute with this interest in her husband's lands for her support and maintenance in the event she became a widow; and to hold that under the facts, she is precluded from a recovery, is in direct opposition to the spirit and meaning of the law. The language of § 2660, Rev. Stat. 1894 (Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2499), is a complete answer to the contentions of the appellant. The decision in this case may be said to be sweeping in its effects, and established a precedent that will ultimately serve to plague and worry the court. If the doctrine asserted is sound, then it must follow that, when lands of the husband are sold under an order of sale in a partition action, the wife will virtually have no interest, either in the realty, after it is sold, or in the proceeds arising out of the sale of the husband's moiety, that she can claim; and in such a case the creditors of the husband would occupy a position that they do not in any other case when the husband's lands are sold, and where the wife has not been estopped by her own act, and not barred by being a party to a judgment or decree of the court. Such creditors, under this view of the question, would be permitted to assert their right to, and appropriate the entire proceeds of the husband's interest in, payment of his debts, regardless of the rights or claims of his wife.

The act of 1875 (Rev. Stat. 1894, § 2660; Rev. Stat. 1881, § 2508) in effect provides that when the title of the husband in real estate shall become vested in a purchaser under a judicial sale, where the inchoate interest of the wife has not been ordered sold, or barred by virtue of such sale, then and in that event, her said interest shall become absolute, and vest in her in like manner and to the same extent as it would upon the death of the husband. It has been held by this court that a sale of the husband's lands by a register in bankruptcy, or by an assignee for the benefit of creditors, is a judicial sale, within the meaning of this statute. See Roberts v. Shroyer, 68 Ind. 64; McCracken v. Kuhn, 73 Ind. 149; Lawson v. DeBolt, 78 Ind. 563; Hall v. Harrell, 92 Ind. 408. In view of these decisions, and others of like import on the same point, surely it must be said that sales made since the taking effect of the act of 1875, supra, under the order of the court in a partition proceeding, would be judicial sales within the meaning of that statute, and, unless the wife was barred by the judgment therein by being a party thereto, her interest would vest and become absolute upon such sale and conveyance; and, in the event that it had been barred by the judgment of the court, she being a party thereto, certainly her interest would be shifted or transferred to the proceeds of the sale, and she would have the right to protect it. From this conclusion I think there can be no escape, yet the holding in the case at bar in effect affirms or establishes a rule to the contrary, and to this extent the laws of the state which give her this inchoate right in the lands of her husband are rendered nugatory. The judgment ought to be affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

L. W. THOMAS, Appl.,

v.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. A license to use a railroad track as a footpath may be found from the facts that it had been so used for a number of years to the extent that plainly visible paths had been worn upon the ground, and that a ladder had been placed from the highway to reach the roadbed with the knowledge of the employees of the road, to which no objection had been made.
2. Implied assent by a railroad company to the use of its tracks as a footpath will impose upon its employees the duty of exercising care, diligence, and watchfulness to discover if persons are on the track at that point.

(October 30, 1897.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Marshall County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's minor son through the alleged negligence of defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. L. Carney for appellant.

Messrs. Charles B. Keeler and T. Binford for appellee.

Kinne, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. This is the second appeal in this case. The opinion on the former appeal will be found in 93 Iowa, 248. After the reversal upon the former appeal, certain amendments were made to the petition, the substance of which are incorporated in the statement of the case. Just before noon, on May 15, 1890, Earl B. Thomas, a minor son of the plaintiff, aged three years and nine months, was, with another child younger than himself, upon an open and uncovered bridge, which was located upon the defendant's line of railway, about 1,900 feet west of the station of Rhodes, in Marshall county, Iowa, and, while there, was run over by a train going west, and his right foot was so crushed as to require its amputation. The petition charges that, without fault on the part of his parents, the child went upon the track and bridge, and was in plain sight from the station, and at all points upon the road between the station and the place of the accident; that the defendant's employees, knowing that the children were on the track, started a train from the water tank at the station, a distance of about 90 rods from the bridge, westward (the engine being in front, but with the pilot attached to the cars), and negligently and carelessly ran the train over the plaintiff's child; that all of the persons upon the engine knew that the child was upon the track and bridge, but did not look along the track over which they were going, or exercise any care or caution whatever in the operation of said train or to discover whether or not the track was clear; that it was a wild train, not running on schedule time, and was running with the engine backward; that the train was not manned with a sufficient number of brakemen, and the engine was without steam or air brakes. It is also charged that the engineer and other employees on the train saw the said child in time to have stopped the train and prevented the accident; that they negligently allowed the engine and cars to approach and reach said bridge without signal of bell or whistle, and without any effort to stop said train, and ran over the foot and leg of said child; that the roadway and track of defendant's line of railroad extending from the overhead bridge, just west of the bridge where the injury occurred, to the station of Rhodes, was daily and almost hourly frequented by men, women, and children, traveling upon foot, east and west upon said line of railway; that, for the purpose of convenience in access to said railway track from the overhead bridge in connection with the highway, there had been constructed a ladder by the defendant's employees, or with their knowledge and consent, so that persons could have ready access from the highway to the railway track, and also from the railway track to the highway; that with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, and for more than ten years prior to the accident, people residing in the vicinity of the bridge and in the town of Rhodes had constantly used the track of the defendant's railway for the purpose of traveling to and from the depot, school, and village of Rhodes, and had used said ladder for the purpose of reaching the track of the defendant; that the public generally had leave and license to use said railway track as a footway, and the child Earl was not a trespasser thereon; that defendant's employees were negligent in not exercising watchfulness and care in reference to the train while it was passing over such part of the track where pedestrians had license to walk, and such negligence caused said accident. To the answer the defendant interposed a general denial, except that it admitted its corporate capacity, and that the accident was caused by one of its trains. When plaintiff's evidence was in, the defendant moved the court for a verdict in its favor, because there was no evidence warranting a verdict for plaintiff; that there was no evidence sufficient to sustain a finding of negligence on part of the defendant company or its employees which was the cause of the accident; that the evidence did not warrant a finding that the defendant owed to the child any legal duty of watchfulness and care before his position was known, and it is not shown that there was any want of care after his position was known; that no license or right upon the part of the child to be upon the track and bridge had been shown, but he was a trespasser; that the evidence failed to show any invitation or consent by the defendant to use its track and bridge as a footway; that the evidence failed to show that the engineer or other trainmen actually saw the child upon the bridge before the accident, or, if they did see him, that they had failed to use all the means and appliances at their command to stop the train and avert the accident. This motion was sustained.

2. An important question in this case is as to whether the child Earl was upon the track and bridge of the defendant company by leave or license of the defendant. The former trial was had upon the theory that the child had no right upon the track; that he was a trespasser; and that there was nothing in the situation or surroundings requiring the trainmen to be on the lookout for persons on the track. If the child was a licensee, instead of a trespasser, another rule of law may obtain. The evidence which it is claimed shows a license to use the track and bridge as a footway by pedestrians may be briefly stated as follows: For many years prior to the accident, the bridge and track of the defendant company, from the place of the accident to the station of Rhodes, had been in almost constant use by people living in the vicinity of this bridge as a footway in going to and from the depot, school, and village. Children of from four or five years old and upward used it as a means of going to and from school. The bridge passed over a private highway, and access to the bridge and track were had by the use of a ladder reaching from this highway to the head block of the bridge above. It does not appear as to who erected this ladder. The bridge was 14 feet above the highway. There were paths leading from the track to this ladder. These paths were well worn. This track and ladder were also used by persons living in the village who had occasion to visit those living in the vicinity of this bridge. The distance to the village was much less by way of the track than by the highways. There was no evidence to show that the defendant company ever gave leave or license to use this bridge and the track as a footpath, nor does it appear that the defendant company ever made any attempt to prevent such use. The ladder could be seen from the track. The road master of the defendant company and other of its employees had seen this ladder. The superintendent of the company was present at one time while the bridge was being raised, and the ladder was then attached to the bridge. There is nothing to show that the use of this ladder was ever interfered with by the defendant company. From all of the evidence, it is clear that the footpath and ladder were seen by some of the defendant's employees, and that they were so situated as to be seen by any employee of the defendant company engaged in the operation of its trains.

We held in Murphy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 38 Iowa, 543, that an instruction in the following language was proper: "If you find from the evidence that the deceased had for a considerable time prior to the accident been accustomed to walk over and upon the track of the railroad company, at and near the place where the accident occurred, by the acquiescence of the company, then the deceased was not a trespasser upon the track, and such permission may be implied if deceased was long in the habit of so walking over the track, with the knowledge of the company or its employees in charge of that part of the road, without objection on their part,—and it is for you to determine from all the facts in evidence before you whether or not the deceased had such implied permission." It was said in that case that facts which would be sufficient to constitute ordinary diligence as against a trespasser might not establish such diligence as against a person there by permission. In Masse v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 604, it is said: "The evidence tended to show that the track, at that point, was traveled to some extent by footmen, and that there had been such an amount of travel as to make a path." It was held the facts did not show a license. The court, however, said: "If the travel had been at a point where the defendant's employees were stationed, and it were shown that the footmen occupied the track without their dissent, it may be that the company's assent should be implied." In Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106, it was held that an allegation in a petition that "for more than ten years, defendant's roadbed and right of way, from a point west of where the accident happened to the city of Des Moines, has been used by the public as a thoroughfare to and from said city of Des Moines, which fact was well known to the defendant and its employees," did not state facts from which the law would infer a license. In that case it was said: "We are not saying that there might not be such a use of the track as that the assent of the company might be understood or implied therefrom; but no such state of facts is pleaded." In Richards v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 480, it was held that the facts did not show a license or invitation to people to walk along the defendant's tracks, and that the fact that it did not forbid their doing so could not be given the force of an invitation. The court said: "It may be there was evidence of such habitual use of the tracks by the public, which use was known to the employees of defendant, and not disproved, that the jury would have been authorized to find that plaintiff had an implied license to use the right of way as he did. But, if that be true, defendant was under no obligation to protect plaintiff from harm by taking steps to prevent it, unless it had so acted as to mislead him. It was the duty of defendant not to injure him wantonly or wilfully, but if it had done no act to mislead, and had no reason to anticipate the danger to which plaintiff exposed himself, it owed him no active duty." In Clampit v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 84 Iowa, 71, it was held that, where a railway track is used for crossing at a place daily used for a considerable time by a number of persons, some of whom had constructed a stairway by the track for the use of pedestrians, and when a crossing over a ditch had been made by someone unknown, and the defendant had done nothing to prevent persons from crossing said track, and the use of such place as a crossing was known to the employees of the defendant, it would be presumed to assent to such use, and that it was a license, and the plaintiff, in using it, was not a trespasser. On the former trial of this case it was said: "It may also be remarked in this connection that a license to use the track of a railroad company may be inferred from the frequent use, in connection with other circumstances from which an implied invitation may be inferred." 93 Iowa, 248.

From the foregoing cases it appears that this court has often recognized the doctrine that a license to use a railroad track may be inferred from facts and circumstances short of an actual invitation or consent on the part of the railway company. The question, then, before us, is: Are the facts and circumstances disclosed in this record such as to warrant a jury in finding an implied invitation or license to use the track by footmen? It may be admitted that the facts in this case touching the circumstances surrounding the use of the track are in some respects not the same as in Clampit's Case; yet they are in all essential respects save one much alike. In the case at bar the use of the track was not merely for crossing purposes. In that case the court said: "The stairway and the ties across the ditch, as well as the path made by footmen, prominently advertised the place as a crossing used by pedestrians. No engineer or fireman passing along the tracks at that place with his eyes open, in the exercise of reasonable watchfulness and care, could have failed to see these indications of a footpath, and to understand therefrom that it was used by pedestrians, if he possessed ordinary intelligence." This language applies as well to the facts in the case at bar. Here was an almost constant use of this track. Here were well-defined footpaths, and a ladder in use for years, for the purpose of reaching the track. The track repairers knew the ladder was there. The road master had actual knowledge of it. The superintendent had once, at least, been where, if he used his eyes, he must have seen it. It was in plain view of all the train operatives. It does not appear that the ladder was ever used for any purpose except as a means of getting onto the track; and, with the fact undisputed of the use of the ladder, paths, and track for years without objection from the defendant or any of its employees, all these and other facts would warrant a finding by a jury that the use of the track was by the consent of the defendant, and therefore the child Earl was not a trespasser.

8. If the rule of law as to care to be exercised by the employees of the company operating its train is the same towards one who is a mere licensee by virtue of an implied invitation from the defendant as it is in case of a trespasser upon the track, it was not necessary to submit this case to the jury for the purpose of determining which of these relations this child occupied towards the defendant company. As is said in the opinion on the former appeal in this case, if the child was a trespasser, then the company owed him no duty until its employees actually saw him on the track in a place of danger; that they were not bound to keep a lookout for trespassers, and were not negligent in failing to discover trespassers upon its track. Masser v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 602; Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106; Morris v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 45 Iowa, 29; Richards v. Chicago, St. P. & K. C. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 428; Thomas v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 93 Iowa, 248. Appellant contends that this should not be the rule even as to trespassers. Such has been the uniform holding in this state, and unless there are cogent reasons for departing from it, it should not be changed. We discover no sufficient reason for changing this rule, which has always been consistently adhered to by this court. The important question now is, does this rule apply with like force and effect to one who may be found to be a licensee by invitation of the company, implied from all the surrounding circumstances? The general current of authority undoubtedly is that the same rule ordinarily applies in both cases. 3 Elliott, Railroads, §§ 1154, 1249-1251, and cases cited; Beach, Contrib. Neg. § 212, and cases cited. Indeed, it is held that one using a railway track as a place of crossing, or a footpath, with the silent acquiescence of the company, or with the knowledge or passive permission of the company, is, at most, a bare licensee, who takes his license with all of its concomitant risks and perils; and, as a general rule, the company owes him no greater duty than that which is due to a mere trespasser. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1154, and cases cited. Such is undoubtedly the general trend of the authorities in this country. In our own state, in Richard's Case, this doctrine seems to be recognized and applied as to one walking along the track; while in Clampitt's Case (the last expression of this court upon this subject), it is expressly held that one crossing the track of a railroad company under circumstances as to uses of the track much like those of the case at bar "is entitled to all the rights and protection of one rightfully upon it with the license of the defendant. He may recover for injuries resulting from the defendant's want of care, if not contributing thereto by his own negligence." Owing to the age of the child Earl, there can be no question of contributory negligence in this case. If the rule laid down in Clampitt's Case is to be adhered to as to one crossing the track, we see no escape from the conclusion that this case should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions of the court, for them to determine whether the child was a trespasser or licensee, and, if a licensee, whether the employees of the defendant exercised that care to discover his presence upon the track, where, from the license given, they had a right to expect persons might be. We believe the rule announced in Clampitt's Case a just one, as applied to the facts in that case. It amounts to saying that, when the company had impliedly assented to the use of its track by persons as a footpath, its employees operating trains are charged with the duty of exercising care, diligence, and watchfulness to discover if persons are on the track at these places where they have recognized their right to be. We are not holding that at every place and continuously along the line of a railway, the employees operating trains must be on the watch for trespassers. What we do hold is that as to persons rightfully on the track by the license and consent of the company, whether such consent be expressed in words or arise by implication, a duty rests upon the company and its employees to be on the watch for such persons at the places they may be expected to be, in view of the license and consent given. So, in this case, if the boy Earl was a licensee, and not a trespasser, and at a place where the company had impliedly assented to the use of its track as a footpath, it was the duty of those operating the train to exercise watchfulness and care to ascertain if persons were on said track at said place. If the jury should find that Earl was a licensee, then they must determine, in view of all the evidence, whether the employees of the company properly discharged that duty, and, if they did not, whether the failure so to do resulted in causing the injury.

4. Without referring specifically to the several complaints as to the rulings upon the introduction of evidence, it may properly be said that most of the rulings against the plaintiff impress us as technical, and some of them as incorrect. We do not say more, as it is not likely that on a retrial the same questions and rulings will appear. We have, in view of another trial, refrained, so far as possible, from discussing the weight of the evidence. The appellee's objection to the record is not well taken, and appellant's motion to strike the additional abstract is overruled. For the reasons given, the judgment below is reversed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Allie W. DAVIS, Appt.,

v.

W. T. DAVIS.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The lapse of five years after the conviction of a crime and sentence to imprisonment for life entitles the wife of the person convicted to a divorce, under Stat. § 2117, making it a ground for divorce that the parties have been living apart without cohabitation for five years before the application.

2. An action for divorce need not be brought within five years after the conviction for a felony of one sentenced to imprisonment for life, under Stat. § 2117, making "condemnation for felony" a ground for divorce, and Civ. Code, § 423, subd. 3, requiring plaintiff in a divorce suit to prove that the cause of divorce "occurred or existed within five years next before the commencement of the action."

(December 14, 1897.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Woodford County in favor of defendant in an action brought to obtain a divorce. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. T. Wilson and E. M. Wallace, for appellant.

Mr. W. H. Julian for appellee.

Hazelrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant and appellee were married in 1881, and lived together until 1884, when appellee was convicted of murder, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life, where he still remains. In January, 1896, appellant instituted this action for divorce, relying on two grounds therefor: (1) Living apart, without any cohabitation, for five years next before the application; (2) condemnation for felony in this state. These grounds are set out in subsections 2 and 3 of § 2117 of the Kentucky Statutes. Appellant also averred that her cause of action accrued and existed within five years next before the commencement of her action. In § 2120 of the Statutes it is provided that the "action for divorce must be brought within five years next after the doing of the act complained of;" but in § 423 of the Civil Code it is provided that a plaintiff, to obtain a divorce, must allege and prove, in addition to a legal cause of divorce, (3) that the cause of divorce occurred or existed within five years next before the commencement of the action. The chancellor denied the appellant relief, solely on the ground that the living apart "was not voluntary," and that the condemnation for felony meant conviction for felony; and, as that had not occurred within five years next before this action was instituted, she was not entitled to a divorce on that ground. We think the chancellor was in error as to both grounds. It is true that in Pile v. Pile, 94 Ky.

NOTE.—As to the effect of conviction and sentence upon the marriage relation, see note to State v. Duket (Wis.) 81 L. R. A. 515.

808, the husband was denied a divorce on the grounds of lunacy and abandonment for five years; but the court said: "Here the wife has a mind diseased, without her fault, [and] has never abandoned the husband, but is now confined in the asylum for lunatics by his consent and direction."

Here the husband is confined in the penitentiary for life, after a conviction for crime; and the separation certainly cannot be said to be without his fault, though it is wholly without the fault of plaintiff. Again, we think the condemnation for felony existed within the five years before suit was brought, although the judgment of conviction was entered more than five years before. Such condemnation must exist at least as long as the judgment is in force. The statute may be thus construed, even if held applicable to this particular ground of divorce. We are inclined to think, however, that it is not applicable. The doing of the act complained of, mentioned in the statute, would seem to have reference to some of the many acts set out in the statute, to be committed by either the husband or wife, entitling the other to a divorce. Here the condemnation was not the act of the husband, but an act by the state. It follows further, from what we have said, that the order of allowance to Edwards as guardian ad litem, to be paid by the wife, is erroneous, as under the statute this is to be paid by the husband. (Ky. Stat. § 900.)

Judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent herewith.

DEPOSIT BANK OF PARIS.

(.....Ky.....)

1. The direction in a distress warrant to levy on property of subtenants found in the county is immaterial, when the levy is not in fact made on any property that is not found on the leased premises.

2. The right of distress does not pass to the assignee of a rent note in the absence of statutory provision therefor, and is not given by Stat. § 2804, authorizing the assignment of the rent and its recovery by the assignee.

(December 11, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bourbon County sustaining a motion for judgment on a bond executed for the discharge of a levy under a distress warrant for the collection of rent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McMillan & Talbott, for appellants:

Section 2807, Ky. Stat., provides that a distress warrant may be levied upon the personal property of the subtenant on the leased premises.

The subtenants were not directly liable for the rent; the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist as to them, and a distress warrant could not issue against them, and their only liability was to the extent of property found on the leased premises.

While the relation of landlord and tenant has existed since the beginning of our state legislation and state courts, still we find no effort on the part of the assignees of rent notes to exercise the rights of a landlord. This uniform construction which the bar of the state have placed upon the statute of landlord and tenant is worthy of consideration.

In order that a distress warrant may issue the following things are necessary: "There shall have been an actual demise or letting of the premises, and that the relation of landlord and tenant exist between the parties; that there be a reversion in the landlord."

6 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2819.

Nor will an authority in writing to a tenant, to pay the rent to a third person, authorize a distress by such person.

Taylor, Land. & T. § 567; Epperson v. Blakemore, 2 Bush, 241.

The Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. chap. 34, has not been adopted in our state. That statute in so many words "gives the power of distress upon the lands out of which the rent is reserved, so long as they continue in the hands of him to whom the rent is due, or of any person representing or claiming title through or under him, by purchase, gift, or descent."

Comyn, Land. & T. § 873.

By the common law the right to distraint is in the landlord only.

1 Jones, Liens, § 598.

Measrs. Mann & Ashbrook for appellee.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mrs. Taylor leased to C. E. Wood her farm for the year ending March 1, 1896, for $1,800, and the tenant, with three others as sureties, executed a note for that amount, due March 1, 1896, payable to Mrs. Taylor, and negotiable and payable at the Agricultural Bank of Paris. Before maturity, Mrs. Taylor indorsed and assigned the note to Irwin Taylor, who indorsed it to McClintock, who discounted it to the Deposit Bank of Paris. In April, 1895, the tenant, with the consent of Mrs. Taylor, sublet the farm—or, rather, assigned the remainder of his term—to J. M. and J. W. Hutsell, appellants, for $1,800, for which they executed their note, with surety, to Wood, who assigned the note to J. B. Wood, who assigned it to the Agricultural Bank of Paris. The $1,300 note was not paid at maturity, and on April 11, 1896, the appellee, the Deposit Bank, through its president, made affidavit before the police judge and procured a distress warrant to be issued in favor of the bank against Wood, the tenant, and J. W. and J. M. Hutsell, the subtenants. The warrant was placed in the hands of the sheriff, who levied upon the property of the appellants, who executed a bond, with sureties, to discharge the levy. Motion was made by appellee, under § 654 of the Code, for judgment upon the bond against appellants, and 89 L. R. A.

defense was made upon the ground of irregularity in issuing the distress warrant, and that the distress warrant was in favor, not of the landlord, but of a remote assignee of a negotiable note given for rent. These defenses were presented both orally and by written answer and amended answer.

The objection to the distress warrant was upon the ground that it was issued both against the tenant and the subtenants, directing the levy to be made upon their property found in the county, whereas only the property of the subtenants found on the leased premises was subject to the levy. Inasmuch as the warrant was not levied upon any of the property of the subtenants found elsewhere than on the leased premises, we do not regard this objection as material.

The other objection is that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist between the Deposit Bank and the Hutsells. This presents a question now, we believe, for the first time presented for decision, whether the remedy by distress or landlord's attachment, under §§ 2301, 2302, Ky. Stat., is available in favor of the assignee of a note given for rent who is not the assignee of the reversion. It is noticeable that this summary, and frequently oppressive, remedy by distress is, by the terms of the statute, given to the landlord, the language used being: "The landlord may, before a justice of the peace, by himself or agent, file an affidavit," etc. The language in the other section providing for an attachment for rent, while not quite so explicit, in our opinion means the same thing, the language being: "The person to whom the rent is owing, or his agent or attorney, may file an affidavit. . . ." At common law, the right to rent was incident to the reversion, and the remedy by distress for arrears of rent was lost by assignment of the reversion, either absolutely or by way of mortgage. 1 Woodfall, Land. & T. 1st Am. ed. p. 421. It became a mere chose in action. And so not until the Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. could executors or administrators distraint for arrears of rent incurred in the lifetime of the owner. 1 Woodfall, Land. & T. p. 427. By the same statute (32 Hen. VIII.) was given the power of distress upon the lands out of which the rent is reserved, so long as they continue in the hands of him to whom the rent is due, or of any person representing or claiming title through or under him, by purchase, gift, or descent; and it is argued that as this part of the statute of Hen. VIII. has not been copied into our statute while the part of it giving the power of distress to a personal representative has been so copied, the remedy by distress does not follow even an assignment of the reversion. In this state, however, it has been held (Breading v. Taylor, 13 B. Mon. 477) that, if a sale be made of land in possession of a tenant, the tenant, and all coming into possession under him, becomes the tenant of the vendee, and may not attorn his possession to a stranger. Saunders v. Moore, 14 Bush, 97. It would seem, therefore, that in this state the remedy might be held to follow the reversion, after notice to the tenant of the alienation, and would undoubtedly do so after an attornment, as that would establish the relationship of landlord and tenant. This question, however, is not before the court. In 6 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2819, it is said: "The requisites of a valid distress are, that there shall have been an actual demise or letting of the premises, and the relation of landlord and tenant exist between the parties; that there shall be a reversion in the landlord; that the rent be certain or capable of being made certain; and that the rent shall be due; and that there shall be a reservation of a certain rent." And in Taylor, Land. & T. § 568, referring to the New York statute, in substance the same as the statute of 83 Hen. VIII., it is said: "But, in order to confer upon such assignee a right to distrain, the lease or land should be included in the assignment; for a mere transfer of the rent remaining unpaid [which is only the transfer of a chose in action] does not carry with it the remedy by distress." We think it clear from the authorities that the right of distress does not pass to the assignee of a rent note, in the absence of statutory provision therefor.

It is claimed that this statutory authority is contained in § 2804 of the Kentucky Statutes: "If the owner or holder alien or assign his estate or term, or the rent thereafter to fall due thereon, his alienee or assignee may recover such rent,"—it being argued that the right given to alienee or assignee to recover the rent carries with it the right to the mode of recovery to which the assignor or alienor would have been entitled. It is to be observed that, in several instances, the statute upon this subject explicitly authorizes the remedy by distress,—in § 2805, against the assignee or undertenant of the lessee; in § 2818, against the tenant for life; in § 2819, to a person entitled to rents depending upon the life of another, after the death of the latter; in § 2821, to a personal representative; and in § 2824 to enforce the lien given under contracts by which the landlord is to receive a part of the crop. These express provisions indicate that, whatever might have been the legislative intent in the adoption of the statute embodied in § 2804, it was not thereby intended to grant to the assignee of a mere chose in action this extraordinary and frequently oppressive remedy. Moreover, § 2812 allows double damages for wrongful distress against the landlord, who, by reason of his ownership of the property, may generally be supposed to be financially responsible. It is fair to presume that the reason no bond is required is because of this financial responsibility, the existence of which is not to be presumed in the assignee of the chose in action. Exactly what was the legislative intent in § 2804 is somewhat difficult of ascertainment. It may very well be considered that the statute was enacted to enable the assignee to sue for and recover the rent as rent, instead of being remitted to a recovery for use and occupation, which seems to have been the common-law remedy in such case. Castleman v. Belt, 2 B. Mon. 157. But we are not disposed, by implication, to extend this harsh and summary remedy so as to make it applicable to a case to which it has never, so far as we are informed, been applied in this or any other country. For the reasons given the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to set aside the judgment sustaining the demurrer to appellants' answer, and for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The distance from depots and the frequency of use for switching purposes, do not control in determining whether a certain point on the railroad a mile distant from the depot is or is not within the depot grounds or yard limits so as to be exempt from the statutory provision as to fencing the railroad.
2. The opinion of a witness is of no value on the question whether or not a particular place at which there is a railroad switch to which the switch engine frequently runs is within the depot grounds or yard limits.
3. A fence on one side of a railroad in front of a dwelling house to prevent children from getting on the track cannot be required of a railroad company at a place at which it is not required to build a statutory fence with cattle guards and wing fences because it is within depot grounds or yard limits.

4. A switch about a mile from a railroad depot to which a switch engine runs frequently and at irregular intervals without receiving orders as against other trains is within depot grounds or yard limits so that it is not required to be fenced.

(December 21, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of Muskegon County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Mr. Frank H. Smith, for plaintiff in error:

The statute does not apply to such portions of the track of railway companies as are within the yard limits or station grounds in towns or villages, or even at unimportant sidings where it is customary to take on or discharge freight.

McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57

NOTE.—As to the obligation of a railroad to fence its track on depot grounds and elsewhere, see Gallagher v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 6 L. R. A. 787, and note.

Mich. 559; Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598.

The very condition that exempts a yard limit from the application of the statute, here existed, viz.: A switch leading into the cooper shop which was placed there for the purpose of reaching such freight as could be furnished at that point.

Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 518; Lafayette & I. R. Co. v. Shriner, 6 Ind. 141; Davis v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 26 Iowa, 549; Durand v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 559; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Parker, 29 Ind. 471; Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Parkhurst, 84 Ind. 501.

In so far as freight is received and delivered by the railway company at this point, it of itself constitutes a station, or at least a part of the station, at the city of Muskegon.

Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598.

It would be dangerous to establish a statutory fence at this point.

Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Campbell, 47 Mich. 265; Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 620.

The fact that it would have been dangerous to inclose with fences this portion of the track was undisputed in the case, and should not have been submitted to the jury.

McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 560.

Messrs. Macdonald & Marr, for defendant in error:

The legislature never intended to limit the benefits and protections which this statute affords "to the citizens living along the line of a railroad against danger of injury to his cattle and other animals, and deny it to his infant children who are not yet old enough to enable them to comprehend such perils and dangers.

Keyser v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 68 Mich. 397; Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 514.

A point remote from a depot, where freight is occasionally received, does not fall within the rule of exemption.

The mere existence of a switch at a certain point does not make that point a part of the depot grounds, which under the statute need not be fenced. All grounds must be fenced but those necessary to the use of the public and the transaction of business.

Vanderwerker v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Mo. App. 166.

The burden is on the railway company to show that it could not safely maintain fences and guards.

The question as to what are station grounds is a question for the jury.

How far the convenient use of depot grounds requires them to be left unfenced is a question for the jury.

Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 48 Ill. App. 36.

Any exceptional case must be proved by the railway company. Its existence cannot be inferred.

Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 514.

The trial judge was right in submitting, as a question of fact, to the jury, the extent of the supposed depot grounds.

McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 73 Wis. 228; Fowler v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Wis. 78; Blair v. Milwaukee, P. du Ch. R. Co. 20 Wis. 254; *Dinwoodie v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. The danger to trainmen from wing fences and cattle guards, at this point, was very slight in the occasional use of the switch or side track compared with the dangers to the public generally from the exposed condition of the track.

Brandenburg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 44 Mo. App. 224.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, who was five years old, passed from the highway opposite his father's house onto the railroad right of way, which was unfenced, caught hold of one of the box cars of a train, and was drawn under the cars and injured. Plaintiff, at the conclusion of the evidence, withdrew from the consideration of the jury all grounds of negligence except the failure to fence its right of way as provided by the statute. The defendant insisted that the portion of its right of way where the plaintiff was injured was within its station grounds or yard limits, which the law did not require it to fence. This presents the sole controversy. The court below left it to the jury to determine whether this was a necessary part of its station grounds or yard limits, and therefore exempt from the statutory duty to fence. That portion of the city of Muskegon is fairly well settled. It is laid out in streets and blocks, the distance between Hamburg and Israella streets being 264 feet. Defendant's road runs north and south, parallel to and adjoining Ambrosia street. Plaintiff lived on the northwest lot of the block, on the east side of the street. Directly opposite his residence was a cooper shop with a side track running to it; the switch being in close proximity to Israella street. Directly south of Israella street is a large manufacturing establishment. There are three side tracks,—two upon the east and one upon the west side of the main track. The main switch to these side tracks is located in close proximity to Israella street. The following facts are established: (1) The right of way at this point is within the yard limits, as fixed by the defendant; (2) to inclose the right of way with wing fences and cattle guards on both sides of each street would render switching and the management of trains at this point dangerous to employees; (3) plaintiff's own expert witness shows that "yard limits are the space within which yard engines may work without receiving orders, as against other trains;" (4) the right of way at the point of the accident was within the yard limits, as thus defined. The father of the plaintiff testified: "The switch engine runs up there frequently, and draws freight cars to the Monroe Manufacturing Company. It goes at irregular intervals; is likely to run up at most any time." The engineer of the defendant testified as follows: "It becomes necessary, in handling trains with a switching crew, to protect that crew against trains on the main line, other than the ordinary way of protecting a train on the main line outside; and a yard-limit sign is placed at a proper distance outside of the extreme limit to which the switch engines go. And the men are notified, also, of the point of the yard limit, which is at a sufficient distance outside of where switch engines have to go in doing their switching to protect them against main-line trains. That sign which indicates the yard limits is a notice to incoming trains that they are likely to meet switching engines any time after passing that limit. Switching engines are allowed to work over the track, within the yard limits, without special orders, and without the precaution of flagging. Men have to couple and uncouple cars at those points,—pass back and forth from the train to the switch; and they are quite liable to be caught by anything of the nature of a cattle guard, and thrown down, injured, especially in the darkness." This evidence is uncontradicted. It is clear that defendant's employees who do the switching would be compelled to cross over these cattle guards. Plaintiff's counsel appear to recognize this fact, and advance the proposition that fencing does not necessarily mean wing fences and cattle guards at highway crossings. To meet the case made by the defendant in regard to switching, and the danger from inclosing its right of way with fences and cattle guards, they introduced one witness who had been a railroad employee; and he testified that, in his opinion, "the spot, where the cooper shop is, is not a part of the depot and station grounds."

It appears that the depots—passenger and freight—were nearly a mile distant. Distance from depots is not the controlling consideration, in determining "depot grounds" or "yard limits," which are synonymous terms. It is well known that in large cities these grounds extend for several miles. Neither does the question of frequent or infrequent use for switching purposes control. The question is, Are they reasonably necessary for that purpose, or liable to become so? It is not necessary to go outside of our own decisions, in determining this question. It was settled in McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 555. In that case the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Sherwood, and concurred in by the entire court. It was there said: "The existence or extent of these grounds is not to be determined by the continued actual use of any part thereof. When station grounds are laid out, their contemplated future use is not unfrequently of more consideration than the actual demands at the time in determining their shape and extent." The construction and operation of new lines of railroad always tend to the development of the resources of the section through which it passes, and is followed by increased population and business. This is a matter of such common observation that ordinary prudence and foresight determine such an appropriation for station purposes as shall be commensurate with such reasonably anticipated growth. When these grounds are appropriated and set apart by the company it would be neither safe nor wise to allow their limits to be curtailed or extended by a jury in a proceeding where they collaterally come in question, as in this case, upon the mere showing that any part of the same was not in actual use at any particular time." This was followed and approved in Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598; Wilder v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 70 Mich. 382; Rinear v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. 70 Mich. 620; Schneekloth v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. (Mich.) 65 N. W. 668. Moreover, switch grounds, as well as stations and freight depots, are exempt from constructing fences. 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1194. It is there said: "The exemption of switch grounds is founded on the danger to employees which would necessarily result were the tracks fenced. The safety of the employees at points where they almost continually pass up and down the track in the performance of their duties is far more important than would be the safety afforded to animals and property from the erection of fences at such tracks." See also Flint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 510.

The opinion of plaintiff's witness was of no value. The question was confined to the spot where the cooper shop is. It did not meet or contradict the defendant's evidence that switching was done there; that it was part of the yard limits, as defined by the same witness, and that fencing with wing fences and cattle guards would be extremely dangerous. In fact, both counsel and the witness appear to have recognized the danger in thus fencing; for the attention of the witness is immediately drawn to the construction of the fence on the east side of the right of way along Ambrosia street, and particularly where the cooper shop is, and he said: "In my opinion, it would not interfere with railroad operations at all to maintain a fence on the east side of the railway right of way, and particularly where the cooper shop is." The proposition is seriously made that the defendant was required to construct a fence along the east side of its right of way, in front of plaintiff's house, without wing fences or cattle guards, as a protection to children living on the east side of the highway. The position is untenable. The statute requires no such fence. The common law imposes no duty to fence. Justice Cooley said in Marcott v. Marquette, H. & O. R. Co. 49 Mich. 99: "We have no statute requiring fences for protection against personal injuries." If, however, such protection were contemplated, the statutory fence must be constructed; that is, one with cattle guards and wing fences. If a fence had been maintained along the street, which would serve to keep a boy out, a few steps would have taken him around the end of the fence, to the right of way. It is absurd to say that such a fence would serve as a protection. Under this record, the defendant had conclusively established that this was a part of its yard limits, and that it was exempt from fencing. We do not intend to express any opinion upon the question whether the failure to erect and maintain such a fence as the statute requires is a negligent act, as against persons who enter upon the right of way and are injured. That question is not raised by defendant, and it is before us.

Judgment reversed, and new trial ordered.

Long, Ch. J., and Montgomery and Hooker, JJ., concurred with Grant, J.

Moore, J., dissenting:

In September, 1895, the plaintiff, a boy about five years old, was living with his father on the east side of Ambrosia street, in Muskegon. North of his father's residence, Hamburg street crossed Ambrosia street at right angles. Israella street was the next street south of Hamburg street. West of Ambrosia street, and parallel to it, was the main track of defendant company. West of the track was a cooper shop fronting on Hamburg street, with a side door near the rear end of the shop, opening upon defendant's right of way. A short distance from the shop, coming from the south, ran a side track to the cooper shop. This siding would hold two or three freight cars, and freight could be passed through the side door to and from the shop, to and from the freight cars, by using a gang plank. The residence of Mr. Rabidon fronted on Ambrosia street. There was no fence between Ambrosia street and the main line of defendant company, and no cattle guards on Hamburg or Israella streets. The cooper shop is something more than a mile from the freight house of defendant company, and still further from its passenger station. South of the cooper shop, something more than a block was the Monroe manufacturing plant, running to which were several side tracks from the main line. This portion of Muskegon was quite thickly settled. On the day in question the plaintiff passed from Ambrosia street, upon the right of way of defendant company, with two boys older than himself, and was lifted by one of them to a seat upon the door sill of the cooper shop. This door was from two to four feet above the ground. A freight train came slowly along, and, after the engine had passed, the plaintiff ran and caught upon some projection from one of the cars, for the purpose of riding, and was carried forward, towards the switch, until he finally fell and received severe injuries. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that the injury to the child was the result of the neglect of the company to build a fence on the westerly line of Ambrosia street from Hamburg to Israella street. It is the claim of the defendant that it is under no obligation to build a fence on Ambrosia street, and cattle guards on Hamburg and Israella streets for the reason that the convenience of the public and the safety of the employees of the company required that these spaces should be unfenced. Each of the witnesses who so stated testified on the cross-examination that the construction of a fence on Ambrosia street would not interfere with the convenience of the public, the operations of the train, or the safety of the employees, unless there were wing fences and cattle guards on Hamburg and Israella streets. It was claimed that cattle guards at those streets would make the work of the employees of the company more hazardous, and the reason assigned was that it was necessary to pass over the street crossings, in coupling and uncoupling cars, to reach the siding at the cooper shop and at the Monroe manufacturing plant. It was also claimed by the railroad that this ground was in the yard limits of the road; the witness so testifying explaining that yard limits were those portions of the road where the switching engine and crew might work without special orders, and without the precaution of flagging. This witness claimed that the entire road of the company in Muskegon was within the yard limits. Testimony was offered on the part of the plaintiff that it would not inconvenience the public, or interfere with the operation of defendant's trains, or the safety of its employees, to have constructed a fence between Ambrosia street and defendant's right of way. Plans and photographs of the premises were introduced in evidence. There was no testimony offered upon the part of the defendant showing how much the company used the siding at the cooper shop, or how frequently cars were coupled or uncoupled between Hamburg and Israella streets. The witness made the general statement that it was not practicable or safe to fence the road at this place. There was testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to show that the cooper-shop switch was not used more than once a month, and that this portion of the road was no part of the depot and station grounds, and that the switching into the freight yards of the company, and the making up of its trains, was not done within a long distance of this locality.

The judge charged the jury, in part, as follows: "It is the duty of the railroad company to maintain fences on each side of its railway track, and to maintain cattle guards at highway crossings and street crossings. In other words, it is the duty of the railway to inclose its tracks by fences on each side, and by guards where the streets and highways come, so that their track between those places would be inclosed. There are certain exceptions to that law, and one question is whether this particular place comes within that exception. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that it was the duty of the railroad company to establish a fence along the westerly line of this street,—a straight fence, 18 feet from the railroad track. Gentlemen, that would be no compliance with the statute at all. The statute provides, as I have said, that the railroad track should be inclosed. Now, was it proper to inclose this track? I am going to submit that question to you. The evidence shows here that there is a switch between these two streets near the cooper shop, and a cooper shop, which is used sometimes, and sometimes it is unused. The first question for you to take into consideration is whether it would inconvenience the railroad company in the operation of its business, and the public, to go and inclose that switch,—the shops there from street to street,—on each side. If you find it would, the company are not required to furnish a fence at all. If you find that it would not, the next question that you may take into consideration is as to whether, if a fence were maintained there on each side, and the proper guards put in to make an inclosure, whether it would be dangerous to the parties who are operating the railroad,—the men who are working on the trains. If you find that it would not be proper to put those things in there for the purpose of completing the fence, without being dangerous to the employees of the railroad company, so that they might be responsible for an injury to them if one occurred, then they would not be required to fence. In that case, plaintiff cannot recover at all. You will take these two propositions into consideration: First, would it inconvenience the railroad company in the operating of their trains and the switch there, and that factory, and the public, or either of them, so it would be inconvenient and improper for them to have that inclosed in a fence? If so the plaintiff cannot recover at all, because they are not required to fence it. Next, if they did that, and put in the guards, as required by the statute, at the street crossings, would it be dangerous to the parties who are operating trains, in switching or otherwise, using that switch or the main track? If so, they were not required to put it in, and not required to do the fencing; and upon either of these propositions, if you find that it would be improper to have it inclosed and have those guards in, plaintiff cannot recover. If you find that it would be proper, and would not inconvenience the railroad company or the public in the operating of this cooper shop, and their road in connection therewith, and the approaches, etc., to it, to the cooper shop, by the public, and that it be proper to have a guard in there, and would not be dangerous to those who are operating the train or doing the switching, then it was the duty of the railroad company to inclose this with a fence. The next question to be taken into consideration is as to whether the fact,—if you find that it was the duty of the railroad company to maintain a fence there,—whether that fact alone was the cause of the child's being injured. If it was not, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover at all. He is not entitled to complain unless he was injured by reason of that; and, for the purpose of determining that question, you should take into consideration the age of this boy, the kind of a fence that it is the duty of the railroad company to maintain (you have heard that section read, so that you know what kind of a fence,—an ordinary board fence 4½ feet high); whether, if a fence had been there, that fact would have kept this boy off from the track. If you say that it would not, why, of course, that ends the case, so far as the plaintiff is concerned; he would not be entitled to recover. The boy would probably have climbed over the fence. If you are satisfied of that, or that it would not have stopped him,—he would have gone around the end, or got onto the track in some other way,—of course he has no right to complain because there was no fence there. . . . If you find that the boy would probably have gotten over the fence and gone down on the track, then there are certain other things for you to take into consideration. It is conceded, so far as this case is concerned, that the railroad company were operating their trains just exactly as they had a right to operate them; that they were not running too fast; that they were keeping proper lookouts, and doing everything that was necessary for them to do to protect themselves, except this fence.

. . . If, after taking the age of the boy, and all the surroundings, and those remarks, into consideration, you are satisfied that the boy at that time knew that it was dangerous for him to get onto that train, why, he cannot recover at all. Because he ran into danger, he would be negligent himself. . . . And if you find that he knew, after making this talk there, notwithstanding the fence,—if he knew, after having this talk there, that it was dangerous for him to touch that train and do what he was going to do,—he cannot recover at all. He is not entitled to recover. Railroad companies are no insurers of parties, of boys, who are seeking injury to them, boys who are seeking to catch onto railroad trains, if they know better; and that is one of the questions in this case."

The court was requested to instruct the jury that defendant was not obliged to fence its road at this point, and its refusal to do so is assigned as error. Where the material facts in a case are undisputed, and those facts show that the portion of a road unfenced is a part of the station or depot grounds, then it is undoubtedly the duty of the court to instruct the jury that the railroad is not obliged to fence. McGrath v. Detroit, M. & M. R. Co. 57 Mich. 555; Grondin v. Duluth, S. S. & A. R. Co. 100 Mich. 598.

I am unable to find a case, decided by this court, where, under the testimony shown, it was doubtful whether the place of the accident or the cause of the injury for which suit was brought was within the station or depot grounds, within the definition given by this court of what constitutes station and depot grounds. In Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Schaeffer, 5 Ind. App. 86, the railroad company claimed that its road could not properly be fenced, for the reason that to have fenced it there would have included the putting in of cattle guards, which would have endangered the safety of its employees in the use of that part of the railroad in switching and making up trains; and it was held by the court that, as the evidence upon that question was conflicting, the verdict of the jury would not be disturbed. In Cox v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 128 Mo. 362, it was held that the burden of showing, as a reason for not fencing, because so doing would endanger the employees, was upon the defendant, and that, where the testimony was conflicting, it raised a question of fact, to be decided by the jury. See Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Thompson, 48 Ill. App. 86; Indianapolis, D. & W. R. Co. v. Clay, 4 Ind. App. 282, 287. In Brandenburg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 44 Mo. App. 224, it is held that when it is fairly debatable, under the evidence, whether it is necessary to have unfenced a part of its road, to avoid danger to its employees, and for the safe and convenient transaction of its business with the public, it raises a question of fact, which should be submitted to the jury. See also Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. v. Woody, 15 Ind. App. 831. In the recent case of Grosse v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 91 Wis. 482, it is held that, "no doubt the question of what, or how much grounds at any particular station will be necessary for the convenience of business at that station must, in the first instance, be determined by the company itself. But that determination cannot, considering the nature of the interests involved, in all cases be conclusive. . . . Cases may arise in which it may properly be a question for the jury whether the place where the animals were injured was within the limits of the grounds which were reasonably necessary for depot uses." And in that case it was said that it was a question for the jury. The following cases are to the same effect: Dinwiddie v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 70 Wis. 160; McDonough v. Milwaukee & N. R. Co. 78 Wis. 223. In Plint & P. M. R. Co. v. Lull, 28 Mich. 514, the court cited with approval a case in which it was held that while the statute requiring fences has no application to points where it would be illegal or improper that roads should be fenced, such as the crossings of streets or alleys in a town, or at mills, etc., where public convenience requires the way to be left open, yet that this is the limit of the exception, and the track within the limits of the city or town, at points where no such reasons apply, is as much within the statute as the track elsewhere. And in the same case it is held that, if it is claimed that any reason of public or private convenience requires the right of way to be unfenced, it is for the railroad company to show it. This accident occurred in a thickly-settled portion of the city, one mile from the freight station of the defendant company, near a short siding that was used to accommodate a cooper shop employing only from two to four men, and which furnished to defendant road but a small amount of freight, the burden was upon defendant to show that it was not required to fence its road at this point. The testimony was conflicting. Under such circumstances, a question of fact was raised, which was properly left to the jury. The jury found against the defendant, under a charge so favorable to the defendant that it has no right to complain of it.

No other questions are raised by brief of counsel. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

DETROIT LOAN & BUILDING ASSOCIATION, Plff. in Err.

(15 Mich. 340.)

1. The landlord's common-law right of re-entry after default in payment of rent and notice served upon the tenant to terminate the lease, if such re-entry is made peaceably, is not abridged by How. Ann. Stat. § 8299 et seq.,

(December 21, 1897.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged trespass on plaintiff's property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the dissenting opinion.

Messrs. Levi J. Fick and Robert Young, for plaintiff in error:

The contract having been terminated, the plaintiff could not be allowed to prove a new purchase or a revival of the old by evidence of oral agreement.

Bartlett v. Bartlett, 108 Mich. 296.

The written contract having been terminated, and no valid evidence of a new agreement for purchase or revival of the old contract with changes having been presented, it follows conclusively that the case relied upon in the declaration had fallen.

Ives v. Williams, 58 Mich. 688; United States Mfg. Co. v. Stevens, 52 Mich. 384.

Under any possible theory, the defendant was, and the plaintiff was not, entitled to possession of the premises at the time of the alleged trespass. If she was not entitled to possession, her personal injuries, if she sustained any, were received while she was committing a trespass on the property of another.

United States Mfg. Co. v. Stevens, 52 Mich. 384.

The vendee in a land contract has no right of possession unless expressly given it by the land contract, the right of possession being in the holder of the title.

Gamble v. Ross, 88 Mich. 315; Buell v. Irwin, 24 Mich. 145.

The judgment of the commissioner cannot be attacked collaterally, and is conclusive.

A verbal contract can neither "be set up as a ground of action nor as a defense."

Bartlett v. Bartlett, 108 Mich. 296.

The service of the notice to quit was sufficient; especially in view of the fact that the notice is attached to her bill of complaint filed a week after the service and a month before the alleged trespass.

McSloy v. Ryan, 27 Mich. 110.

He who denies his liability as tenant cannot insist that the landlord observe his rights as a tenant, such as notice to quit, etc.

If the declaration alleges a substantial grievance and is not demurred to, it is sufficient.

Ile Royale Mtn. Co. v. Hertin, 37 Mich. 332, 26 Am. Rep. 520; Cubit v. O'Dett, 51 Mich. 847.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I cannot agree with the conclusion of Mr. Justice Moore. On the contrary, I think that when the plaintiff failed to pay the rent due within the time fixed by the notice served upon her, her right to occupy the premises terminated. In my opinion, it was not the purpose of § 8299 and § 8308 to abridge the common-law right of re-entry in such cases. These sections should be construed as providing a remedy by proceedings in court, and the limitations are to be construed as limitations placed upon such remedy. To give to these sections of the statute the construction adopted by the trial judge, and approved by Mr. Justice Moore in his opinion, is to extend the term of the tenant beyond the time fixed by agreement. In Taylor, Land. & T. § 532, it is said, after a consideration of many authorities: "The right of the landlord forcibly to enter and expel the tenant who holds over after the conclusion of his term, or the expiration of a notice to quit, subject only to indentment under the statutes for excessive force against the person, is now generally established." In Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. 150, 4 Am. Dec. 258, it is said: It is well settled that a person having title—that is a right to enter—is not liable to an action of trespass for entering with force, although liable to indictment for forcible entry. To the same effect is Souter v. Codman, 14 R. I. 119, 51 Am. Rep. 364. In the case of Freeman v. Wilson it is said: "At the expiration of a notice to quit the tenant becomes a trespasser, and the landlord may enter the premises, during the tenant's absence, take possession, and eject the tenant's goods, without legal process, and the tenant has no right to re-enter. 17 Atl. 931 [16 R. I. 524]; Low v. Ethell, 121 Mass. 809, 28 Am. Rep. 272; Ives v. Ives, 13 Johns. 235. In Fuhr v. Dean, 26 Mo. 116, 69 Am. Dec. 484, it is said: "Where one having title to land and a right of entry enters thereon, although the entry be by force, the common law affords no civil remedy to the party dispossessed; he must resort to the statutory remedy by action of forcible entry and detainer." How. Anno. Stat. § 8284, provides: "No person shall make any entry into lands, tenements, or other possessions, but in cases where entry is given by law; and, in such cases, he shall not enter with force, but only in a peaceable manner." The succeeding sections provide how possession may be restored if one does enter by force. In construing statutes containing similar provisions, the courts have not been agreed as to what is meant by force and in a peaceable manner. In Smith v. Reeder, 21 Or. 541, 15 L. R. A. 172, it is held, in a case where a lease of property had by its own limitations expired, and the tenant refused to surrender possession, but continued to hold over, and the landlord, during the temporary absence of the tenant, leaving no one in possession, entered in a peaceable and orderly manner, and, having so entered, forced open in a peaceable manner and unlocked the door of a dwelling house on the premises which had been fastened by the tenant, and in a careful manner removed the tenant's goods, and stored them in an outbuilding, and moved his own household goods and family into the house, sending word to the tenant that he could have a reasonable time in which to come upon the premises to remove his goods and stock, it was held that this was not a forcible entry, within the meaning of the statute. In the same case it was held that a forcible entry, within the meaning of the statute, is to enter with some circumstance of force or violence to the person, or one accomplished in a riotous or tumultuous manner, endangering the public peace. An entry which has no other force than that implied in every trespass is not within the statute. In the case of Fort Dearborn Lodge No. 214, I. O. O. F. v. Klein, 115 Ill. 191, 56 Am. Rep. 133, it is held: "The word 'force,' as here used, means actual force, as contradistinguished from implied force. Any entry requires force, in the literal sense of the term, but that, of course, could not have been meant, for it would involve an absurdity. Nor does it mean that force which the law implies where a peaceable entry is made by one having no right to enter, for the act absolutely prohibits a person of that kind from making an entry at all. The conclusion, therefore, is irresistible that the force which the statute inhibits is actual force." See Willard v. Warren, 17 Wend. 257. In the case of Hoffman v. Harrington, 23 Mich. 54, it is said, with respect to real property, the owner having right of entry may, since the statute, enter peaceably upon one who is in possession without right, by the very terms of those statutes, and that a forcible entry is not made unless the tenant is forcibly expelled, and is not complete until the expulsion. In the case of Shaw v. Hoffman, 25 Mich. 162, it is said that in construing our statute much respect should be given to the decisions of the courts construing like statutes. Justice Christy said: "The statute was not intended to apply to a mere trespass, however wrongful; the entry or the detainer must be riotous, or personal violence must be used, or in some way threatened, or the conduct of the parties guilty of the entry or detainer must be such as in some way to inspire terror or alarm in the persons evicted or kept out; [in other words], the force contemplated by the statute is not merely the force used against or upon the property, but force used or threatened against persons, as a means or for the purpose of expelling or keeping out the prior possessor." In Franck v. Wiegert, 56 Mich. 474, it is said: "If the defendant, at the time he entered into possession of the property, had the right to that possession, and he entered peaceably, such possession would be lawful, and neither the plaintiff nor her husband would have the right to forcibly put him out." In the case of Marsh v. Bristol, 65 Mich. 378, it is said: "Under the law as it existed before the statute, the default of plaintiff under the lease would have justified Bristol in entering, and using sufficient force to put him out. The statute changing this right does not make the continuance in possession any less unlawful, but, in the interest of public tranquility, provides against breaking the public peace. In doing so it adopts the definitions of the law as existing on the subject of forcible entries, which were already indictable in other cases. It provides that a person put out by forcible entry may be restored to possession. How. Anno. Stat. §§ 8284, 8285. But where there has not been a forcible entry, it does not forbid retaining possession by force unless the possession is unlawful, and against the rights of the person kept out." And in commenting upon the case of Hoffman v. Harrington it is said: "It was further said that leaving goods on the premises could not prevent making a peaceable entry, as force against property was no breach of the peace, and the force, to make it unlawful, must be against the tenant himself. In that case the property was actually put off, but that was held not to bring it within the statute. It is entirely well settled that unless the tenant is driven off either by actual force applied to him, or as the only apparent way of avoiding its use against him at the time, he cannot be regarded as forcibly expelled, and there is no forcible entry." It is also said: "The object of the statute against forcible entries is not to aid men in violating their obligations, and holding what they have no right to hold, but merely to prevent riotous and forcible measures in breach of the peace. Bristol and his principal were the parties wronged by the plaintiff's continuance in possession against right. By going into possession without breaking the peace, Bristol committed no wrong in claiming possession, and in remaining there peaceably; and, this being so, by plaintiff's own showing plaintiff himself was the aggressor to regain a wrongful occupancy. This the law will not permit." In the case of Gillespie v. Beecher, 85 Mich. 355, which was a case where the plaintiff was in possession of an hotel as a tenant (which hotel was owned by the defendant) after the lease had expired, it was held the jury should have been instructed that, if they were satisfied from the testimony that the lease had terminated, Mr. Beecher was entitled in the law to the possession of his premises, and that he had a right to enter peaceably into the possession thereof, and that plaintiff and her husband had no right to remove him by force; that in doing so they made an assault upon him that was unlawful, and he had a right to resist such assault by force sufficient to repel it; and, if he used no more force than was necessary to repel the assault, he would not be liable to the plaintiff in this action. We think it follows from the cases cited that the jury should have been instructed that, if the plaintiff had leased the lands from defendant, as testified to by its attorney, and the lease had been terminated for nonpayment of rent, and the defendant, through its attorney, had obtained possession of the house peaceably, that it was not liable in this action, unless more force was used by its agents than was necessary to repel the effort of plaintiff to regain possession of the house.

As to the other assignment of error, in relation to the charge of the court upon the question of damages in relation to the personal property, we think there is testimony in the case that justified the giving of the charge. The plaintiff, in his brief, argues that the court erred in charging the jury that the proceeding before the circuit court commissioner ended the relation of vendor and vendee between the parties. As the plaintiff has not appealed, or assigned error in relation to this matter, we are not inclined to discuss the question. For the reasons stated, judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Long, Ch. J., and Grant, J., concurred with Montgomery, J.

Moore, J., dissenting:

Plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant for a trespass committed upon her person and to her personal property, from which judgment defendant appeals.

Plaintiff's declaration alleged, in substance, that she purchased upon land contract from defendant, on the 20th day of March, 1890, the west half of lot 29, of Hunt & Leggett's subdivision. The declaration then stated the terms of the contract as originally made: "That plaintiff went into possession of the premises by virtue of it, and that November 1, 1895, the contract was modified, stating the terms of the modification, and that on March 30, 1896, while she was in the possession of the premises by virtue of the contract, the defendant entered upon said premises, and without process of law, and contrary to the just rights of the plaintiff in said premises, and while the plaintiff was sick, wickedly and wrongfully caused the said plaintiff to be knocked down and bruised, and to be thrown bodily from and out of the said building on said premises, and to be dragged out from said premises, etc.; . . . and that the said defendant caused the goods and chattels of the plaintiff in said buildings on said premises to be thrown in the street, and deprived plaintiff wrongfully of her goods and chattels," etc. Another count in the declaration charged that the plaintiff came into possession of said premises March 20, 1890, by virtue of said contract and agreement, and while she was rightfully in possession of said premises an assault was made upon her by defendant, and her goods were thrown into the street. The plaintiff introduced testimony tending to show all of the facts stated in her declaration. The modification of the contract which plaintiff claims was made in October or November, 1895, was an oral modification, and not in writing. It is the claim of the defendant that in the fall of 1895 the plaintiff was in default in her payments under the contract, and that proceedings were commenced before a circuit court commissioner to obtain possession of said premises, which resulted in a judgment for restitution in favor of the defendant corporation; that, after this judgment was obtained, an arrangement was made with the plaintiff by which she was to pay rent at the rate of $10 per month, and that her possession from that time was to be as tenant, and not as vendee. The record discloses that on February 21, 1896, the defendant caused a notice to quit or pay rent to be served by leaving it at the house with Mr. Engel, who occupied the lower part of the house as a tenant under Mrs. Smith. Within a week plaintiff had knowledge of the serving of this notice, and filed a bill in equity. In her bill of complaint she claimed to be in possession of the premises as vendee by virtue of the terms of the contract, setting it up, and stating she was ready to perform all of its conditions, and praying for an accounting, and for specific performance, and for a writ of injunction. A temporary injunction was granted, according to the prayer of the bill. Defendant answered to said bill, and upon his motion, on March 30, 1896, the injunction was dissolved. At this time plaintiff was keeping house in the upper part of the house upon the premises. No one was living in the lower part of the house. She had occasion to go to the business part of the city during the day, and before doing so locked the house, and carried the key with her. During her absence, and shortly after the injunction was dissolved, the attorney for the defendant unlocked one of the doors of the house, caused the plaintiff's goods to be removed to the barn upon the premises, and put a family in possession. Upon the same day, and shortly after, the plaintiff returned to the premises, unlocked the side door of the house, and entered. She claims she was then set upon by the persons in possession, and very cruelly beaten; that during her absence her furniture had been thrown out of the house, and that she had never seen it from that time until the time of the trial; that, as the result of the beating, she was sick, and confined to the house for some time; that as soon as she was able to do so she saw the defendant corporation, was referred by it to its attorney; that she informed the attorney she wanted a deed of the premises, and was ready to comply with the terms of the contract; that he informed her she had been fired out of the premises, and that he had instructed the person who had put her out to keep her out; that, if she went back again, she would be kicked out, and he would have her arrested. On the part of the defendant it was claimed that Mrs. Smith was not treated as she testified; that no more force was used than was necessary to repel her attacks; that she finally left the premises voluntarily; that no injury was done to the personal property, and that she was notified where it was, and that she could have it at any time. The circuit judge charged the jury, in effect, that they could not go back of the proceedings before the circuit court commissioner, which proceedings must be regarded as conclusive, and that the relation of vendor and vendee was ended by them; that the relation of vendor and vendee could not be restored by an oral agreement between the vendor and the vendee. He further charged them that the notice of February 21, 1896, that plaintiff should either vacate the premises or pay the rent due, did not terminate the relation of landlord and tenant; that under such circumstances, if the tenant does not vacate, it is the duty of the landlord to commence proceedings in court, and get a judgment, before a tenancy can be ended; and that in this case, while the entry was, in the eyes of the law, a peaceable entry, it was nevertheless an unlawful entry, and he charged the jury they must find a verdict for some amount in favor of the plaintiff. He then charged them upon the question of damages to her person, and in reference to the damages of the goods he charged the jury as follows: "Respecting the wrong done her goods, if you find that all the defendant did was to set her goods outside, and notified her that she could take them, it was her duty to take them, and thereby lessen the damage to that extent. If, on the other hand, she was deprived of the goods entirely, and if she could not have them; why then she would be entitled to the value of the goods."

The defendant insists there are three reversible errors in this case. One is that the proofs do not sustain the cause of action alleged in the declaration, because the cause of action alleged is that the plaintiff was in possession as vendee under the contract, while the proofs show that she was in as a tenant, and that her tenancy had been terminated by the notice, and the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant as requested. Another ground assigned to be error is that, as the entry was a peaceable entry of premises to the possession of which the defendant was lawfully entitled, therefore the plaintiff cannot recover. The third claim is that the court erred in his instruction to the jury as to the damages which might be allowed in relation to the personal property. The declaration was not demurred to, but the plea of the general issue, with notice of the defenses heretofore mentioned, was interposed. The gist of the declaration is, not a trespass upon real property, but a trespass upon the person, and to personal property, while the plaintiff was rightfully in the possession of certain real property. We quite agree with the learned trial judge that it was immaterial whether the possession of the real estate by the plaintiff was as vendee, as claimed by her, or as a tenant, as claimed by defendant, if she was in fact lawfully in the possession of the premises; and we see nothing in the pleadings that would prevent a recovery if the facts warranted it. If it be assumed, as it must be, for the purposes of this case, under the proofs, that, after the agreement of November, 1895, the plaintiff's occupancy was that of a tenant, the next question to be considered is, Did the notice of February, 1896, terminate the tenancy, so that defendant was justified in taking possession of the premises as it did, and using force to put the plaintiff out, when she attempted to repossess herself of the house? Defendant insists it did, and cites How. Anno. Stat. § 5774; Taylor, Land. & T. §§ 531, 532, and note 1; Hoffman v. Harrington, 22 Mich. 55; Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. 150, 4 Am. Dec. 258; Ives v. Ives, 13 Johns. 235; Mussey v. Scott, 32 Vt. 83. An examination of the authorities cited will show that the decisions were rendered in cases brought either for trespass to the real estate, or to obtain the possession of the real estate, or where the tenancy was ended beyond any contingency that it might be restored by the act of the tenant. We think with the trial judge that How. Anno. Stat. § 5774, is to be construed in connection with § 8295, which provides how possession of premises may be recovered, and § 8299, which provides that upon the trial to recover possession of the premises, if it is claimed that complainant is entitled to the possession of the premises in consequence of the nonpayment of any sum of money due, either as rent or as a part of the purchase money, this amount shall be ascertained, and be stated in the judgment, and with § 8308, which provides that no writ of restitution, for five days after judgment, shall issue, if the defendant shall pay during the five days after the rendition of judgment, the amount so found due, and double the amount of costs. If effect is to be given to the provisions of all these sections, we do not see how the construction contended for by the defendant can be given. The tenant has a right to rely upon these provisions of the statute, and that right cannot be cut off by the plaintiff's arbitrarily taking the law into his own hands, and determining for himself that the tenancy is ended. Where there is a dispute between the vendor and vendee, or the landlord and tenant, or the mortgagor and the purchaser at a mortgage sale, as to the right of possession, it cannot be said that the person who is seeking to obtain possession is given entry by law until that dispute is settled by the courts in the manner prescribed by law. An entry under the circumstances claimed by the plaintiff to exist in this case was, as the learned trial judge stated, an unlawful entry (How. Anno. Stat. § 8284), and cannot be excused or justified, where the action is brought for injury to the person and the personal property of the one evicted. No great hardship can come to anyone by following the provisions of the statute in asserting possessory rights. It is undoubtedly the purpose of these statutory provisions to change the common law in relation to the right of entry where that right is controverted, and to provide a peaceable and summary way to dispose of a disputed right of possession. A hearing may be had within a very short time, and must be had within thirty days, and no appeal can be taken without giving a bond in twice the amount of the annual rental of the premises in dispute. The statute should be given such a construction as to make it effective, and do away with such disputes and encounters as occurred in this case.

As to the other assignment of error, in relation to the charge of the court upon the question of damages in relation to the personal property, we think there is testimony in the case that justified the giving of the charge. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

T. C. VINSON, Appt.

v.

Dock FLYNN.

(.....Ark.....)

1. A landlord forcibly taking possession of the premises after the lease has expired, if he does not use excessive force, is not subject to a civil action by the tenant unless it is provided by statute.
2. Only actual damages are recoverable for injuries unnecessarily committed in the ejection of a tenant after his term has expired, unless it is done under circumstances of aggravation.
3. An action before a court without jurisdiction of the subject matter is not the basis of an action for malicious prosecution.
4. A want of probable cause is necessary to a cause of action for malicious prosecution.

(Hughes, J., dissents from proposition 3.)

(November 27, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Woodruff County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful ejection from certain property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. T. Sanders for appellant.

Messrs. P. R. Andrews and N. W. Norton, for appellee:

Proof of malice need not be direct, but may be inferred from circumstances.

Lemay v. Williams, 32 Ark. 166; Com. v. Snelling, 15 Pick. 321.

Liability to punishment in a prosecution for the same act as an offense against the state is held not to affect the civil remedy; the jury have, notwithstanding, the same discretion to allow damages, beyond compensation, for punishment.

Ark. 176; Clark v. Balza, 15 Ark. 458; Texarkana Gas & E. L. Co. v. Orr, 59 Ark. 215.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was instituted by Dock Flynn against T. C. Vinson to recover damages. He alleges that he and his family were residing on a place known as the "Upp Place," as tenants of the defendant, and that the defendant unlawfully and maliciously entered and ejected him and his family from the place, and threw his goods and chattels in the road, to his damage in the sum of $500.

The defendant denied these allegations, and alleged that the term of plaintiff as tenant had expired, and that he had refused, after legal notice and demand, to deliver possession of the place to his landlord, the defendant, and that his family and goods were removed from the place, by the constable of his township, in obedience to legal process, in a prudent and careful manner, without the slightest insult or injury to his family, or damage to his goods.

The facts, as shown by the evidence adduced in a trial before a jury, were substantially as follows: In September, 1892, Vinson rented the Upp place to Flynn for the term of two years. After the termination of the lease, in 1894, Vinson demanded possession of the place, in writing, and Flynn refused to comply with his demand. He (Vinson) thereupon consulted two or more persons as to his right to sue for possession before a justice of the peace. They advised him that he could not do so. Not content with their advice, he applied to a justice of the peace, who, after an examination of the statutes, informed him that he had jurisdiction in such cases. He thereupon instituted an action against Flynn for the place before the justice of the peace, and sued out a writ therein, directed to the constable of the township, and commanding him, if the plaintiff gave security according to law, to deliver possession thereof to Vinson without delay. Vinson gave security as required, and the constable executed the writ in his presence, by turning Flynn and his family, consisting of a wife and three children (one a babe), out of the house upon the premises, and by removing their goods and chattels off the place. This was in January, 1895. The weather at the time and place was cold, and snow was upon the ground. One witness testified that the goods and chattels were handled roughly by the constable, and were thereby injured, but others testified to the contrary.

Evidence was adduced on the trial, over the objections of the defendant, which tended to show that Flynn acquired, before he was dispossessed, a claim of some kind to a part of the Upp place,—the demised premises.

The court, over the objections of the defendant, instructed the jury as follows:

"(2) If you find from the proof, by a preponderance, that the plaintiff was unlawfully dispossessed, you will find for the plaintiff.

"(3) If you find for the plaintiff, he is entitled to either actual damages, or actual and punitive damages, according to whether you find the unlawful act was or was not done with malice. The damages you assess must not exceed the amount claimed in the complaint, in such an amount as may be sustained by the proof.

"(4) 'Malice,' in the sense in which the word is used in civil actions, is not confined to spite or hatred, but consists of a violation of law to the prejudice of the plaintiff, done wilfully, or done with indifference as to whether it is right or wrong, and from being actuated by improper motives.

"(5) A justice of the peace has no jurisdiction to issue writs of possession for real estate, and, if he does issue such writ, it is void and without authority of law.

"(6) The burden is upon the plaintiff to prove malice, but malice may be inferred from circumstances proved; and if you find from the evidence, by a preponderance, that the defendant acted from improper or indirect motives, and without authority of law, malice on the part of the defendant may be inferred.

"(7) 'Punitive damages' means such an amount, as it is called, 'smart money,' or punishment for maliciously violating the legal rights of another; and if you find from the evidence that the defendant wantonly and maliciously, in utter disregard of the rights of the plaintiff, forcibly put him out of possession of the premises, then you may assess his damages at such sum as will be a punishment to him, and deter others from like actions. And in fixing the amount you may consider the vexation and injury to his feelings—his inconvenience—on account of the wrong done the plaintiff."

The plaintiff recovered a verdict and judgment against the defendant for $150, and the defendant appealed.

At common law no civil action can be maintained against the landlord by the tenant for forcibly taking possession of his land, which constituted the demised premises, after the expiration of the tenancy, unless there was an excess of force, and then only for the excess. There was no remedy by which he could be compelled to restore the possession forcibly taken. The law in this manner held forth strong temptations to the landlord to retake his land by force from the tenant refusing to deliver the same after the term of his lease had expired. Such actions were calculated to provoke breaches of the peace. To prevent this the statute was enacted which prohibits all persons from taking possession of land, and detaining or holding the same, except where an entry is given by law, and then only in a peaceable manner, and to protect the actual possession, not to determine the rights of property, provides the remedy of forcible entry and detainer. To restore the possession to him, who has been turned out by force, as he held it before, until the right to the possession can be adjudicated, this remedy is designed; its object being, as said by Mr. Justice Eakin, "to prevent any and all persons, with or without title, from assuming to right themselves with strong hand, after the feudal fashion, when peaceable possession cannot be obtained, and to compel them to the more pacific course of suits in court, where the weak and strong stand upon equal terms." Littell v. Grady, 38 Ark. 584; Hall v. Trucks, 38 Ark. 257; McGuire v. Cook, 13 Ark. 448; Anderson v. Mills, 40 Ark. 192; Johnson v. West, 41 Ark. 585; Logan v. Lee, 58 Ark. 94.

But a party who was in possession of land without right, and has been turned out by the owner, has no civil remedies, except those provided by statute. They are designed for the protection of his possession against force. If he abandons them, and seeks to recover damages for a trespass, then he must rely on his right, and claim the property which has been injured. The owner who has dispossessed him is then remitted to his title, and can use it to show that he has not been injured, and is not entitled to redress.

In New York the statutes at one time provided redress for dispossession by force, by an indictment for forcible entry and detainer. In People v. Leonard, 11 Johns. 508, the court said: "This was a trial for a forcible entry and detainer. The complainant, on opening his case, proposed to confine his proof to his possession only; but the judge ruled that the complainant must prove in himself an estate in fee, or an estate for years, at least; that the title was in question, and that the complainant must give the like evidence of title as was required in ejectment. Admitting the complainant must give the like evidence of title, as was required in ejectment, he offered to show what would have entitled him to recover in ejectment. If the lessor shows himself in the peaceable possession of land, and that he was forcibly dispossessed, it will be sufficient to entitle him to recover possession, and the defendant will not be permitted to set up title to defeat it. He must restore the party to his possession, wrongfully taken from him, in the first place. But I apprehend, there was a mistake in saying the title was in question. In the case of People v. King, 2 Cal. 98, on a motion to quash a conviction, and for restitution, Kent, Ch. J., says: 'We cannot decide on the title or rights of the parties. The complainant has nothing to do with that. He must give up the possession irregularly obtained, put the defendant in statu quo, and then proceed legally to the question of title.' In the case of People v. Runkle, 8 Johns. 468, Spencer, J., says: 'The court cannot, on this indictment, inquire into title. Right or title to the property is no excuse. The statute was made to prevent persons from doing themselves right by force.' And the court, in giving its opinion, seems to assume that possession is enough for the complainant to show."

In a later case (Jackson, Stansbury, v. Farmer, 9 Wend. 201), Mr. Justice Nelson, speaking for the court, said: "It was decided by this court in Hyatt v. Wood, 4 Johns. 150, 4 Am. Dec. 258, and the same principle was again applied in Ives v. Ives, 13 Johns. 285, that a person having a legal right of entry on land may enter by force, and though indictable for a breach of the peace at common law, or under the statute for a forcible entry and detainer, he is not liable to a private action for trespass for damages at the suit of a person in possession without right, and who is thus turned out of possession. This position, apparently harsh, and tending to the public disturbance and individual conflict, is abundantly supported by authority, and must be considered the law of the land. . . . It was the abuse of this summary power to right one's self by entry, where the right of entry existed, which gave rise to the numerous English statutes against forcible entry and detainer, of which our old act was substantially a copy; and in these acts, and the common-law remedy by indictment, are to be found the only protection of the party thus forcibly dispossessed. They punish criminally the force, and in some cases make restitution of the possession. People v. Leonard, 11 Johns. 509; People, Brinkerhoff v. Nelson, 13 Johns. 340; but so far as the civil remedy is concerned, there is none but what is afforded by those acts."

The same rule obtains when the statutory remedy for forcible ejection from land is the civil action of forcible entry and detainer, the principle in both cases being the same. Krevet v. Meyer, 24 Mo. 107; Fuhr v. Dean, 26 Mo. 116, 69 Am. Dec. 484; 4 Am. Law Rev. 429 et seq., and cases cited.

In the case we have under consideration, appellee was a tenant of appellant. The term of the lease had expired. The former could not dispute the title of the latter to any part of the demised premises without surrendering possession. Before he could do so, he must surrender the whole, regardless of the title of his landlord. Miller v. Turney, 18 Ark. 385; Clemm v. Wilcox, 15 Ark. 102; Bryan v. Winburn, 43 Ark. 28; Hershey v. Clark, 27 Ark. 527; Hughes v. Watt, 28 Ark. 153. Yet the lower court instructed the jury that if they found from the evidence that appellant "wantonly and maliciously, in utter disregard of the rights of the" appellee, "forcibly put him out of the possession of the premises," then they might find for the appellee, and "assess his damages at such sum as will be a punishment to" appellant, "and deter others from like actions; and in fixing the amount" they might "consider the vexation and injury to his feelings, and his inconvenience, on account of the wrong done." This was an improper instruction in this action, and it was prejudicial to appellant.

The jury were told by the circuit court that "a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction to issue writs of possession for real estate, and, if he does issue such writ, it is void and without authority of law;" and in this connection they were further instructed that, if they found that the appellant wantonly and maliciously, in utter disregard of his rights, forcibly evicted him, then they might award him exemplary damages. Taking these and all other instructions given, as a whole, we see no theory upon which they could have been based, unless it be there was evidence to show that appellant was guilty of a malicious prosecution. Upon that theory they should not have been given.

Hare and Wallace, in their notes to American Leading Cases, after a review of the cases upon what is necessary to sustain an action for malicious prosecution, say: "The gist of the action above considered is the putting of legal process in force, regularly, for the mere purpose of vexation, annoyance, or injury; and the inconvenience or harm resulting naturally or directly from the suit or prosecution, is the legal damage upon which it is founded." Munns v. Dupont, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 5th ed. 279, 3 Wash. C. C. 31. In Sutton v. Johnstone, 1 T. R. 511, Lords Mansfield and Loughborough said: "The essential ground of this action is, that a legal prosecution was carried on without a probable cause." That being true, the action cannot be maintained on account of a prosecution or suit, the subject-matter of which was without the jurisdiction of the court in which it was instituted and continued. In that case all process issued, orders made, judgments rendered, and proceedings had, would be absolutely void; and the action of the parties would stand as though unaltered by any judicial act, process, or proceeding, and completely divested of judicial authority, and the parties would be liable as they would have been had they acted without the authority, real or pretended, of any officer or court. We are aware that some courts have held that an action for a malicious prosecution before a court without jurisdiction of its subject-matter can be maintained, if the other essentials are shown, but we think the better opinion is that it cannot be sustained. Bixby v. Brundige, 2 Gray, 129, 61 Am. Dec. 448; Whiting v. Johnson, 6 Gray, 246; Painter v. Ives, 4 Neb. 122; Braceboy v. Cockfield, 2 Mull. L. 270, 278; Turpin v. Remy, 3 Blackf. 210, 216; Marshall v. Betner, 17 Ala. 882, 886; Munns v. Dupont, 1 Am. Lead. Cas. 5th ed. 259; 1 Jaggard, Torts, 605.

Lemay v. Williams, 32 Ark. 166, 175, was an action for a malicious prosecution. The malicious prosecution complained of was an action brought by Lemay against Williams before a justice of the peace to recover a judgment on a note, and to foreclose a mortgage executed to secure the note. The court held that the action on the note was within, but the foreclosure of the mortgage was without, the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace. Mr. Justice Walker, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If, in the case under consideration Lemay had based his right of action solely upon his claim of mortgage lien, and not also upon his note for the satisfaction of a debt within the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace, the subject-matter would clearly have been one over which a justice would have no jurisdiction, and trespass, not case, would be the appropriate remedy."

In this case appellant brought an action against appellee, before a justice of the peace, to recover the Upp place, and sued out a writ of possession therein. He attempted to use the writ for a lawful purpose, but the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and the writ was void. He therefore stands in the same position he would have occupied had he taken possession of the land without any writ, and is liable accordingly. The action for a malicious prosecution does not lie against him.

In giving instructions upon the ground that there was evidence to show that appellant was guilty of a malicious prosecution, another error was committed. The instructions failed to inform the jury that, before they should return a verdict against appellant on the ground that he was guilty of a malicious prosecution, they must find that he prosecuted the action before the justice of the peace without probable cause. In this the instructions were fatally defective. Seaton v. Brock, 15 Ark. 845; Lemay v. Williams, 82 Ark. 166; Lavender v. Hudgens, 82 Ark. 763; Ohrisman v. Carney, 83 Ark. 316; Foster v. Pitts, 63 Ark. 387.

If the appellant in evicting appellee and removing his goods from the demised premises, unnecessarily committed any injury to his person or goods, the latter can recover of the former, in this action, the damages occasioned thereby. Unless there be circumstances of aggravation attending the commission of the injuries, he is only entitled to actual damages.

The court erred in admitting the evidence objected to by appellant.

Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Hughes, J., concurs in the judgment of the court, and also in the opinion, except the part which holds that the action for malicious prosecution will not lie if the subject-matter of the prosecution or suit was not within the jurisdiction of the court in which the prosecution was instituted and carried on, from which he dissents.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

R. O. DWIGHT.

(.....Mass.)

One forcibly put out from a peaceable possession lawfully obtained, if evicted by one who had the title and the right of possession, cannot maintain forcible entry and detainer under Pub. Stat. chap. 175, as this gives such action only to "the person entitled to the premises," and a former statute which extended the right to a person forcibly dispossessed by a person entitled to possession has been repealed.

(December 8, 1897.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Hampshire County made during the trial of summary proceedings to recover possession of land which resulted in a verdict in defendant's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. L. Green and J. F. Stapleton, Jr. for plaintiff:

If the forcible entry or detainer be found by the jury, then, beside the fine on the offender, the justices shall make restitution by the sheriff of the possession, without inquiring into the merits of the title; for the force is the only thing to be tried, punished, and remedied by them.

The instructions in this case affirmed the principle that the strongest shall take and keep until the law may examine the title—a rule which Lawrence, J., says in Reeder v. Purdy, 41 Ill. 279, "befits only that condition of society in which the principle is recognized that "He may take who has the power,

And he may keep who can."

In Massachusetts the court has held that the consequence of a forcible entry or detainer is not limited to a criminal action.

Bassett for defendant.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff bought and went into peaceable possession of land subject to mortgage. His estate was ended by a foreclosure sale, under which the defendant acquired title and the right to possession, which he could have recovered by a summary process under Pub. Stat. chap. 175. He was forbidden by Pub. Stat. chap. 126, § 15, to take possession by force. Instead of resorting to the statute process, he employed force of numbers and violence, and by an actual breach of the peace put out the plaintiff and his family, and so obtained possession by force. The plaintiff thereupon brought this action, under Pub. Stat. chap. 175, and he contends that because the defendant ousted him by force his own possession is to be restored. At the trial the plaintiff asked rulings that no question of title is in issue in the action; that the issue is whether, once being in rightful possession, he was forcibly put out; and that, if so, he is entitled to judgment, even if at the time of the forcible entry the defendant had the title and right of entry, and was lawfully entitled to possession. The court refused these rulings, and charged the jury that if the mortgage had been duly foreclosed by sale, and the title had passed to the defendant, he had a right, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, to eject him as he did, and the action could not be maintained. The defendant had a verdict, which, under the rulings, did not negative the force, but which shows that the jury found the title and right of possession in the defendant. In one sense, the ruling that the defendant had the right, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, to evict him by force, was wrong, because all such forcible entries are forbidden, and the plaintiff as a citizen, is within the protection of the standing laws. But if, notwithstanding this unlawful use of force, the plaintiff cannot have this process against one who is entitled to possession, his exceptions must be overruled. The doctrine that possession destroyed by force should be restored because of the force had much to do with the Roman interdicts unde vi and uti possidetis and with the exceptio spoli or remedium spoliationis of the canon law. See Inst. lib. 4, title 15; Cod. lib. 8, titles 4, 5; Gratian, Corp. Jur. Canon, Dec. Greg. 9, title 12; De Causa Poss. et Prop. Freidburg, pt. 2, p. 275 et seq.; Godol. 650, 24, 25; Sohm's Inst. Roman Law, § 54.

The earliest English special remedy to protect possession was the assize of novel disseisin, which dates either from the time of the constitutions of Clarendon, in 1164, or of the assizes of Northampton, a few years later, and is said to correspond or at least to have been suggested by the possessory remedies of the Roman and the canon law. See Gutenberg's Bracton and his relation to Roman Law, chap. 20; Reeve, Eng. Law, Finlason's ed. pp. xiv., xv.; Maine, Anc. Law, Am. ed. 1870, pp. 280-282; Pol. & M. Hist. Eng. Law, pp. 91, 114, 116; Mackenzie, Roman Law, pt. 5, chap. 4; Muirhead, Roman Law, p. 218. Bracton, writing in the first half of the thirteenth century, says that in the judgment of novel disseisin, "quod ex maleficio oritur," one sues for the land, "ipsam rem," and for a penalty, "pœnam," "et ibi pœna triplex," one for "spoliationem contra pacem," "ubi infligenda est pœna corporalis," another for the unjust detention, "ubi infligenda erit pœna pecuniaria," and another for his own damages, "damna sua," sustained "tempore spoliationis," and even an added penalty; that the principal disseisor, when convicted, should give the sheriff an ox, by custom. Bract. f. 161, b. Before 1620 there were many English statutes and decisions upon the general subject of forcible entry and detainer. See Stat. 2 Edw. III. chap. 3, prohibiting force; 5 Rich. II. chap. 7; 15 Rich. II. chap. 2; 4 Hen. IV. chap. 8; 8 Hen. VI. chap. 9; 81 Eliz. chap. 11; 21 Jac. I. chap. 15; Cromp. 76, 163; Dalt. chap. 125; Lamb, 138; Com. Dig. title, Forcible Entry, 4 Bl. Com. 148. The state of the early law was considered in the decisions of this court in Com. v. Shattuck, 4 Cush. 141; Howard v. Merriam, 5 Cush. 563; Presbrey v. Presbrey, 13 Allen, 281; Hodgkins v. Price, 132 Mass. 196. It would seem that every forcible entry by a private individual was unlawful, and might subject him to punishment, and that in addition, in most cases, the person forcibly put out of possession might be put back by legal proceedings, without regard to the question of the true title or right of possession. Ordinarily, the status of possession before the force was restored by the interference of the public power acting through public officers.

Although this state of the law was operative here as the common law of the colonies, there were also statute provisions concerning the use of force, and forcible entry and detainer, in the Plymouth and Massachusetts Bay colonies and in the province. In the General Laws and Liberties of New Plymouth Colony, revised and published by order of the general court in the year 1671 (chap. 3, § 18), are provisions against forcible entry or detainer after judgment. Plymouth Colonial Laws, pp. 248, 249. A substantially similar provision is found in the General Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts Bay Colony, in chapter 15, entitled "An Act as to Judgment Respecting Real Estate." See Anc. Laws & Charters, p. 54; Colonial Laws (Rev. 1658) p. 11. In the Province Laws, in chapter 11 an act for the punishing of criminal offenders (1692) § 6, gives power to justices of the peace to stay and arrest breakers of the peace, and to "make inquiry of forcible entry and detainer, and cause the same to be removed." Anc. Laws & Charters, pp. 239, 240. In 1701 there was a province act directing these proceedings against forcible entry and detainer. It required the justices of the peace, upon complaint of any wrongful and forcible entry made into any lands, tenements, or other possessions, or of any wrongful detainer thereof with force and strong hand, to go to the place, taking sufficient power to arrest the offenders, and providing that two justices, quorum unus, should inquire by the oaths of the people, "as well of them that make such forcible entry into lands, tenements, or other possessions, as of them that hold the same with force," and to cause the same to "be resealed, and thereof the party to be again put into possession, who in such sort was put out or holden out." The inquiry was to be made by a jury sworn to inquire of such forcible entry or forcible detainer. The justices might impose a fine upon the offenders, or bind them to appear at the next general sessions, with a proviso that the act should not extend to persons who had had occupation or been in quiet possession for three whole years, their estates therein not ended or determined. Prov. Laws, chap. 72; Anc. Laws, & Charters, pp. 853-855.

After the adoption of the Constitution of 1780 there was a new "Act Directing the Proceedings against Forcible Entry and Detainer." Stat. 1784, chap. 8. This statute gave to two justices of the peace, quorum unus, authority to inquire by a jury against those who make unlawful and forcible entry into lands or tenements, or who, having a lawful and peaceable entry, unlawfully and by force hold the same, and to cause the party complaining to have restitution. Forms are prescribed for the proceedings, which were in the name of the commonwealth, upon complaint of the party aggrieved. See Com. v. Dudley, 10 Mass. 408; Com. v. Bigelow, 3 Pick. 81. In the form of verdict is a recital that the jury do find that the lands or tenements, upon a day stated, were "in the lawful and rightful possession of" the complainant, and that the defendant "did upon the same day unlawfully and with force and arms and with a strong hand enter forcibly upon the same (or being lawfully upon the same did unlawfully with force and a strong hand) expel and drive out" the complainant, "and that he doth still continue wrongfully to detain the possession from him, . . . wherefore the said A. B. ought to have restitution thereof without delay." Upon the return of a verdict for complainant, the justices were to enter judgment for restitution, and award a writ of restitution, and no appeal was allowed, although the proceedings might be removed by certiorari into the supreme judicial court, and there be quashed for irregularity. The judgment was not a bar to any after action brought by either party, and there was also a proviso that the act should not extend to any person who had had occupation or been in quiet possession for three years, and whose estate was not ended or determined. Laws & Res. Mass. 1784-85, pp. 19-24. It is to be noticed that this statute omitted any provision for the punishment of those found to have entered or retained possession by force, and gave, in terms, jurisdiction only against such as made "unlawful and forcible entry," or "unlawfully and by force" held after a lawful and peaceable entry; while in the Province statute of 1701 the section conferring jurisdiction gave it upon complaint of any "wrongful and forcible entry" or any "wrongful detainer . . . with force and strong hand;" and if the finding was of a forcible entry or forcible holding, without a finding that it was wrongful, restitution was to be made.

The statutes so far considered dealt with forcible entry and forcible detainer only. In the year 1825, a summary remedy was given by Stat. 1825, chap. 89, entitled "An Act Providing Further Remedies for Landlords and Tenants," to persons having the right of possession of houses and tenements. Actions under this statute were in the name of the party aggrieved. The defendant was not allowed to offer, under a general issue, any evidence that might bring the title of the freehold in question, and, if he pleaded title in himself or a third person, he was required to recognize to enter the action in the higher court, and, if he refused, judgment went against him as upon a refusal to answer. But the proceedings plainly allowed the title to the freehold to be tried, at the will of the defendant, and there was no provision that the judgment should not be a bar in future actions. Although this statute was broader than its title, and under its terms an "occupant" who had entered forcibly might be dispossessed after notice to quit, it did not afford a remedy against an occupant who had entered forcibly, but who had the right of possession, because only a person who had the right of possession could summon him to answer or could sustain the complaint.

These statutes of 1784 and 1825 were in force when the commissioners appointed under the resolve of February 4, 1832, to revise the general laws, made their report to the legislature, in 1834. The commissioners placed in chapter 104 of their report, entitled "Of Forcible Entry and Detainer," two sets of provisions, one concerning forcible entry and detainer, and the other concerning tenants who hold over after the expiration of their right. At the head of the chapter was a section declaring that no person shall make any entry into lands or tenements except where his entry is allowed by law, and that in such cases he shall not enter with force but in a peaceable manner. The next section provided generally, without qualification, that when any forcible entry should be made or possession should be held by force, the person forcibly put out or held out might be restored upon complaint to two justices, who should command a jury; and if the verdict showed the lawful possession of the complainant, and a forcible entry or an unlawful and forcible detainer from him, who was lawfully entitled to possession, there should be judgment for restitution. The provision that the judgment should not be a bar was retained. After the provision concerning forcible entry and detainer were sections providing for the summary removal of lessees holding without right after the termination of a lease. In their notes the commissioners say that the rule embodied in § 1 is fully recognized as part of our common law, and plainly implied from the provisions of Stat. 1784, chap. 8, and that they insert it as it is in the English statutes as the basis of all the provisions on this subject; and they point out that while the provisions for the removal of lessees who hold over are narrower than those of Stat. 1825, chap. 89, the cases which could be dealt with by that statute, and not by the reported sections concerning landlords and tenants, could be dealt with, if possession were obtained or held by force, under the sections concerning forcible entry and detainer; and that, if the party who had acquired the possession did not retain it with force, the injured party would find a sufficient remedy in an action of trespass or a writ of entry. This report was made on December 31, 1884, and the Revised Statutes were approved November 4, 1885, to take effect from and after April 30, 1886. It is to be noticed that under the commissioners draft, the summary remedy given by Stat. 1825, chap. 89, to whoever has the right of possession, where a "tenant or occupant" holds without right and after notice to quit, could not be availed of in cases of forcible entry or detainer, where the defendant was not a tenant holding over. In April, 1885, before the enactment of the Revised Statutes, an additional statute was passed declaring that the provisions of Stat. 1825, chap. 89, should be "construed to apply to all cases of forcible entry and detainer, and all cases of detainer of any lands or tenements wherein the person or persons hold the same without right, or as mere trespassers," thus excluding the case where the person guilty of the force had the right of possession, and "to all cases where any tenant shall make default in the payment of rent according to the terms of any written agreement or lease between the parties," and that in all such cases the like proceedings might be had as if the relation of landlord and tenant had theretofore existed between them. Stat. 1885, chap. 114. It would seem that while this statute extended the remedy by proceedings under Stat. 1825, chap. 89, to those cases of forcible entry or forcible detainer where the person who was guilty of the force had no right or was a mere trespasser, it did not extend them to those cases where the owner of the title, or one who had the right of possession, was guilty of a forcible entry or detainer. For some reason, and perhaps wholly or partly in consequence of this statute of 1885, the provisions reported by the commissioners for an inquiry by a jury in case of forcible entry and detainer were omitted from chapter 104, as embodied in the Revised Statutes. The declaration that no person shall enter except where his entry is allowed by law, and not with force, but in a peaceable manner, was retained as the first section; and the second section provided that when a forcible entry was made, or, after peaceable entry, possession was unlawfully held by force, and also when a lessee or any person holding under a lease holds possession without right after determination of the lease, "the person entitled to the premises" might be restored to the possession thereof in a peaceable manner. This language seems to leave without remedy, under the statute, the case where one not legally entitled to possession is forcibly put out by the true owner or by one entitled to possession; for in such case the party forcibly put out is not a "person entitled to the premises," and by the terms of the statute such persons only are to be restored. From the subsequent sections prescribing the manner in which the proceedings should be conducted, it is plain that the title to the freehold might be brought in question in all cases, and, if so, the cause was to be transferred, at the request of either party, to a higher court. Rev. Stat. chap. 104, §§ 9, 11. Either party might appeal (Rev. Stat. chap. 104, § 8); yet the judgment was declared by the statute not to be a bar to any action thereafter to be brought by either party to recover the premises in question or to recover damages for any trespass thereon (Rev. Stat. chap. 104, § 12).

In 1849 it was held by this court in Com. v. Shattuck, 4 Cush. 141, that, in addition to the statute remedy, an indictment lies at common law for a forcible entry, and that it is a sufficient charge of the offense to allege the entry to have been made unlawfully, with force and arms and with a strong hand. The provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, § 1, are mentioned in the decision; and it is said that, if the case required it, it might be proper to consider whether that section would not make a forcible entry a statute offense, and punishable under Rev. Stat. chap. 139, § 1. See also Com. v. Haley, 4 Allen, 318.

The attention of the legislature was called to the condition of the law concerning forcible entry and detainer, in January, 1851, by the report of Benjamin R. Curtis, Nathaniel J. Lord, and Reuben A. Chapman, commissioners appointed to revise and reform the proceedings in the courts of justice. Speaking of the process for forcible entry they say: "The object of this process is not to settle title, but only the right of present possession; and not even this, except in cases where the possession has been disturbed, or an entry is prevented by force. It is really to quell force and violence, and to protect the public peace, by promptly depriving the wrongdoer of the fruit of his wrong. This is very different from a case where a tenant holds over after the end of his term, and requires a different remedy; and the ancient and long-existing law of the state provided one adapted to the case, but differing widely from landlord and tenant process. The former, as we have said, did not involve title. If the person entering or detaining by force was the lawful owner, and the complainant had, as against him, no mere right whatever to the property, such owner was to be turned out of the possession which he had unlawfully gained by force." Criticising the provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, the report says further: "If it was meant that the title can and may be put in issue in a process for forcible entry, it is plain it ceases to be of any value when the party who entered with force had title, and the process becomes a clumsy writ of entry, which tries the title without settling it. We have concluded, therefore, to recommend the restoration of the law substantially as it existed from ancient times." Life and Writings of B. R. Curtis, vol. 11, pp. 162, 164; Mass. Leg. Doc. 1851, House No. 17. This recommendation was adopted by the legislature, and the sections drafted by the commissioners for the purpose were enacted in the original practice act (Stat. 1851, chap. 233, §§ 76-95), which repealed so much of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, as related to forcible entry and detainer, and substituted a process in the name of the commonwealth by inquisition by a trial justice and a jury upon complaint by the party aggrieved. This statute was in effect from August 31, 1851, to August 7, 1852. It is plain that under it a person in possession without right, if forcibly dispossessed by the true owner, or by a person entitled to possession, could be restored to the possession from which he had been ousted by force. But Stat. 1852, chap. 812, which took effect August 7, 1852, repealed Stat. 1851, chap. 233; and, as there was then no permanent statute declaring that the repeal of an act should not revive statutes in force before the act repealed took effect, the repealed provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, were thus revived, and again governed proceedings for forcible entry and detainer. See Stat. 1869, chap. 410, cl. 1; Pub. Stat. chap. 8, § 3, cl. 1.

This sudden return to the system under which the writ was in the name of the party, and not of the commonwealth, which gave the process only to a "person entitled to the premises," which required him to prove that he was entitled to this possession, and which said that the defendant should have judgment if the plaintiff failed to prove his right to the possession, has the greater significance because of the clear and forcible explanation of the old law, and of the defects of that substituted for it, given in the report of the eminent lawyers who prepared the report of 1851, and at whose recommendation the system by which the effect of the force was removed, without regard to the right of possession, was restored by one legislature only to be discarded by its successor.

The provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, as restored by the repeal of Stat. 1851, chap. 233, with those of some additional acts not now material, were re-enacted in Gen. Stat. chap. 137, retaining in § 2 the words, "The person entitled to the premises may be restored to the possession;" and in § 5 the words, "The person entitled to the possession of the premises may take . . . a writ;" and in § 7 the provision that if it appears "that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises," used in the corresponding provision of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, as also the provision that if the plaintiff becomes nonsuit, "or fails to prove his right to the possession," the defendant shall have judgment. At the same time the summary process was extended to cases where the lessee's estate is determined by the landlord's entry for breach of condition, by the introduction by the legislature of the words "or otherwise" into Gen. Stat. chap. 137, § 2, in consequence of the decision in the case of Fifty Associates v. Howland, 11 Met. 99. By Stat. 1879, chap. 237, it was provided that when a mortgage of real estate is foreclosed by sale under a power, and a person having a valid title to the estate is kept out of possession by any person without right, he may recover such possession in the manner provided by Gen. Stat. chap. 137. The statutes were again revised and embodied in the Public Statutes, approved November 19, 1881, to take effect from January 31, 1882. The provision forbidding forcible entries is now contained in Pub. Stat. chap. 126, § 15, and the others are substantially re-enacted in Pub. Stat. chap. 175, except that Gen. Stat. chap. 137, § 3, is now Pub. Stat. chap. 121, § 11, in part, and Gen. Stat. chap. 137, § 6, is merged into Pub. Stat. chap. 161, § 27. The language of Pub. Stat. chap. 175, § 1, is that "the person entitled to the premises may recover possession thereof;" of § 5 that if it appears "that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the premises, he shall have judgment and execution for the possession and for his costs;" and of § 2 that "such person may take . . . a writ"—that is to say, "the person entitled to the premises,"—as stated in the preceding section. The provision that if the plaintiff becomes nonsuit, "or fails to prove his right to the possession," the defendant shall have judgment, is retained. Pub. Stat. chap. 175, § 5.

From all this it appears that both the course of legislation and the language of the present statutes show that the process cannot be maintained by one who has been forcibly put out from a peaceable possession lawfully obtained, if he was so evicted by one who had the title and the right of possession. But, in arriving at the true construction of a statute, we must consider, not only the course of legislation and the language used, but the decisions of the court in causes which have required a construction of the statute. A construction so given by the court remains the authoritative exposition of the statute, until reversed by the court or abrogated by some action of the legislature.

It is contended by the plaintiff that the decision in Hodgkins v. Price, 132 Mass. 196, has given a construction to the statutes under which he can maintain this action. That case was begun in 1878, under Gen. Stat. chap. 137, and was decided in 1882. As has been seen, there is no substantial difference affecting the present question between the statute now in force and that under which Hodgkins v. Price was brought. In that case the plaintiff had an assignment to himself of a lease of certain land of which he never had been in possession, and upon which were tenements occupied by persons who held under another title. He entered by force and gained a temporary foothold and was in turn at once put out by force by those whose possession he had forcibly interrupted. Thereupon he brought the statute process, asserting a right of possession under his lease, and relying upon that, and the forcible entry which put him out of the tenements when he had himself got a temporary possession by force. His entry was in the morning before business hours, and he was promptly put out by the occupants as they arrived at the accustomed time. He was not allowed to maintain the action, and the decision holds that such a temporary possession, obtained by a violation of the statute forbidding forcible entries, is not to be restored by the statute process, even though the person who has so obtained possession had the actual right of possession when he entered by force, and that the rights of such a plaintiff "must be determined by the rightfulness of that possession from which he was ousted." The case was one of the class in which Bracton says that the first and principal remedy is that he who has been disseised may eject the spoiler by his own strength, if he can, or by force called in or recalled, while yet no interval has elapsed, the disseisin and wrong being flagrant. Bracton, De Ass. Nov. Diss. chap. 5, 162, b. That is to say, the attempted forcible entry and the recapture are but one transaction, and the recapture is not a forcible entry, but is a successful and proper resistance of a forcible entry; and so the wrongdoer who began the force cannot be heard to say that a forcible entry has been committed against himself, for all that has been done against him is to resist successfully his own wrongful act. Bracton says that forthwith to repel force by force is to do so as soon as the force is known, and before the party aggrieved has resorted to some other remedy; and that he can expel him immediately and on the same day, if he can, and, if he cannot expel him on that day, he may on the morrow, or on the third or fourth day, rallying his strength, collecting arms, and calling to his aid his friends. Bracton, f. 163. Nor can the true owner after being so entered by force, have an assise "quia assisem demurit et gratiam juris, et quia frustra legis auxilium invocat qui in legem committit." Bracton f. 163, b. The same result reached in Hodgkins v. Price, would follow, whether, as intimated in the opinion, our process for forcible entry is "simply a quieting process," by which any party in possession of an estate shall not be dispossessed by force, but his possession shall be preserved to him, or whether it is a more restricted remedy, to be given only where the party who invokes it shows, not only that he has been put out by force, but that he is also entitled to possession. Under either construction, the plaintiff in Hodgkins v. Price could not have the statute process. As against him, the facts did not constitute a forcible entry, but merely a resistance and neutralization of his own attempted force. No discussion or determination of the general scope and effect of the statute was necessary to the decision, and therefore the observations in the opinion which seem to indicate that our statute remedy for forcible entry and detainer is open to any person who has been forcibly put out, without regard to title or right of possession, do not constitute an authoritative construction of the statute. The opinion, while reviewing in part the course of legislation, makes no mention of the facts that the portion of Stat. 1851, chap. 238, which substituted for the forcible entry and detainer provisions of Rev. Stat. chap. 104, another system, in which, without regard to the state of the title or to the right of possession, a remedy was clearly given to restore any one put out by force, was quickly repealed by Stat. 1852, chap. 312, and that the former system, substantially identical with the present one, and giving the remedy only to those entitled to the premises, was permanently restored. Upon the whole, we think that the better view is that the legislature, after making a fresh trial of the ancient system under which a possession ended by force might be restored without regard to title or right of possession thought it better to provide that those only who had a right of possession should be put in by the courts, and to leave to the criminal law the acts of one who, being entitled to possession, takes it by prohibited force.

In the present case, the party guilty of the force asks no aid of the court, and we are not now concerned with his punishment, although from the time of the English settlement the use of force here by private individuals to obtain possession, even though they have title and right of possession, has been forbidden by the common or the statute law. We are of opinion that, by the true construction of Pub. Stat. chap. 175, the process is not given to one who is not entitled to the possession of the demanded premises as against the defendant; and that, if the present plaintiff was not entitled to possession as against the defendant when the latter put him out by force, the plaintiff cannot have the statute process.

CLEVELAND NATIONAL BANK

v.
SAME.

(97 Tenn. 458.)

1. A deed to a fictitious grantee conveys no title.

NOTE.—Use of fictitious name as affecting validity of instrument.

- I. Of contractors, grantors, and mortgagors.
- II. Of grantees, patentees, mortgagees, and transferees.
- III. Of makers and drawers of negotiable paper.
- IV. Of payees.

2. A trust deed executed in a fictitious name by the real owner of the property, whose own Christian name was used as the name of a fictitious person, who had previously made a void deed of the property, using the same name as that of the grantee, is binding on the maker, when he intended it to take effect as security for bonds issued therewith and transferred by him as security for his own debt.

3. The admission of a note in evidence without proof of its execution, when it was admitted by the maker, who was a defendant, cannot be complained of on appeal by law looks only to the identity of the individual, and when that is clearly established the act will be binding upon him. Re Snook, 2 Hill, 566, dictum.

One who contracts with another under a name he represents to be his name is estopped from denying or repudiating the same for the purpose of relieving himself from the obligations of the contract, and cannot avoid liability thereon where his identity is in question, by claiming that the name held out to be his name was not the name by which he was best known to the world. Preiss v. Le Poidevin, 19 Abb. N. C. 123.

And a conveyance by the true owner of property another party as to whom the evidence was immaterial.

(October 19, 1896.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals affirming a decree of the Chancery Court for Hamilton County dismissing complainants' attachment suit against property of the defendant Robertson and directing foreclosure of the trust deed under a cross bill. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Cooke, Swaney, & Cooke, for appellants:

Whether or not C. Phillips was Robertson's uncle, or a merely fictitious person, is immaterial.

Where the signature is a forgery no title passes, and notice of the forgery is not necessary to make the deed a nullity.

1 Devlin, Deeds, § 240; Cole v. Levi, 44 Ga. 579.

If an instrument which purports to convey is good between grantor and grantee, and will transfer the title whatever name he may have adopted therein. Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am. Dec. 347; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239; Wakefield v. Brown, 38 Minn. 361.

Thus, a conveyance by a man by the name of Jeremiah Fallon, made in the name of Darby O'Fallon, which was only a nickname by which he was generally or often called and known, which was duly recorded as required by law and all the conditions duly performed as demanded by statute, conveys good title to the grantee as against another grantee to whom he subsequently conveyed the property under his right name. Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44, 99 Am. Dec. 347.

So, a deed made by a person under a fictitious name, intending that it should be effectual to vest title in the grantee, will do so though he had previously in his right name made a conveyance of the property, inserting therein as grantee the fictitious name, which he subsequently used in conveying it. David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 265, 38 Am. Rep. 418.

This rule was applied to a trust deed in the principal case.

And one who executes a deed using the name of another who owned the property conveyed, which deed contained a covenant of warranty, may be held liable thereon, not as a breach of the covenant upon the ground that he was the agent of the owner, but on the ground that the covenant was his own, made under a name assumed by him for that purpose. Preiss v. Le Poidevin, 19 Abb. N. C. 123.

So, a chattel mortgage made by a person under an assumed name would be valid as between mortgagor and mortgagee for the reason that the mortgagor would be estopped from saying that a name assumed for a fraudulent purpose was not his true name. Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426.

And it has been held that one who sells personal property to a person who takes it under a fictitious name, and gives a chattel mortgage thereon for a part of the purchase price under such fictitious name, without knowledge that the name was fictitious, and records the mortgage in the proper county, takes title thereunder, and can recover the property from another person to whom the mortgagor afterwards sells it under his true name. Alexander Bros. v. Graves, 25 Neb. 453.

In Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426, however, the court refused to follow Alexander Bros. v. Graves, 25 Neb. 455, supra.

And the rule was laid down in that case that the a legal estate or interest be a forged instrument no title can be acquired under it.

Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 815; Herman, Estoppel, § 1006; Whart. Am. Crim. L. ed. 1846, 336; 2 Bishop, Crim. L. ed. 1868, §§ 510, 514; 2 Russell, Crimes, ed. 1850, 331.

The insistence by the Cleveland National Bank that a conveyance by a person under an assumed name passes the title is only supported by the authorities where the question is between the parties to the conveyance and in the absence of any fraud.

Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239; David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 270, 38 Am. Rep. 418.

It is immaterial that the person whose name is claimed to have been forged is a fictitious instead of a real person, the offense being completed if the instrument has the appearance of validity on its face.

People v. Munroe (Cal.) 24 L. R. A. 45, note, citing State v. Hahn, 38 La. Ann. 169; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747; Thompson v. State, 49 Ala.

filing of a chattel mortgage given by a person under an assumed name does not impute notice to, and will not affect, the title of a subsequent purchaser of the property from the mortgagor in his proper name, where he had possession and was the apparent owner.

And it was held that the rule that a chattel mortgage vests the title of the property mortgaged conditionally in the mortgagee, and that where the mortgaged property is retained by the mortgagor the statute makes the filing of the mortgage in the proper office equivalent to an actual change of possession, does not apply to a mortgage executed under an assumed and fictitious name so far as third persons are concerned. Mackey v. Cole, 79 Wis. 426.

II. Of grantees, patentees, mortgagees, and transferees.

The rule of the principal case that a conveyance to a fictitious grantee is a mere nullity, and does not transfer title, seems to be unquestioned, and is also laid down in terms in Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239; Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 600; and David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 265, 38 Am. Rep. 418.

As there is no such person to take title, title will remain in the grantor. David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 265, 38 Am. Rep. 418.

And such a deed cannot be confirmed by a subsequent deed given by an attorney in fact for that purpose. Barr v. Schroeder, 32 Cal. 600.

And a deed made by an agent for another to whom he had procured a conveyance of the property in question under a wrong name made to a third person, in the name used in the deed to his principal, transfers no title to the third person whether he acted in ignorance of the law or in good or in bad faith. Staak v. Sigelkow, 12 Wis. 235.

So, a conveyance to a supposed corporation which never had any existence under color of authority by the name used by it does not divest the grantor of his title. Harriman v. Southam, 16 Ind. 190; Douthitt v. Stinson, 63 Mo. 268.

And the grantor in a deed to a supposed corporation having no actual existence under color of authority is not estopped to deny its existence as the doctrine of estoppel applies only to cases in which there is an existing statute known to the courts authorizing such corporation. Harriman v. Southam, 16 Ind. 190.

But if the grantee is a person in existence and identified, and delivery is made, it makes no differ-

A man can have but one Christian name—that is his first name—and one surname. The use of any middle name is mere surplusage and a description of the man.

Bratton v. Seymour, 4 Watts, 829; Isaacs v. Wiley, 12 Vt. 674; Hart v. Lindsey, 17 N. H. 235, 43 Am. Dec. 597; Allen v. Taylor, 26 Vt. 599; Bletch v. Johnson, 40 Ill. 116; Thompson v. Lee, 21 Ill. 242.

The omission or insertion of the middle name, or of the initial letter of that name, in a deed is immaterial.

Games v. Stiles, Dunn, 39 U. S. 14 Pet. 327, 10 L. ed. 478; Pink v. Manhattan R. Co. 15 Daly, 479; Erskine v. Davis, 25 Ill. 255.

ence by what name he is called. Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239.

And one who accepts a deed, and places it on record knowing that his name as grantee was erroneously written in it, is deemed to have adopted that name for the purpose of acquiring and holding the title to the land conveyed, and he has no reason to complain that he is so designated in legal proceedings calling in question the validity of the title so acquired and held. Blinn v. Chessman, 49 Minn. 140.

And a deed made in the name of Lewis Staak as grantee passes title to Arnold Staak where he furnished the purchase money and was the intended grantee, whether the name used was by mistake or by design, the disagreement or mistake in name being a latent ambiguity which is susceptible of explanation by parol. Staak v. Sigelkow, 12 Wis. 234.

So, patents for public lands issued to fictitious persons are invalid, there being in fact no grantees capable of taking title. United States v. Southern Colorado Coal & T. Co. 18 Fed. Rep. 273.

But while a patent issued to a person not in existence is void, if the patentee used a name different from his own to designate himself where he bought property, and made the entry in that name for himself, merely using it as he would the one by which he was usually known, and indorses the patent in that name with the same view, the title will inure to the transferee. Thomas v. Wyatt, 31 Mo. 188, 77 Am. Dec. 640.

So, an instrument in the form of a mortgage, which is filed for record, but which was payable to a fictitious person, and which secured no indebtedness and there was no delivery, is not such an encumbrance upon the property mortgaged as will invalidate an insurance policy thereon providing that if any encumbrance existed the policy should be void. Fitchner v. Fidelity Mut. F. Asso. (Iowa) 26 Ias. L. J. 326.

But a mortgagor who executes a mortgage to secure a promissory note which was given to secure advances to be made by the mortgagee, where the mortgagee after having made advances to an amount less than the face of the note assigned his interest in the mortgage and note to a fictitious person indorsing the note in blank without recourse, and then sold the note and mortgage for property, to a person acting in good faith without notice, delivering the note and mortgage with what purported to be an assignment to the fictitious person and from the fictitious person to the 39 L. R. A.

A man's name may be forged by a signature which leaves out the middle name.

Lafin & R. Powder Co. v. Seytler, 146 Pa. 434, 14 L. R. A. 690.

Mr. J. B. Frazier also for appellants.

Messrs. P. B. Mayfield & Son and Eller & Milligan, for appellees:

The persons who took the bonds as collateral took them on the security of the real estate alone. None of them knew anything about C. Phillips nor whether there was such a person in existence. In fact there was no such person though Wiehl has succeeded in finding a man named C. B. Phillips.

Consequently the holders of the bonds still have all the security they bargained for, and defendant Robertson is not resisting the enforcement of the deed of trust nor the personal judgment over against him on the notes. He simply wished the security to be shared by the holders in proportion to the bonds held by them as provided in the deed of trust.

There is no reason why one beneficiary under the trust should be allowed to absorb purchaser, and after the purchaser had notice of the facts the mortgagee made a new assignment to him, cannot redeem as against such purchaser except on paying the full amount of the note. Bassett v. Daniels, 136 Mass. 547.

So, a bill of lading issued in the name of a fictitious or nonexistent firm imposes no liability upon the railroad company. Bank of Tupelo v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. (Miss.) 16 So. 572; Jasper Trust Co. v. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. 99 Ala. 416.

And an assignment of stock by a subscriber in a turnpike company to a fictitious person is a mere nullity, and does not affect the title of the assignor. Muskingum Valley Turnp. Co. v. Ward, 13 Ohio, 120, 42 Am. Dec. 191.

§ III. Of makers and drawers of negotiable paper.

One who makes notes in a fictitious name which he had not used or held himself out as using in the transaction of other business, and by which he was not known, is not liable on contract thereon to one who buys them from the payees, though he was an innocent holder. His relation to such holder of the notes is not one of contract but of tort. Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 336, 6 Am. Rep. 240.

And where he had not by word or act asserted that they were his notes he is not estopped to deny them to be his as against a person who did not take them immediately from him or on his credit. Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 336, 6 Am. Rep. 240.

In that case Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 506, 2 Bro. P. C. 43, 3 T. R. 481, and Phillips v. Im Thurn, L. R. 1 C. P. 463, 35 L. J. C. P. N. S. 220, 14 L. T. N. S. 406, 14 Week. Rep. 653 18 C. B. N. S. 694, 11 Jur. N. S. 439, 12 L. T. N. S. 457, 13 Week. Rep. 750, infra, IV. b. were distinguished upon the ground that those cases turn upon the rule that the defendant's own acceptance bound him so that he could not, even if he acted in good faith, dispute the genuineness of the prior signature.

There is no essential difference between a note purporting to be made by a person or corporation that has no capacity to make it and a note purporting to be made by one that in fact has no existence, or between a note on which the name of the person by whose hand it was written appears, and a note on which it does not. And there is no more reason for holding the maker liable to an action upon it as his own contract in the one case than in the other. Bartlett v. Tucker, 104 Mass. 336, dictum; Pease v. Pease, 35 Conn. 131, 36 Am. Dec. 225, dictum.

The only distinction is that in the latter case the proof ought to be very clear to show that the con-

The deed of conveyance from C. Phillips — Robertson and wife to C. Phillips (assumed name), and the deed of trust made by C. Phillips to D. L. Grayson, trustee, operated as a conveyance by C. P. Robertson and wife immediately, and immediately to D. L. Grayson, trustee.

Having accepted the trust, and having by agreement had a sale and purchase in the name of F. F. Wiehl, trustee, for the common benefit, the properties became charged and impressed with the trust, and no one of the beneficiaries could renounce the trust and acquire by attachment or otherwise priority over the co-beneficiaries as illegally attempted in this case.

Mr. D. L. Grayson, trustee, in propria persona.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The records in these consolidated causes present a series of transactions which are certainly unique in character. The defendant C.

tract was not designed to be a personal contract. Pease v. Pease, 35 Conn. 181, 95 Am. Dec. 225, dictum.

The fact that the drawer of a bill of exchange subscribed it in a name different from his own, however, does not make it a forgery so as to defeat a recovery thereon by an innocent indorsee, unless it is proved that the different name was used for purposes of fraud. Schultz v. Astley, 2 Bing. N. C. 544, 2 Scott, 815, 1 Hodges, 542, 7 Car. & P. 99.

And one who makes a promissory note in the name of another without authority, and which is delivered to the payee for a valuable consideration, will be presumed to have undertaken to bind himself, and he will be held liable thereon in an action against him in his true name upon a count alleging that he made the note by the name used. Grafton Bank v. Flanders, 4 N. H. 239.

And one of two partners, each of whom had authority to bind the other by drawing or indorsing bills of exchange, is liable to persons from whom money was obtained upon bills in fictitious names indorsed by the other partner in the name of the firm, where the money was afterwards applied to partnership purposes. Thicknesse v. Bromilow, 2 Crompt. & J. 425.

So, the payee and indorser of a promissory note is liable as maker where he knows the maker is a fictitious person, and if he were to be regarded as an indorser he would be liable on his indorsement without demand or notice. Bundy v. Jackson, 24 Fed. Rep. 629.

IV. Payees.

a. In promissory notes.

That a note was made payable to a fictitious person or bearer is no defense against a bona fide holder thereof receiving it without notice of that fact before it came due for value. Lane v. Krekle, 22 Iowa, 399.

And that the maker of a note did not know that the payee therein was fictitious is no defense against such a holder, as by making it payable to such person he avers his existence and is estopped as against an innocent holder to assert the fiction. Ort v. Fowler, 31 Kan. 478, 47 Am. Rep. 501.

And that the holder of a note made payable to a fictitious payee or order received it from a person professing to be the agent of the fictitious payee, and who indorsed it as such to the holder, is not sufficient to charge him with notice of the fictitious character of the payee, or put him upon inquiry beyond the face of the note as to the existence of such agent's principal. Lane v. Krekle, 22 Iowa, 399.

The general and common-law rule is that a note payable to a fictitious person may be recovered upon by any bona fide holder as upon a note payable to bearer. Ort v. Fowler, 31 Kan. 478, 47 Am. Rep. 501; Plets v. Johnson, 3 Hill, 112.

And substantially the same rule has been adopted by statute in some of the states. See Plets v. Johnson, 3 Hill, 112, and cases set forth below.

But the rule that a negotiable instrument made payable to a fictitious person or order is in effect payable to bearer applies only where it is so made with the knowledge of the party making it, and does not apply where the maker supposed the payee to be a real person, and, intending payment to be made to such person or his order, is induced by the fraud of another to so draw it. Armstrong v. National Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 6 L. R. A. 625.

And a negotiable note made payable to a fictitious person and negotiated by the maker, which is given by N. Y. Rev. Stat. 765, § 5, the same validity as against the maker and all persons having knowledge of the facts as if payable to bearer, includes only paper made with knowledge that the payee is fictitious, and does not include paper made by one who supposes the payee to be a real person, and which is fraudulently negotiated by a third person without the maker's fault. Shipman v. Bank of the State, 126 N. Y. 318, 12 L. R. A. 791.

The maker of such a promissory note is not liable thereon to a person claiming as indorsee, unless proved to have had knowledge of the fact that the payee was fictitious at the time of the signing. Maniort v. Roberts, 4 E. D. Smith, 83.

But knowledge of the facts within the meaning of N. Y. Rev. Stat. 765, § 5, providing that promissory notes made payable to the order of the maker or a fictitious person if negotiated by him shall have the same validity as against him and all persons having knowledge of the facts as if payable to bearer, consists simply of knowledge that the note is payable to the order of the maker or of a fictitious person. Irving Nat. Bank v. Alley, 79 N. Y. 532.

And a note made payable to fictitious persons by inadvertence, which had been negotiated, may be recovered upon as payable to bearer under that statute. Stevens v. Strang, 2 Sandf. 138.

A note drawn payable to the order of a fictitious person should, under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat. 54, § 5, be transferred by delivery only, or by the maker's own indorsement, and not by indorsing the name of the fictitious payee. Maniort v. Roberts, 4 E. D. Smith, 83.

P. Robertson seems at one time to have been a man of some mercantile reputation in the city of Chattanooga. Whether as the result of bad habits or not does not appear, but he finally passed out of business, and at the same time his condition was such that for a while he was under treatment in a sanitarium or asylum. On his release his need of money being great, a plan, according to his statement, was submitted to him for raising enough to relieve this need. The plan thus suggested was that Robertson, who was the owner of certain lots in Chattanooga, should bond these,—a method which he was made to understand was very prevalent, and which, if adopted in this case, could work no injury to anyone. This plan commended itself to Robertson as possessing superior advantages, and therefore he set about carrying it out. The details of the scheme were as follows: Robertson had prepared a deed, which was executed by himself and wife, conveying these lots to one C. Phillips for an expressed consideration of $7,500, of which $1,500 was acknowledged to be paid and the balance evidenced by six bonds of $1,000 of the grantee, payable in five years, with interest coupons payable semi-annually attached. At the same time he drafted a trust deed, by the terms of which C. Phillips conveyed this property to one Grayson as trustee to secure the payment of these bonds and coupons, with the usual power of foreclosure by a public sale in the event the grantee should fail to pay either the coupons or the principal of these bonds. When prepared, Robertson took possession of this instrument, and carried it with him to his home in Georgia, and very late in the evening of October 17, 1892, he went to the office of one Head, a notary public of that state, taking this trust deed with him, with a certificate attached and already filled out, and told the notary that he desired to acknowledge it. Knowing Robertson, and suspecting no foul play, the officer took his acknowledgment, and without any examination attached his official signature and seal to the

But the holder of a negotiable promissory note made to raise money, which is advanced by a third person instead of the payee, may declare upon such note as made payable to himself by the name of the payee, or as payable to bearer, regarding the name of the payee as fictitious. Hunt v. Aldrich, 27 N. H. 81; Elliot v. Abbot, 12 N. H. 549, 87 Am. Dec. 227.

And a recovery may be had on a promissory note made payable to a fictitious person where money had passed between the parties, on the money counts, and when it did not pass between them a recovery can be had on a count alleging the note to have been made payable to bearer. Foster v. Shattuck, 2 N. H. 446.

But to warrant a recovery by a holder of a note against the maker, which had not been indorsed, he must prove affirmatively that the payee is a fictitious person. Maniort v. Roberts, 4 E. D. Smith, 83.

Where a note is given to a person by a name other than his real name, he may aver in a declaration thereon that the note was given to him by the name specified in the note, but it will then be necessary to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that he was the person intended as the payee. Chenot v. Lefevre, 8 Ill. 637.

So, a party may become an indorser of a bill or note by any mark or designation he chooses to adopt, provided it be used as a substitute for his name and he intends to be bound by it. Brown v. Butchers' & D. Bank, 6 Hill, 443, 41 Am. Dec. 755.

And a person to whom a note is given which is drawn payable to a firm when no such firm exists may assume such firm name and indorse the note in that name, and it will be a good indorsement in the hands of an innocent holder, who may collect the same of the maker under a count for money had and received. Blodgett v. Jackson, 40 N. H. 21.

And a promissory note payable to a fictitious copartnership, which is indorsed by a person in the fictitious firm's name, is valid in the hands of innocent third parties purchasing for value and before maturity, both as against the maker and the person thus indorsing it. Bull's Head Bank v. McFeeters, 9 Jones & S. 215.

And N. Y. Laws 1833, chap. 281, prohibiting the transaction of business by any person in the name of a firm that does not represent any real partnership, does not affect the liability of a person who indorses a note in the name of a fictitious copartnership to which it purported to have been given. Bull's Head Bank v. McFeeters, 9 Jones & S. 215.

Where a note is made payable to a person by 89 L. R. A.

name or order, when no particular person of that name was intended to be the payee or had any interest in the note, the name of the payee is to be regarded as fictitious. Foster v. Shattuck, 2 N. H. 446.

And a note made payable to a corporation which never had even a de facto existence is in effect payable to a fictitious payee, and any bona fide holder may sue upon it, and need not aver that he is a bona fide holder. Farnsworth v. Drake, 11 Ind. 101.

b. In bills of exchange, checks, and drafts.

A bill of exchange running to a fictitious payee is the same as if drawn payable to the bearer. Kohn v. Watkins, 28 Kan. 601, 40 Am. Rep. 336; Rogers v. Ware, 2 Neb. 29; Willets v. Phoenix Bank, 2 Duer, 130.

And indorsement thereof is not necessary to its validity or negotiability. Rogers v. Ware, 2 Neb. 29.

And the same rule applies to the case of a bank check. Willets v. Phoenix Bank, 2 Duer, 130, dictum.

And a draft issued to a person who directs an assumed name to be inserted and thereafter indorses that name upon it becomes, when so indorsed, negotiable, and will pass by mere delivery to an innocent holder for value. Anderson v. Dundee State Bank, 66 Hun, 613.

In Rogers v. Ware, 2 Neb. 29, supra, Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 569, 3 T. R. 481, 2 Bro. P. C. 48, infra, was distinguished upon the ground that the drawer there indorsed the name of the fictitious payee on the bill himself.

So, a bona fide holder for a valuable consideration, of a bill of exchange which was signed in blank and delivered to another for the purpose of filling up, which he did by inserting the name of a fictitious payee or order, and indorsed it in that name, and transferred it to such holder, may maintain an action against the signer as a drawer of a bill payable to bearer on a count to that effect, or on a count stating the special circumstances of the case. Collis v. Emett, 1 H. Bl. 513.

And a plea that the drawer of a bill of exchange did not know the payee to be fictitious is no defense against a bona fide holder thereof where the drawer was induced to so make it by the false representations of a correspondent to whom he transferred it with instructions for its disposition. Kohn v. Watkins, 20 Kan. 601, 40 Am. Rep. 386.

And one who purchases goods of another, which prove to be stolen property, and gives a check therefor, payable in a name given him by the seller certificate. It proved, however, in the end, that Robertson had affixed the name of C. Phillips, the assumed grantor, to the trust deed, and the notary had appended his name and seal of office to a certificate which recited that "personally appeared C. Phillips, the within-named bargainer, with whom I am personally acquainted, and who acknowledged that he executed the within instrument for the purposes therein contained." Thus certified, and without anything to induce suspicion of the gross fraud perpetrated on him, this officer redelivered the instrument to Robertson, who on the next day caused it to be noted for registration in Hamilton county, where his deed to Phillips had already been registered. There was no such man as C. Phillips, this name being selected by the parties to this scheme because this was the baptismal or Christian name of Robertson. Within a very short time thereafter, using these bonds as collateral security, Robertson obtained advances of money from various parties. From the complainants Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. he obtained a loan of $1,000, and gave one of these bonds with coupon attached as security; four he gave to the complainant the Cleveland National Bank to secure a debt of $2,400; and one to C. L. Hardwick & Co., of Dalton, Georgia, as security for $1,000. Robertson defaulted on the interest coupons, and the beneficiaries, seeing that it was best to foreclose the trust deed, thereupon directed that this be done. Accordingly Mr. Grayson (entirely ignorant of the method adopted in the execution of these papers), as trustee, advertised the property for sale in accordance with the terms of the trust deed, and at the sale made by him a third party, acting under the agreement already reached by the beneficiaries, bought the property in the name of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., who were to hold it in trust for the various which proves to be fictitious, which check is indorsed by such seller in such fictitious name to another in payment of a board bill, who takes it without knowledge of the facts, is liable thereon for the amount thereof to such innocent holder. Robertson v. Coleman, 141 Mass. 231, 55 Am. Rep. 471.

And one who makes a draft to a real person in actual existence but designated by a false or assumed name, of which fact he is ignorant, in payment of property received from him, cannot defend as against bona fide holders for value and set up fraud practised by the payee upon the maker, whether he was induced to adopt the name used in the draft through fraud or by mistake. Forbes v. Eapy, 21 Ohio St. 474.

So, an indorser of a bill of exchange is bound by his indorsement though the bill is made to a fictitious payee. Ex parte Clarke, 3 Bro. Ch. 238.

But the indorsement of a bill of exchange by a person into whose hands it comes by mistake, though his name is the same as that of the payee, with knowledge that he is not the person to whom the bill was made payable, is a forgery, and will not pass title to the bill. Mead v. Young, 4 T. R. 28.

And the acceptance of a bill without knowledge on the part of the acceptor that the payee therein named was fictitious is completely void, and imposes no liability upon the acceptor. McCall v. Corning, 3 La. Ann. 409, 48 Am. Dec. 454.

And a person discounting a bill payable to a fictitious payee for the benefit of the drawers and with knowledge of the transaction cannot recover of the acceptor. Hunter v. Jeffery, Peake, Add. Cas. 148.

But an acceptor of a bill who knew that the payee was a fictitious person is liable to a bona fide holder thereof who did not know of such fiction. McCall v. Corning, 3 La. Ann. 409, 48 Am. Dec. 454.

And an innocent indorsee for a valuable consideration, of a bill of exchange drawn in favor of a fictitious payee, which was known to the acceptor as well as to the drawer and the name of such payee was indorsed on the bill, may recover against the acceptor as on a bill payable to bearer. Hunter v. Blodget, 2 Yeates, 480; Minet v. Gibson, 3 T. R. 482; and see Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 509.

And the acceptor supra protest of a bill of exchange for the honor of the drawer is, like the drawer himself, estopped to deny that the bill was valid, and not competent to set up as a defense to an action against him by the indorsee that the payee is a fictitious person, and that he was ignorant of that fact when he accepted the bill. Phillips 39 L. R. A.

v. Im Thurn, 18 C. B. N. S. 694, 11 Jur. N. S. 489, 12 L. T. N. S. 457, 18 Week. Rep. 750.

The acceptor of a bill of exchange made to enable the drawer to raise money, which is made payable by such drawer to a fictitious payee and indorsed by him in such fictitious name, which bill is put in circulation, is estopped to object that the payee therein named was fictitious, and to claim that he had nothing to do with it, as by lending his acceptance he had enabled the drawer to make the bill in that form. Stone v. Freeland, 1 H. Bl. 316, note.

One of the parties to a mercantile transaction in which by express agreement a bill was drawn and indorsed by procuration in the name of a fictitious or dead person, and the position of one of the parties has been altered by giving up certain goods to the other, is not at liberty afterwards to say that the fact which was assumed as the basis of the contract or arrangement, and upon which the other party acted and thereby altered his position, was really untrue, and that the bill was void. Ashpital v. Bryan, 3 Best & S. 474, 3 Fost. & F. 153, 33 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 323, 9 Jur. N. S. 791, 11 L. T. N. S. 221, 12 Week. Rep. 1082.

And a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration of a bill of exchange drawn by a person and others upon himself in favor of a fictitious person, which fact was known to all the parties concerned in drawing it, and who received the value from a second indorser, may recover the amount in an action against the acceptor for money paid or money had and received. Tatlock v. Harris, 3 T. R. 174; Vere v. Lewis, 3 T. R. 182.

And where a bill of exchange is drawn in favor of a fictitious payee with the knowledge of both the acceptor and drawer, and the name of such payee is indorsed on it by the drawer with the knowledge of the acceptor, which fictitious indorsement purports to be to the drawer himself or his order and then the drawer indorses the bill to an innocent indorsee for value and it is afterwards accepted, and no intent to defraud anyone appears, the innocent indorsee may recover against the acceptor, as on a bill payable to bearer. Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Bl. 509.

So, the acceptor of a bill of exchange drawn in the name of a fictitious person, payable to the order of the drawer, is considered as undertaking to pay to the order of the person who signed as drawer, and an indorsee may bring evidence to show that the signature of the supposed drawer to the bill and to the first indorsement are in the same handwriting. Cooper v. Meyer, 10 Barn. & C. 468.

And evidence is admissible in an action by an in-bondholders. This sale, however, was not consummated. Soon afterwards Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., being informed that the deed of trust and bonds were executed as has been before detailed, filed their bill in one of these consolidated causes, in which they charge that the deed from Robertson to Phillips was ineffectual to convey title, as there was no such grantee, and that the deed of trust was equally ineffectual in conveying title to Grayson, trustee, because the name of C. Phillips was forged to that instrument by Robertson. They allege that, as the owner of Robertson's note, and by reason of his nonresidence, they have a right to treat these conveyances as of no force and value, and attach the lots in question and appropriate them, as far as might be necessary to the payment of their debt. They especially repudiate the trust deed, and decline to take any benefit from it, or the sale made under it, by Grayson as trustee. Subsequently the Cleveland National Bank filed its bill in the other of said causes, setting up its ownership of the $2,400 note of Robertson and its possession of four of these coupon bonds, and charging bad faith upon the part of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. in repudiating the sale made in the interest of all the beneficiaries of the trust deed, and insisting that the legal effect of the execution of this deed of trust to Grayson was that the title to this property passed out of Robertson to said trustee, although the maker used in its execution the false name of C. Phillips, and that this trustee held it for the security of all the holders of said bonds and coupons, save alone the bond of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., which it was insisted could not participate because of the renunciation of all interest in the trust deed by its owner. Among other things, this bill prayed that the attachment issued at the instance of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. be vacated, and that said deed of trust be set up and established, and that the lots covered by it be sold inocent indorsee for value against the acceptor of a bill drawn by the maker to a fictitious payee or order and indorsed by him in that name, of irregular and suspicious transactions and circumstances relating to other bills drawn by the one upon the other payable to fictitious payees and accepted by such acceptor, in order to raise an inference that the acceptor knew the name of the payee to be fictitious, or that he had given authority to draw the bill in question payable to a fictitious person, though none of such transactions or circumstances had any apparent relation to the bill in question, and though none of them proved that he accepted any of such other bills with knowledge that the payees mentioned in them were fictitious. Gibson v. Hunter, 2 H. Bl. 288, 6 Bro. P. C. 255.

In Bennett v. Farnell, 1 Campb. 180, however, it was held that a bill of exchange made payable to a fictitious person or his order is neither in effect payable to the order of the drawer nor to bearer, but is completely void, but that if money paid by the holder of such a bill as the consideration for its indorsement to him gets into the hands of the acceptor it may be recovered back as money had and received.

So, a bank which certifies a check purporting to have been drawn upon it payable to order is liable to a bona fide holder in the ordinary course of business thereon, whether the indorsement of the check is that of the payee named or whether a fictitious person is named as payee and the check is indorsed in such fictitious name. Hagen v. Bowery Nat. Bank, 6 Lans. 490.

And a bank which issues and puts in circulation a draft payable to order inserting the name given by the person requiring it, relying simply upon the word of an entire stranger that it is his name, under circumstances somewhat calculated to excite suspicion, is liable thereon where such name was indorsed upon it when presented for discount to an innocent holder for value. Anderson v. Dundee State Bank, 66 Hun. 613.

And where by the fraud of a third person a depositor of a bank is induced to draw his check payable to a nonexisting person or order, the drawer being in ignorance of the fact and intending no fraud, the bank on which it is drawn is not authorized to pay it and charge the amount to the account of the depositor on the indorsement of the party presenting it, although it appears to have been previously indorsed by the party named as payee, and as such indorsement is in effect a forgery, payment thereof by the bank confers no right on it as against the drawer of the check. Armstrong v. National Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 6 L. R. A. 625.

In that case Lane v. Krekle, 22 Iowa, 399, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that the note there in question was made payable to a fictitious person or bearer, and passed by delivery without indorsement, and Phillips v. Im Thurn, 18 C. B. N. S. 694, 11 Jur. N. S. 469, 12 L. T. N. S. 457, 18 Week. Rep. 750, supra, was distinguished upon the ground that in that case the signature of the drawer, as well as the indorsement, was a forgery, but the acceptor was held liable because the paper was discounted relying in good faith upon the acceptance; and Ort v. Fowler, 31 Kan. 473, 47 Am. Rep. 501, supra, IV. a, was criticised as not supported by authority so far as it holds that a note made payable to a fictitious person or order is in effect payable to bearer irrespective of the knowledge of the maker.

An instrument, though not in reality a bill of exchange, is within the meaning of the bills of exchange act of 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61), providing that a bill of exchange made payable to a fictitious person should be treated as payable to bearer, where it is in the form of a bill manufactured by a person who forges the signature of the named drawer and obtains by fraud the signature of the acceptor, and forges the signature of the named payee and presents the document for payment, although the drawer and named payee were ignorant of all the circumstances. Bank of England v. Vagliano Bros. [1891] A. C. 107.

And the person named as the payee in a bill of exchange is not prevented from being a fictitious or nonexisting person within the meaning of the bills of exchange act of 1882, § 7, subs. 3, so as to prevent the bill from being considered as payable to bearer, by the fact that at the time of drawing the instrument the drawee supposed him to be a real person, and checks are equally within the meaning of the act with bills of exchange. Clutton v. Attenborough [1895] 2 Q. B. 306; Clutton v. Attenborough [1897] A. C. 90, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 221, 75 L. T. N. S. 556.

And a bill may be pleaded as payable to bearer within the meaning of the bills of exchange act of 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. chap. 61) where the person named as payee, and to whose order the bill is made payable on the face of it, is a real person, but has not, and never was intended by the drawer to have, any right upon it or arising out of it. Bank of England v. Vagliano Bros. [1891] A. C. 107.

under proper decree in the interest of such bondholders as had not renounced this trust. All necessary parties were made defendants to these respective bills. The chancellor, on the hearing of these causes, dismissed the bill of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., and decreed that the effect of the deed of trust to Grayson, trustee, was to vest the title to this property for the benefit of all the bondholders, directed a foreclosure sale for their benefit, and in effect declined to exclude Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. from a participation in the proceeds of the trust property. From this decree Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. alone appealed. The court of chancery appeals have affirmed the chancellor's decree, and the case is now before us by appeal from this decree of affirmance.

The theory of the bill of Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., as has been stated, is that the grant from Robertson and wife to C. Phillips, there being no such grantee, was waste paper, leaving the title in the grantor, and that the trust deed from C. Phillips to Grayson, trustee, being a forgery, communicated no title. There can be no doubt but that this contention is sound, so far as the effect of the deed from Robertson and wife to the fictitious grantee, Phillips, is concerned. The definition of a deed that it "is a writing sealed and delivered by the parties" (Co. Litt. 171; 2 Bl. Com. 295) makes it essential, for an instrument to operate as such, that there should be both a grantor and a grantee; so that a conveyance uncertain as to the person intended as grantee, as, for instance, where a grant is made to a "neighborhood" (Thomas v. Marshfield, 10 Pick. 864), or to one who is dead at the time of its execution (Hunter v. Watson, 12 Cal. 863, 78 Am. Dec. 548), or to a person purely fictitious (David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 265, 88 Am. Rep. 418), is inoperative and void. But we do not agree with appellants' counsel in their insistence that the deed of trust which Robertson executed in the name of C. Phillips was a nullity. On the contrary, we are satisfied, on reason and authority, that it as effectually conveyed the title to this property to Grayson, trustee, as if Robertson had used his own name in the conveyance. We think there can be no doubt but that, if the grantor had used in the execution of this deed his surname simply, his identity being established, it would have been operative to carry title; and we think it equally free from doubt that, using his Christian name, as the grantor did, and intending it to take effect as a perfect deed, and delivering it as such, it will be taken as conclusively binding upon him. The question in a case like this is, Did the grantor intend to bind himself by the instrument, and is his identity free from uncertainty? 1 Devlin, Deeds, §§ 154, 185. Mr. Devlin in his work on Deeds (vol. 1, § 191) states the law to be that "a patent issued to a person under an assumed name is not void, and a conveyance by such person under his assumed name will transfer title." And again, in § 188, the same author says: "Between the parties, a conveyance of property by the owner by any name will transfer the title. And when executed in a different name from that in which he acquired title, it will, when recorded, operate as constructive notice of the transfer of title, and will be entitled to precedence over a deed to the same land executed in the name by which title to it was acquired, but subsequently recorded,"—citing to this proposition Fallon v. Kehoe, 38 Cal. 44. This exact question has been carefully and on authority considered by the supreme court of New York in David v. Williamsburgh City F. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 265, 88 Am. Rep. 418, and the same conclusion was reached there as is announced by Mr. Devlin. In that case Henry J. David conveyed real and personal property to Marx David, a fictitious person, and then in the name of this fictitious grantee, conveyed the same property to the plaintiff in the action, who undertook in her own name to protect it with insurance policies. It was subsequently burned, and the insurance company, discovering the character of these conveyances, declined to pay the loss upon the ground that the mythical character of "Marx David" had prevented title from passing into plaintiff. The court said: "The conveyances to Marx David were undoubtedly wholly invalid and inoperative, as there was no such person to take title; and if nothing more had been done, the title to the property would have remained in Henry J. David. But the title still remaining in him, he executed the bills of sale and the deed to the plaintiff, using or adopting, for that purpose, the name of Marx David. The papers thus executed were undoubtedly valid against him. . . . Pro hac vice it is his name." But appellants earnestly insist that, however this may be where a party, without fraud or wrongdoing, assumes a name other than his own in making a contract, yet that in this case Robertson, in using the name of C. Phillips, was guilty of the crime of forgery; that no contract can spring from a felony. Forgery at common law and under our statute is the fraudulent making or alteration of any writing to the prejudice of another's rights. 1 Whart. Crim. L. § 658; Mill. & V. Code, § 5492. While this transaction was highly discreditable, yet we do not think it falls within this definition. Whose rights were prejudiced by the assumption of this name? Not those of C. Phillips, because he was a mythical personage; nor were those of Mr. Grayson, the trustee, for he had none in the property, until this instrument was executed, and then there occurred by the use of this assumed name exactly what would have happened if the grantor had used his true name,—that is, he acquired title to the property; nor were the holders of these bonds prejudiced, because they had no interest either in the property or in these bonds at the time the trust deed was executed, and it was then the crime of forgery was committed, if at all. Whatever may have been the offense, if any, committed by Robertson in afterwards obtaining money on those bonds as executed by Phillips, at any rate it could not make that forgery which was not so at the time the trust deed was made. We do not think, under the facts disclosed, that this act was felonious. As Mr. Wharton, in volume 1, § 660, of his work on Criminal Law, says, it is not "forgery when the offense is not the assumption of the name of a supposed third person, but the adoption of an alias or alternative name of the party charged." But it is insisted that this case must at all events be reversed, as the court below permitted on the trial the Cleveland National Bank, without proof of its execution, to read the note of Robertson held by it, over the objection of appellants. We do not think this objection was well taken. It is true that the bill of complainant bank alleged that it was the owner of a note of Robertson's for $2,500, and that this averment was denied by the defendants Wiehl, Probasco, & Co., but it was admitted to be true by Robertson, the maker, against whom they sought a personal decree. Appellants were in nowise interested in this. As no relief was asked against them on the note it was immaterial to them whether complainant did or did not have this note, or whether it was duly executed, as they had no controversy with the bank over it. The question that appellants were interested in was whether the complainant bank had the four bonds claimed by it, and as such holder could insist upon treating the property as a trust fund for their security. If it held these it was unimportant to appellants whether they were held as collateral to a note or as absolute owner. The Cleveland National Bank did not appeal, and we therefore cannot consider the question whether, having repudiated this trust deed, the chancellor was in error in letting Wiehl, Probasco, & Co. in to participate in the trust fund.

Affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

Henry I. FAUCHER

v.

John W. WILSON.

(.....N. H.)

1. A person trucking goods for particular customers at prices fixed in each case by special contract is not a common carrier so as to be liable as an insurer of the goods.
2. A carrier is not liable for the loss due to the bursting of a hogshead of molasses by reason of fermentation, as this results from the operation of natural laws, which a common carrier does not insure against.

ACTION to recover the value of a hogshead of molasses which burst while being moved by defendant from the railroad station to plaintiff's store. Judgment for defendant.

Defendant, a truckman, on one of the warmest days in the summer of 1891, undertook to transport a hogshead of molasses from the railway station to plaintiff's store. On arrival at the store the hogshead was found to be leaking from fermentation. Taps had been provided for gauging the hogshead, which might have been used for venting it. If they had been removed and the gas caused by fermentation allowed to escape before unloading the bursting might have been prevented. The negligence alleged was in failing to make the attempt to prevent the bursting.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Burnham, Brown, & Warren, for plaintiff:

The molasses was lost while in the possession and keeping of the defendant, a common carrier.

Under the common law the defendant became an insurer of the property while in his possession, and liable for any loss unless occasioned by act of God or public enemy.

The defendant, in order to avoid his liability for the loss of the molasses, must satisfy the court that the loss was occasioned by the act of God.

Loss by act of God is such an "irresistible disaster as results immediately from natural causes, and is in no sense attributable to human agency."

Schouler, Bailments & Carriers, p. 391.

The act of God seems to involve some notion of an accident from natural causes, impossible to be foreseen, and therefore impossible to be guarded against.

Ewart v. Street, 2 Bail. L. 157, 28 Am. Dec. 181.

The criterion, it seems, is, that if it be such an accident as no human foresight or sagacity could have prevented, then the loss will be excused.

Gilmore v. Carman, 1 Smedes & M. 279, 40 Am. Dec. 96; Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 849, 46 Am. Dec. 398.

v. Maine C. R. Co. (Me.) 20 L. R. A. 812; and Wald v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (Ill.) 36 L. R. A. 356. As to transportation of dangerous articles by carrier, see note to California Powder Works v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (Cal.) 36 L. R. A. 648.

If divers causes concur in the loss, the act of God being one, but not the immediate or proximate cause, such act of God does not discharge the carrier. To have this effect, it must be one exclusive of human agency.

New Brunswick S. B. & C. Transp. Co. v. Tiers, 24 N. J. L. 697, 64 Am. Dec. 394.

To relieve him the act of God must be the immediate cause of the loss.

Fergusson v. Brent, 12 Md. 9, 71 Am. Dec. 582.

If the loss or injury happen in any way through the agency of man, it cannot be considered the act of God.

Michaels v. New York C. R. Co. 30 N. Y. 564, 86 Am. Dec. 415.

The act of God which excuses the carrier must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but the better opinion is that it must be the sole cause.

Wolf v. American Exp. Co. 48 Mo. 421, 97 Am. Dec. 406.

The defendant well knew that molasses fermented in warm weather. He knew that the day that he undertook to transport it was a warm day—"one of the warmest of the season." He knew and had every opportunity to know whether the cask was full or not. If the defendant had been asked by the plaintiff to bring from the freight station instead of a hogshead of molasses a certain box which bore his name, with no other mark upon it, and was not informed of its contents and had no reason to believe it contained anything dangerous to handle or expose to the sun when in fact it contained nitro-glycerine, then in case of accident and loss by explosion the carrier might not be liable for the loss.

Parrott v. Wells ("The Nitro-Glycerine Case"), 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 524, 21 L. ed. 206.

But the defendant here was negligent in undertaking to transport the molasses at the time of day that it was transported, and during a day which was one of the warmest of the season when he knew the contents of the hogshead and that molasses ferments in warm weather.

Rixford v. Smith, 52 N. H. 361, 18 Am. Rep. 42; Michaels v. New York C. R. Co. 30 N. Y. 564, 86 Am. Dec. 415; Schouler, Bailments & Carriers, p. 399.

The burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the loss occurred from some cause that would furnish him with a defense.

Hall v. Cheney, 36 N. H. 32.

Mr. Joseph W. Fellows for defendant.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is not found that the defendant was a common carrier. The finding that he was engaged in the business of trucking goods for hire from the railway freight station to different stores in the city lacks the distinguishing characteristics of a common carrier, namely, the holding of oneself out as ready "to carry at reasonable rates such commodities as are in his line of business, for all persons who offer them, as early as his means will allow." Shelden v. Robinson, 7 N. H. 157, 163, 26 Am. Dec. 726; Elkins v. Boston & M. R. Co. 23 N. H. 275; Moses v. Boston & M. R. Co. 24 N. H. 71, 80, 88, 89, 55 Am. Dec. 222; McDuffee v. Portland & R. R. Co. 52 N. H. 480, 448, 18 Am. Rep. 72; State v. United States & C. Exp. Co. 60 N. H. 219, 261; 2 Kent, Com. 597, 598; Story, Bailm. §§ 495, 508; Brind v. Dale, 8 Car. & P. 207; Liver Alkali Co. v. Johnson, L. R. 9 Exch. 388, 343; Seafie v. Farrant, L. R. 10 Exch. 358, 365; Nugent v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 423; Fish v. Chapman, 2 Ga. 349, 46 Am. Dec. 393; Allen v. Sackrider, 87 N. Y. 341; Lough v. Outerbridge, 148 N. Y. 271, 278, 25 L. R. A. 674.

The inference from this finding is as strong, to say the least, that the defendant's business was limited to trucking for particular customers at prices fixed in each case by special contract, as it is that he held himself out as ready to truck for the public indiscriminately, at reasonable prices. If such was the character of his business, he was not an insurer of the plaintiff's goods (there being no special contract of insurance), and was only bound to exercise ordinary care in respect to them.

If the defendant was a common carrier, he is not liable for the plaintiff's loss, since it happened from the operation of natural laws which a common carrier does not insure against. Hudson v. Baxendale, 2 Hurlst. & N. 574; Great Western R. Co. v. Flower, 20 Week. Rep. 776; Nugent v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 423; Nelson v. Woodruff, 66 U. S. 1 Black, 156, 17 L. ed. 97; Smith v. New Haven & N. E. Co. 12 Allen, 581, 533, 90 Am. Dec. 166; Swelland v. Boston & A. R. Co. 102 Mass. 276, 282; Dow v. Portland Steam Packet Co. 84 Me. 490; Coupland v. Housatonic R. Co. 61 Conn. 581, 15 L. R. A. 584; Rixford v. Smith, 52 N. H. 365, 18 Am. Rep. 42.

In Farrar v. Adams, 1 Bull. N. P. 69c, it is said that "if an action were brought against a carrier for negligently driving his cart, so that a pipe of wine was burst, and was lost, it would be good evidence for the defendant that the wine was upon the ferment, and, when the pipe burst, he was driving gently."

It being found that the plaintiff's loss was not due to any want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, there must be judgment for the defendant.

Smith, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

William MATTHEWS, Exr., etc., of Caroline Silvernail, Deceased, Appt.,

AMERICAN CENTRAL INSURANCE COMPANY, Respt.,

(154 N. Y. 449.)

1. A standard insurance policy being prepared by insurers should be construed, when the meaning is doubtful, most favorable to the insured.
2. A liberal construction of an insurance policy, if it is a reasonable one and will prevent injustice, should be adopted when a literal construction would lead to manifest injustice.
3. In case of a loss by fire after the death of the original insured and before the appointment of a legal representative those interested in the policy must make reasonable efforts to see that the covenants as to notice and proofs of loss are kept, and within a reasonable time must use such agencies as the law provides to secure that result.
4. The appointment of a temporary representative who may take the necessary steps to prosecute a cause of action on an insurance policy within the periods limited may be necessary in case of a loss occurring after the death of the insured, if the appointment of an executor or administrator cannot for any reason be secured with ordinary promptness.
5. A dismissal of the complaint on the merits cannot be made by the appellate division on hearing exceptions upon a motion for a new trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 1000, but if the exceptions are well taken the motion should be granted and the case sent back for a new trial; if they are not well taken, the motion should be denied and judgment entered on the verdict or order of nonsuit, as the case may be.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Steuben County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Modified and affirmed.

Statement by Vann, J.:

On the 1st of August, 1889, the defendant issued its policy of insurance, of the standard form, to Mrs. Caroline Silvernail, whereby it insured her dwelling house, barn, and the produce therein, against loss or damage by fire, to an amount not exceeding $1,050, for the term of three years from that day. On the 2d of December, 1891, Mrs. Silvernail died, leaving a will, in which the plaintiff was nominated as sole executor. The probate of her will was opposed by some of her heirs, and on the 20th of April, 1892, when the contest was still in progress before the surrogate, a fire occurred, which destroyed a portion of the property insured, both real and personal. On the 15th of May, 1894, the contest over the will resulted in its admission to probate, and the appointment of the plaintiff as executor. July 11, 1894, proofs of loss were sworn to by the plaintiff, and shortly thereafter mailed to the defendant, which received them at the home office, in St. Louis, July 23, 1894, and retained them, without objection. The loss not having been paid, on the 29th of October following this suit was commenced upon the policy. The defendant pleaded as defenses that the action was not begun within twelve months next after the fire, although there was a limitation by contract to that period, that written notice of the loss was not immediately given, and that proofs of loss were not furnished within sixty days after the fire, as required by the policy. Upon the trial, after the defendant's counsel had expressly stated that he did not ask to have any question submitted to the jury, the court, upon motion of the plaintiff, directed a verdict in his favor for the sum of $612, the admitted value of the property destroyed, with interest from the 23d of September, 1894, and ordered that the defendant's exceptions should be heard by the appellate division in the first instance, and that entry of judgment should in the meantime be suspended. The appellate division having, by a divided vote, sustained the exceptions and dismissed the complaint, the plaintiff appealed to this court.

Mr. John F. Parkhurst, for appellant:

The one-year limitation in the policy did not commence to run until the appointment of plaintiff as executor.

Mr. I. N. Ames, for respondent:

Under the policy it is provided where the word "insured" occurs, it shall be held to include the legal representative of the insured.

The condition that no action can be sustained by the insured or her legal representative unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire is a condition precedent which has not been performed or waived in the case at bar, hence there can be no recovery.

Vann, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The policy in question provided that, if a fire should occur, "the insured" should "give immediate notice of any loss thereby, in writing, to" the company, and "within sixty days after the fire" should furnish proofs of loss, "signed and sworn to by said insured." It further provided that the loss should not become payable until sixty days after the receipt by the company of the proofs of loss, and that "no suit or action on this policy, for the recovery of any claim, shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity until after full compliance by the insured with all the foregoing requirements, nor unless commenced within twelve months next after the fire." By a subsequent clause it was stipulated that, whenever the word "insured" occurred in the policy, it should "be held to include the legal representatives of the insured," and, by a preceding clause, that any change in interest, title, or possession, "other than by death of the insured," should avoid the policy. As the fire occurred after the death of Mrs. Silvernail, "the insured" at the date of the loss was either the person who in the course of time should be appointed by the surrogate to administer upon her estate, or the persons interested in her estate, who expected to share therein. 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 221; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 18; Greenwood v. Holbrook, 111 N. Y. 465. As "legal representatives" are equivalent to "executors and administrators," where the subject-matter or context does not control the meaning, we will first proceed upon the assumption that on the death of the testatrix the words "the insured," as used in the policy, referred to the legal representative to be appointed by the surrogate. That person could not, in the nature of things, be known until the appointment was actually made, as in the case of testacy the executor nominated might die or decline, and in case of intestacy none of the persons entitled to the right of administration might accept the trust. The policy, although of the standard form, was prepared by insurers, who are presumed to have had their own interests primarily in view; and hence, when the meaning is doubtful, it should be construed most favorably to the insured, who had nothing to do with the preparation thereof. Rickerson v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 149 N. Y. 307, 313; Laws 1886, chap. 488; Laws 1892, chap. 690, § 121. Moreover, when a literal construction would lead to manifest injustice to the insured, and a liberal, but still reasonable, construction would prevent injustice, by not requiring an impossibility, the latter should be adopted, because the parties are presumed, when the language used by them permits, to have intended a reasonable, and not an unreasonable, result. Trippe v. Provident Fund Soc. 140 N. Y. 28, 26, 22 L. R. A. 432; McNally v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 137 N. Y. 389. Hence, it cannot be held that the policy became of no value upon the death of Mrs. Silvernail, because at that moment she had, and of necessity could have, no legal representative to give immediate notice of a fire if one had occurred. So, when the fire actually occurred there was still no legal representative to give the notice specified, yet the liberal construction that always obtains with reference to the procedure after a loss does not permit us to hold that the policy became void because, under the circumstances then existing, the notice was not given at once. Paltronitch v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 143 N. Y. 73, 76, 25 L. R. A. 198. As the policy provides for the effect of death, and includes under the head of "the insured" the legal representative of the insured, the parties necessarily contemplated a period longer or shorter in duration, depending upon circumstances, when there could be no one authorized to act for the estate. Hence the covenants that "the insured" should give written notice immediately after the fire, and that within sixty days "the insured" should sign, swear to, and deliver proofs of loss, are to be considered in the light of what may reasonably be presumed to have been within the contemplation of the parties, when they entered into those covenants, as to the possibility of literal performance in case of a fire after the death of the original "insured," and before any opportunity to have a legal representative appointed by the surrogate. The words "immediately after the fire," as used with reference to the preliminary notice, and "sixty days after the fire," as used with reference to the proofs of loss, are to be construed, not literally, in all cases, but in the light of what was reasonable and possible in the case in hand. Bennett v. Lycoming County Mut. Ins. Co. 67 N. Y. 274; Richards, Ins. § 160. The law does not require impossibilities. The disability to sue, caused by war, has been held to relieve a policy holder from the consequences of failing to bring suit within twelve months after a loss, as required by the policy, because compliance was impossible under the circumstances. Sennnes v. City F. Ins. Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 158, 20 L. ed. 490. The same cause was held for the same reason to legally excuse the nonpayment of premiums upon a policy of life insurance as required by its terms. Cohen v. New York L. Ins. Co. 50 N. Y. 610, 10 Am. Rep. 522. Still, as the covenants in question are essential to the safe conduct of the insurance business, in order to enable the insurer to promptly investigate the facts connected with a fire and to provide for paying or defending, or for rebuilding, if it so elected, it is incumbent upon those interested in the policy to make reasonable efforts to see that the covenants are kept, and, within a reasonable time, to use such agencies as the law provides, in order that they may be kept if possible. As was said by this court in Wheeler v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 543, 550, 37 Am. Rep. 594, with reference to the failure to pay premiums of life insurance, owing to the insanity of the insured and the infancy of the assignees of the policy: "After Vose became insane, he was not really the party in interest. He had assigned the policies to his children, and they were the parties interested therein and to be affected by a failure to perform the condition of the contract. Although Vose was their guardian, if incapacitated by his insanity a competent person could have been appointed in his place; and hence his insanity was not necessarily an insuperable obstacle to their performance of the condition of the policy, and they were not relieved thereby." Those who expect to share in the proceeds of the policy when paid cannot trifle with the subject, nor delay action that would naturally result in compliance with the requirements of the contract. If the appointment of an executor or administrator cannot, for any reason, be secured with ordinary promptness, it would not be a reasonable construction of the policy to cast all the risk and inconvenience of the delay upon the insurer, provided those interested in the estate could procure the appointment of a temporary representative, who, by taking the necessary steps, could keep the covenants entered into by the insured.

It is provided by § 2670 of the Code of Civil Procedure that on the application of a creditor, or a person interested in the estate, the surrogate may, in his discretion, issue to one or more suitable persons letters of temporary administration, where delay necessarily occurs in the granting of letters testamentary or of administration owing to a contest before the surrogate, arising on an application therefor, or for probate of a will, or for any other cause. At least ten days' notice must be given to each party to the proceeding who has appeared, but the period may be shortened to not less than two days by the surrogate, upon proof that the safety of the estate requires it. A temporary administrator, thus appointed, "has authority to take into his possession personal property; to secure and preserve it; and to collect choses in action; and, for either of those purposes, he may maintain any action or special proceeding." Id. § 2672. It is further provided that "where a temporary administrator is appointed, in consequence of a contest respecting a will of real property, the order appointing him may confer upon him authority to take possession of real property, in the same or another county, which is affected by the will, and to receive the rents and profits thereof. The surrogate may, by an order, confer upon him authority to lease any or all of the real property, for a term not exceeding one year; or to do any other act with respect thereto, except to sell it, which is, in the surrogate's opinion, necessary for the execution of the will, or the preservation or benefit of the real property. For either of these purposes, he may maintain or defend any action or special proceeding." Id. § 2675. While other powers are conferred by statute, or may be conferred by the surrogate, under its authority, upon a temporary administrator, these are sufficient for the purpose of discussing the question now before us. The will of Mrs. Silvernail embraced both real and personal property, including by specific mention the farm upon which the burned buildings stood, and indirectly the produce destroyed, through the power to sell the same in order to pay pecuniary legacies. The executor was given the power to sell the farm after five years, with power to lease the same in the meantime. The income, after deducting interest and taxes, was to be applied upon the encumbrances; and the proceeds of the sale, after payment of all the debts of the testatrix, were to be divided among her children. A fire insurance policy, after a loss has occurred, is a chose in action; and a temporary administrator could collect the same, and if necessary, commence an action for that purpose. Whether the proceeds, when collected, would be real or personal property, or both, is unimportant in this case, as the power to collect is the vital fact. That power necessarily implies the further power to do whatever is requisite in order to perfect the chose in action so that collection can be enforced, for the power to do an act includes the power to do all that is reasonably necessary to do it effectively. Hall v. Lauderdale, 46 N. Y. 70, 78; Parker v. Saratoga County Supers. 106 N. Y. 892. Independent, therefore, of the provisions of the statute empowering the surrogate to confer authority upon the temporary administrator in regard to real estate, when there is a contest respecting a will of realty, we think that the right to collect the policy carried with it the right to serve all such notices as the policy required, in order to make it collectible. Hence, it was within the power of the persons expecting to share in the property of the testatrix to do something toward keeping her covenants with the defendant. While it is true that their application, if made to the surrogate, was subject to his discretion, it cannot be presumed that he would have hesitated to appoint a temporary administrator if the facts bearing upon the subject were spread before him, that appear in the record now before us. McGregor v. Buel, 24 N. Y. 166, 169. Moreover, even if the application, although made in due time and form, had failed, it would have relieved the beneficiaries under the will from the accusation of negligence that is now brought against them; for they could say in answer thereto, "we have done all that we could." No excuse, sufficient or otherwise, for nonaction, was shown, such as absence, insanity, infancy, or want of knowledge that the fire had taken place. The subject of applying for a temporary administrator was under discussion among the heirs while the contest over the will was in progress. Not long after Mrs. Silvernail died, the plaintiff deposited the will with the surrogate, and informed him that he did not want to have anything to do with it; but after the lapse of several months, upon the request of certain creditors of the testatrix, he consented to act, and thereupon proceedings were begun to prove the will. Mrs. Silvernail left three children, each of whom was a devisee or legatee under the will, and all were of full age and competent to act, except one, who was an infant of thirteen when her mother died. Two of them, at least, lived within sight of the building in question at the time of the fire. So far as appears, therefore, there was no reason why a temporary administrator should not have been applied for and appointed. The contingency of death was foreseen, and provided against by provisions in the policy which kept it alive notwithstanding that event. Dolan v. Rodgers, 149 N. Y. 489; Dexter v. Norton, 47 N. Y. 62, 7 Am. Rep. 415. The legal representative was by the contract substituted as "the insured," upon whom rested the burden of performing those covenants which Mrs. Silvernail had entered into. The insurance company was under no obligation to procure the appointment of an administrator, temporary or permanent, even if it had been in a position to, because its promise to pay was dependent on prior action by the insured; but those entitled to the proceeds of the policy when paid were bound to do so, if they could by reasonable effort, so that the agreement could be performed on the part of "the insured." If the executor could have acted by virtue of the power conferred by the will without probate or other action by the surrogate, his default is too apparent to require discussion.

Upon the assumption that the legal representatives of the insured, referred to in the policy, included the heirs at law, next of kin, legatees, or devisees, as the case may be, the situation of the plaintiff is not improved, because, according to that theory, there was no time when competent persons, sustaining one or more of those relations to the decedent, with full knowledge of all the facts, could not have given the preliminary notice, and furnished the proofs of loss. Wyman v. Wyman, 26 N. Y. 253; O'Brien v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 76 N. Y. 459; Greenwood v. Holbrook, 111 N. Y. 465. The delay in serving notices and in bringing the action was in no respect owing to the defendant, which, so far as appears, did nothing to mislead anyone, or to waive the defenses it now insists upon. Some evidence was given tending to show that a son of the testatrix, about ten days after the fire, signed and swore to a statement of the loss and delivered it to an aunt, but he could not tell what she did with it. She died before the trial, and there was no satisfactory evidence to show that the statement sworn to by the son ever reached the defendant. One witness testified that he saw a lady, who, as he thought, was a "Silvernail," deliver a paper to a man who claimed to be an adjuster, and that they talked about the loss. The nature or contents of the paper was not shown, and it did not appear that the man was an adjuster for the defendant, except by the verification of the answer, which was not put in evidence. But, even assuming that there was evidence to sustain a finding that both the preliminary and final notice of loss was given to the defendant as required by the policy, the fact remains that this action was not begun until long after the time limited for that purpose had elapsed, and yet no lawful reason is given for not procuring temporary administration in time to have sued within the stipulated period. Therefore, whether the policy means by legal "representative" the appointee of the surrogate, or some person directly interested in the estate, or both, there was a failure to comply with its provisions, with no excuse for noncompliance. The insured was bound by contract to do certain acts, as conditions precedent to the right to recover, and was under a legal obligation, if there were obstacles in the way, of making a reasonable effort to remove them. Howland v. Edmonds, 24 N. Y. 807, 808; Porter v. Kingsbury, 71 N. Y. 588; Reinting v. Buffalo, 102 N. Y. 308. If, after due diligence, they had proved insurmountable for a time, the delay would have been excusable, and performance at the earliest practicable moment thereafter would have been sufficient; but, to excuse nonperformance, it must appear that the act to be done could not, by any reasonable means, have been accomplished. Mere difficulty of performance is not enough. Wheeler v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. 82 N. Y. 548, 551, 87 Am. Rep. 594. In Sanford v. Sanford, 62 N. Y. 558, it appeared that the defendant's intestate was adjudged an idiot in 1847, and that the committee then appointed died in 1854. The intestate died December 9, 1864, and during the ten years preceding his death he had boarded with the plaintiff, and was clothed and cared for by her, and she paid his necessary funeral expenses; yet it was held that the statute of limitations applied to the whole claim accruing before the death of the intestate. Judge Allen said: "There was no legal impediment to an action against the intestate. Had there been a committee in office, the creditor could have petitioned the court either for a summary adjustment and payment of her claim, or for leave to sue. As there was no committee, although it seems the judgment of the court, determining that the debtor was non compos mentis, was in force, the plaintiff might have applied to the court for leave to sue, or, perhaps, have brought an action without such leave. One or the other of these courses was open to the plaintiff, and which would have been the proper practice it is not necessary to determine." The failure to apply for a temporary administrator, and to endeavor through him to give the notices required by the policy, and essential to perfect the cause of action, and then to have suit brought therefor within the period stipulated, was absolute and without excuse; and hence the plaintiff, upon the facts now presented, was not entitled to recover. The motion for a nonsuit, which raised generally or specifically all of the defenses discussed, should have been granted, because it affirmatively appeared that the conditions of the policy had not been complied with by "the insured."

The judgment of the appellate division not only sustained the exceptions taken by the defendant upon the trial, but also dismissed the complaint on the merits. This it had no power to do. The Code of Civil Procedure provides two methods of review by the appellate division before the entry of judgment, when the trial was before a jury. The first is authorized by § 1000, which permits the presiding judge, in his discretion, to order that the exceptions taken during the trial be heard in the first instance by the appellate division, and that judgment be suspended in the meantime. In such a case, as the section further provides, "the exceptions must be heard upon a motion for a new trial, which must be decided by the appellate division." The decision should either grant or deny the motion. If the exceptions were well taken, the motion should be granted, and the case sent back for a new trial. If the exceptions were not well taken, the motion should be denied, and judgment entered on the verdict or the order of nonsuit, as the case may be. Huda v. American Glucose Co. 151 N. Y. 549. The only function of the appellate division is to grant or deny the motion, and order judgment accordingly. It cannot go further, and dismiss the complaint on the merits, because the Code does not authorize it. The verdict or order is the authority for the entry of a final judgment, and, if the exceptions are not sustained, the judgment must be in favor of the party for whom the verdict was rendered, while, if the exceptions are sustained, there can be no final judgment, but simply the award of a new trial. The second method of reviewing before judgment is when a verdict is taken subject to the opinion of the court, as authorized by § 1185 of the Code. In such a case the motion is not for a new trial, but for judgment; and it may be made by either party before the appellate division, under § 1234. The decision of a motion of that kind necessarily involves a direction for judgment. As the case now before us arose under § 1000, the action of the learned appellate division in dismissing the complaint was inadvertent, and without authority.

The judgment appealed from should therefore be so modified as to sustain the defendant's exceptions, and order a new trial, and as so modified affirmed, with costs to abide event.

Andrews, Ch. J., and Gray, Bartlett, and Haight, JJ., concur.

Martin, J., dissenting:

In this case the cause of action did not accrue until after the death of the testatrix. At that time there was no person who was authorized to enforce or comply with the provisions and requirements of the policy. Until a representative of the estate of the testatrix was appointed, who was authorized to commence an action and perform the conditions of the policy, neither the contractual limitation commenced to run, nor was the previous non-performance of its condition a bar to the action. The fact that the appointment of a temporary administrator might have been applied for does not change the situation. Whether an administrator would be appointed rested wholly in the discretion of the surrogate, and no certainty that it would have been done existed at any time. The creditors and other persons interested in the estate were not required to make that experiment to protect their rights under the policy. I think the judgment should be reversed.

Charlotte v. Shepard, 120 N. C. 411.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the 15th of August, 1889, at an election held in Stanly county, a majority of the voters of the county cast their ballots in favor of subscription to the capital stock of the Yadkin Railroad Company to the amount of $100,000. Bonds of the county to that amount were issued in payment of the subscription, and delivered to the president of the company. The annual interest has been paid regularly, except that accruing on the 1st of July, 1897, which has been collected and is now in the hands of the defendant, who is the treasurer of the county, and who is about to pay it to the holders of the coupons. The plaintiffs, taxpayers of the county, and the board of commissioners, bring this action, alleging that the Acts of 1870-71, chap. 236, and the Acts of 1887, chap. 188, under which the commissioners attempted to act, and under which the election was held, were void, for the reason that they were not passed as required by § 14 of article 2 of the Constitution, and that the bonds were therefore illegally issued; and they pray that the treasurer of the county, the defendant, be perpetually enjoined from paying the sum now in his hands, or any other sums which may hereafter come into his hands, to the holders of the coupons. The matter was heard before Coble, J., and the restraining order therefore granted was continued, and the defendant enjoined from paying out the money in his hands until the final hearing of the case. The act of incorporation of the Yadkin Railroad Company (chapter 236 of the laws enacted by the general assembly of North Carolina at its session of 1870-71), in its 4th section, made provision for subscriptions to be made to the capital stock of the company by any county along the line of the road to such amount as a majority of the county commissioners might determine, subject to the approval of the qualified voters of the county; the commissioners, in order to pay the subscriptions, being empowered to issue bonds for that purpose, and to levy taxes to pay the bonds and interest upon them. Section 4 of the act of incorporation was amended by chapter 188 of the Laws of 1887, the amendment extending the privilege of subscribing for stock of the company to the towns and cities and townships along the line of the road, and requiring the subscriptions to be approved by a majority of the qualified voters of such cities, towns, and townships; and providing, further, that bonds should be issued in payment of said subscription and taxes levied to pay the same, principal and interest, according to the terms and conditions of said bonds, and that the board of commissioners of the county should issue the bonds, and levy the taxes to pay the township subscriptions. Section 14 of article 2 of the Constitution ordains that "no law shall be passed to raise money on the credit of the state or to pledge the faith of the state, directly or indirectly, for the payment of any debt, or to impose any tax upon the people of the state, or to allow the counties, cities, or towns to do so, unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, and passed three several readings, which readings shall have been on three different days, and agreed to by each house respectively, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third reading of the bill shall have been entered on the journal." The plaintiffs were allowed to produce copies of the house journal, certified to by the secretary of state, to show that the above-mentioned acts were not passed by the general assembly in accordance with the requirements of the Constitution. That journal showed that the bill which became chapter 236 of the Laws of 1870-71, was introduced on the 31st of March, 1871, and referred to the committee on internal improvements; that it was reported favorably on the next day; and that on the 8d of April, two days after its introduction, it passed its second and third readings; and that there was no entry of the yeas and nays on either of its readings. From that journal it appears that the bill which was enacted into chapter 188 of the Laws of 1887 passed its second reading on February 26, and that the yeas and nays were called on that reading and entered on the journal; that the bill passed its third reading on the 28th of February, but the yeas and nays were not entered on the journal on that reading. We are of the opinion that it was competent to introduce the house journal as proof that the acts referred to were not passed according to the requirements of the Constitution and they establish that fact. That provision of the Constitution (§ 14 of art. 2) is mandatory as we have decided in Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 84 L. R. A. 487. It is the protection which the people in convention have thrown around themselves for the benefit of the minority as well as the majority. The object of the provision was to prevent hasty and ill-advised legislation by means of which the people might be deprived of their property, not for the ordinary expenses of government, but by special taxation, for enterprises ostensibly in the name of the public good, but which might prove sources of individual injustice and injury. When indebtedness of the kind mentioned in the provision is sought to be incurred, the people have said in that provision that their legislative body, whenever considering the propriety of authorizing it, shall be not only careful, but deliberate; that the bill shall be read three several times, and pass three several readings, and that no two readings of the bill shall be had on the same day, and that the names of the legislators who vote on the question shall be known to the people in the enrolment of their names on the journal. It is a reasonable requirement, too, especially serviceable to those who are property holders and taxpayers, and the information is easy to be had, by all who may be interested, for § 16 of the same article of the Constitution ordains that each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, which shall be printed and made public immediately after the adjournment of the general assembly. Therefore it is clear that in legislation in reference to raising money on the credit of the state, or pledging its faith to the payment of debt, or imposing any tax on the people of the state, or allowing the counties, cities, or towns to do so, the Constitution itself ordains that such legislation is void, unless the bills have passed three separate readings, on three different days, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third readings shall have been entered on the journal. The bill may, in point of fact, have been read three several times, and on three different days, and the yeas and nays may have been actually called on the second and third readings, and the presiding officers may have certified thereto, and yet, if the entry of the yeas and nays is not actually made on the journal, the Constitution, speaking with absolute clearness, says that the failure of such entry is absolutely fatal to the validity of the act. The entry showing who voted on the bill, and how they voted, must be made before the bill can ever become a law. The Constitution does not allow the certificate of the presiding officers, or any other power, to cure such an omission. The certificate of these officers will be taken as conclusive of the several readings in ordinary legislation, even if it could be made to appear that the journals were silent in reference thereto, because, in ordinary legislation, the directions of the Constitution are not a condition precedent to the validity of the act. But in that class of legislation, the purpose of which is to legislate under § 14 of article 2 of the Constitution, a literal compliance with the language of that section is a condition precedent, and one which must be performed in its entirety before the bill can ever become a law. This point, however, has been so recently and so thoroughly discussed in the case of Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487, that it will be unprofitable to enter into another protracted discussion of it here. The authorities there cited are numerous, and most of them directly in point.

This case is clearly to be distinguished from that of Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 228, 28 L. R. A. 737, and the difference cannot be pointed out more clearly than was done by Clark, J., who delivered the opinion in Union 89 L. R. A.

Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487, in the following language: "This case has no analogy to Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 228, 28 L. R. A. 737. That merely holds that, when an act is certified to by the speakers as having been ratified, it is conclusive of the fact that it was read three several times in each house, and ratified. Const. art. 2, § 28. And so it is here; the certificate of the speakers is conclusive that this act passed three several readings in each house, and was ratified. The certificate goes no further. It does not certify that this act was read three several days in each house, and that the yeas and nays were entered on the journals. The journals were in evidence, and showed affirmatively the contrary. The people had the power to protect themselves by requiring in the organic law something further, as to acts authorizing the creation of bonded indebtedness by the state and its counties, cities, and towns, than the fact certified to by the speakers of three readings in each house, and ratification. This organic provision plainly requires, for the validity of this class of legislation, in addition to the certificates of the speakers, which are sufficient for ordinary legislation, the entry of the yeas and nays on the journals on the second and third reading in each house. It is provided that such laws are 'no laws,' i. e. are void, unless the bill for the purpose shall have been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, and passed three several readings, which readings shall have been on three different days, and agreed to by each house, respectively, and unless the yeas and nays on the second and third reading of the bill shall have been entered on the journal." But the defendant, for his protection, presents the view that, even if it be conceded that the acts above referred to were not passed according to the requirements of the Constitution, and for that reason might be held void by this court, yet the commissioners of the county had the right to submit the question of subscription, embracing the question of issue of bonds and the levy of taxes to pay the same, principal and interest, to the voters of the county, and upon approval by a majority of the qualified voters to issue the bonds under §§ 1996-2000 of the Code. All the sections of the Code were enacted by having been read three several times in each house of the general assembly, having passed three several readings on three different days in either house, the yeas and nays on the second and third reading having been entered on the journals of the senate and house of representatives, respectively.

But did the sections above mentioned give additional and complete authority to order the election, issue the bonds, and levy the taxes to pay them, principal and interest? Section 1996 is in these words: "The boards of commissioners of the several counties shall have power to subscribe stock to any railroad company or companies when necessary to aid in the completion of any railroad in which the citizens of the county may have an interest." It will be necessary, in order that that section may be construed to give authority to the commissioners to issue the bonds, that the language should include a railroad not begun to be built before the subscription was made; that the word "completion" should be construed "building" or "construction," extending even to the building of a new road; for in the case before us it appears that the road had not begun to be built. We cannot see why the word "completion" should be thought to have been used by the legislators in any other sense than the one most usual and natural. Ordinarily, the words "to complete" are understood to mean "to finish," "to fulfil," and the word "completion" to mean the "finishing" or "accomplishing in full" of something which has already been commenced; as, for instance, it is most frequent to hear the word "completion" used in connection with the finishing years and months of the education of the young. It is said of the young man or the young woman that he or she has gone for this year or this session to a certain university for the completion of his or her education; the training or educational process having been going on for years. If there is uncertainty as to the meaning of the word "completion," as used in § 1996 of the Code, we might invoke the aid of § 4 (formerly 5) of article 5 of the Constitution, in its analogy to the Code section, to clear it up. The part of that section of the Constitution pertinent to this matter reads as follows: "And the general assembly shall have no power to give or lend the power of the state in aid of any person, association, or corporation, except to aid in the completion of such railroads as may be unfinished at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, or in which the state has a direct pecuniary interest, unless the subject be submitted to a direct vote of the people of the state, and be approved by a majority of those who shall vote thereon." Thus it appears that all gifts or loans by the state in aid of the completion of such railroads as had been begun, but which were unfinished, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or in which the state has a direct pecuniary interest, could be made valid by simple act of legislation. The act of 1868-69, chap. 171 (now §§ 1996-2000 of the Code), was enacted a few days more than a year after the ratification of the Constitution of 1868. It is most reasonable to conclude that the policy and purpose of both the constitutional provision and the statute were the same, the only difference being that, in case of state aid, no approval by a vote of the people was required, while a majority vote of the people was required in cases of county aid. The object of the statute must have been to provide by a general act means by which the counties, without special legislation for each county by separate bills, might be enabled to complete unfinished railroads in which the counties had a pecuniary interest. At the time of the enactment of the statute of 1868-69, and always since that time, any county of the state, duly observing the limitations of § 7 of article 7 of the Constitution, and under an act passed according to the requirements of § 14, article 2, of the Constitution, could and can subscribe to the capital stock of the railroad company, whether unfinished or to be begun. The act of 1868-69, however, considering the condition of affairs then existing,—that is, that there were counties which had a pecuniary interest in railroads that had been begun, but were unfinished,—enabled such counties to make subscriptions of bonds to complete such unfinished roads at the earliest moment, and with the least cost, by a general law passed according to § 14, article 2, of the Constitution. This reasoning leads us to the still further conclusion that at the time when the act of 1868-69 was brought forward in the Code, § 1996, and the four succeeding sections, it could have had reference to no cases except those where the counties had a pecuniary interest in unfinished railroads at the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, and that, therefore, the Code sections could not apply to the present case, because the Yadkin Railroad was not begun to be constructed until about 1889. We have given to the matters embraced in this case a patient and thorough consideration. We are aware of the hardships and losses that may follow from our decision, and we are also aware of the probable complaints likely to be made by persons interested. But the constitutional requirement which we have discussed is clear in its meaning and in its language, and it is also mandatory. We must obey it in our interpretation of its meaning. Investors in such securities, who may meet with losses, have no one to blame but themselves, for the journals of the general assembly are open to public inspection, and the Constitution of the state is a part of the public literature. The purchaser of real estate with us must look to the depository of his title for the security of his purchase, and so must the investors in our state and county and municipal bonds look to the Constitution and the laws for the safety of their investments. We find no error in the ruling of the court below.

Furches, J., concurring:

As I concurred in the opinion of the court in Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 787, and also in the opinion of the court in Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487; and as it was claimed on the argument in this case that the two opinions were in conflict and could not stand together, I propose, in addition to the well-considered opinion of Justice Montgomery, to say briefly what seems to me to constitute the distinction between the two cases.

The power to legislate is not conferred on the general assembly by the Constitution. This it has without an express delegation of power. There are instances where the legislature is commanded to legislate; but these are the exception to the general rule, and have nothing to do with the act we are considering. The most of the provisions of the Constitution with regard to legislation are restraints upon its power. The act considered in the case of Carr v. Coke was passed under the general and inherent right to legislate. This being so, it fell under the general parliamentary law of authentication, and the signature of the presiding officers was final. But the act now under consideration was passed under one of the restrictions or prohibitions placed upon the legislature by the Constitution (art. 2, § 14), which provides "that no law shall be passed to raise money on the credit of the state, etc., unless it be read on three several days in each house, and on the two last readings the yeas and nays are taken and recorded; and this rule applies to counties, town, cities, etc. It must be admitted that the Constitution might have prohibited the legislature from passing any act to lend its credit, or to authorize any county or town to do so. Suppose, then, that the Constitution had prohibited the enactment of any such law, but, notwithstanding this inhibition, the legislature had passed such an act, and the presiding officers had signed and ratified it, should the courts have gone on, and enforced this act, because it had passed, and been ratified by the presiding officers of the two houses? And, if not, why should this act be enforced, passed in a way in which the Constitution says it shall not be passed, so as to authorize a county to raise money upon its credit? Suppose the legislature should pass an act providing for the payment of the special tax bonds, or the interest thereon, and the bill should be signed and ratified by the presiding officers of each body of the general assembly, should this court enforce this act? I must suppose that the answer to this proposition would be "No;" that the Constitution prohibits the legislature from passing such an act. And, if such an act as this could not be enforced because the Constitution prohibits its enactment, it would be difficult to draw the distinction, and to see how we could enforce this act, passed in a way the Constitution says it should not be passed. I have had trouble in coming to the conclusion that we, as a co-ordinate department of the government, could look to the manner of its passage. But, upon further consideration of the matter, I have come to the conclusion that these rules, preventing us from looking behind the ratification, are only applicable to acts passed under the general power of legislation. The precedents I have examined grew out of legislation under the general unrestricted power as to legislation. To adopt this rule with regard to restricted or prohibited powers, would be, in effect, to destroy these restrictions, these wise and beneficial provisions of the Constitution. In this, it seems to me, lies the distinction between Carr v. Coke and Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. and this case falls under the rule governing in Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs.

It is claimed that this is an act of repudiation on the part of plaintiffs and repudiation is not more distasteful to anyone than it is to me. And it may be, in a moral sense, repudiation, but it cannot be in law, as the plaintiffs were never legally bound for these bonds.

Clark, J., concurring:

So far from the decision in Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 787, conflicting with the decision of this case, it is the strongest vindication of the wisdom and necessity of placing article 2, § 14, in the Constitution. In Carr v. Coke the majority of the court felt constrained to hold that a bill of a general legislative nature, and not imposing a tax, when authenticated by the certificate and signatures of the speakers, could not be impeached, though it was averred in the complaint, and shown by the journals, that such bill had in fact been tabled on the second reading in the house in which it had been introduced, and consequently had not reached the other house at all. This being so, if the people should desire by constitutional amendment, or by a provision inserted by a constitutional convention, to require other safeguards of the actual passage of laws than the signatures of the speakers, can there be any doubt that they have the power to do so? Now, as to the passage of the class of bills specified in § 14, article 2, they had the foresight to do this very thing, and to require additional guaranties by providing that such bills should not become laws unless read on three different days in each house, and unless "the yeas and nays on the second and third readings shall have been entered on the journal," which journal § 16 of the same article requires to be "printed and made public immediately after the adjournment of the general assembly." As to such matters, in which great amounts of money are at stake, the public were not willing to run the risk of bills being palmed off as statutes through the inadvertence of the speakers or the venality of clerks of the general assembly, without having in fact been enacted. These additional requirements are not mere technicalities, but indispensable safeguards, which experience has caused to be inserted in the Constitutions of many of the states to protect the public against the grossest abuses in the creation of indebtedness or authorizing taxation by the state, counties, and towns. Carr v. Coke holds that, as to bills not embraced in 12, article 2, the certificate of the speakers is conclusive evidence of passage, and the courts are powerless to go behind their signatures. The decision in this case holds that, as to the class of bills referred to in § 14, such certificate is expressly made not sufficient, and the bills are not laws unless the additional requirements of that section appear by the journal to have been complied with. There is no conflict between the two decisions, and this has heretofore been pointed out in Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 34 L. R. A. 487.

Fairecloth, Ch. J., dissenting:

The facts are stated in the opinion of the majority of the court and I will simply state my position briefly. My reasoning is stated in Carr v. Coke, 116 N. C. 223, 28 L. R. A. 787. In that case it was held that, where a bill had been duly signed by the presiding officers of the assembly, the court cannot go behind such ratification to inquire how the bill was passed. The ratification is a record, and concludes the matter. It does not certify that the bill was read three times or a less number of times. Omnia præsumuntur, etc. It is argued, however, that the case above stated applies when the assembly is legislating under its inherent power, unrestricted by the Constitution, and that that principle does not apply when legislating under restricted clauses of the Constitution, as in this case, under article 2, § 14; i. e. that in one instance the ratification is a record, and conclusive, and in the other instance the ratification means nothing, because one section of the Constitution is restrictive, and the other is not. I cannot reach that conclusion. Article 2, § 14, saying that no law shall be passed to allow counties, etc., to raise money on their credit, etc., unless the bill shall have been read three times, etc., is a restriction directed to the legislature, and no such indebtedness can be imposed except by a majority vote of the taxpayers at the ballot box. That article and section do not declare that any legislative act under it is void, but leaves much to the judgment and discretion of the legislature. But is the distinction well taken? Article 2, § 12, declares that "the general assembly shall not pass any private law unless it shall be made to appear that thirty days' notice of the application to pass such a law shall have been given, under such direction and in such manner as shall be provided by law." This is a restrictive clause, and yet in Brodnax v. Groom, 64 N. C. 244, it was held by this court that, if a private act for the purpose of levying a special tax for the county be certified by the presiding officers of the two branches of the legislature as duly ratified, it is not competent for the judiciary to go behind such record, and inquire collaterally whether the thirty days' notice of an application therefor, required by the Constitution, had been given. Pearson, Ch. J., said: "We do not think it necessary to enter into the question, whether this is a public local act, or a mere private act, in regard to which thirty days' notice of the application must be given; for taking it to be a mere private act, we are of opinion that the ratification certified by the lieutenant governor, and speaker of the house of representatives, makes it a 'matter of record,' which cannot be impeached before the courts in a collateral way, Lord Coke says, 'A record, until reversed, importeth verity.' There can be no doubt that acts of the legislature, like judgments of courts, are matters of record, and the idea that the 'verity of the record' can be averred against in a collateral proceeding, is opposed to all of the authorities." The courts must act on the maxim, Omnia præsumuntur, etc. And so, if the distinction is sought to be applied to the many sections of the Constitution on various subjects, whether restrictive or general, the law might change as each case was presented. The legislature has a general power to levy and raise taxes. Const. art. 5, § 1. When the power of taxation is conferred, it is difficult for the courts to enforce restraints imposed by the Constitution upon the procedure of the legislature in passing the necessary laws for the exercise of the power. That is saying to a co-ordinate branch of the government, "You have not done your work or duty with a proper degree of precision, and we will declare it void." When the prohibition is absolute, then the courts may declare the result void, not on the ground of irregularity in the legislative proceedings, but because the power does not exist, whether the proceedings were regular or irregular. For instance, article 1, § 6, declares that "the state shall never assume or pay or authorize the collection of any debt or obligation, express or implied, incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States," unless the proposition to pay such debt shall be submitted to the people, and ratified by them by the vote of a majority of all the qualified voters of the state, at a regular election held for that purpose. Here we find a restriction, not on the procedure of a co-ordinate branch, but an absolute prohibition and denial of power, which the courts can see on the face of the Constitution, without looking at the journals of the assembly, and without impeaching the record of ratification. It is argued that the legislative journals are public documents, and open to the inspection of the purchasers of the bonds in question. That is true, and it is equally true that they were open to the plaintiffs and the taxpayers of Stanly county when they held forth these bonds to the public, and received the money for them, and invested the same for the permanent improvement and benefit of their county. They have recognized and paid the annual interest on their bonds for several years without objection, and it is possible that they never discovered the absence of the words "yea" and "nay" on the journals until since the decision of this court in Union Bank v. Oxford Comrs. 119 N. C. 214, 84 L. R. A. 487. I think the true principle is found in the first two cases cited supra.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

P. W. MURPHY, Appt.,

v.

City of SAN LUIS GBISPO et al., Respts.

(.....Cal.....)

1. Bonds may be made payable in gold coin only, under the act of March 19, 1889, as amended in 1898, giving power to issue municipal bonds "payable in gold coin or lawful money," as this, to have any effect, must be construed—especially in view of other provisions of the statute—to give the city the option to make them payable in gold coin alone or in lawful money.

2. A requirement of an ordinance that a vote for or against a bond proposition shall be indicated by writing or causing to be written or printed the word "Yes" or "No" on the right-hand margin of the ticket opposite the proposition, is mandatory, when the ordinance is authorized by and has the force of a statute, and therefore it is insufficient to mark a cross after the word "Yes" or "No" when both those words are printed opposite the proposition.

3. The alternative of making interest payable annually or semiannually need not be submitted to the voters on an election respecting the issue of municipal bonds under the act of March 19, 1889, § 3, requiring a notice of the election, the purpose and charac-

(January 18, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Luis Obispo County in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the negotiation of certain bonds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Graves & Graves for appellant.

Mr. W. H. Spencer, for respondents:

The adoption of one or the other kind of currency involves the exercise of business judgment and sagacity, which may vary with time and circumstances. It is wiser, therefore, to leave to the local communities whose interests are most deeply concerned, the privilege of taking advantage of opportunities, and of legislating for themselves on this subject.

Fareon v. Louisville Sinking Fund Comrs. 97 Ky. 119.

Effect is to be given to every phrase and every word in the statute, if it be possible, and no clause or word is to be treated as redundant.

It was certainly competent for the board to prescribe that the method of voting should be according to the general election law of the state, without reciting its provisions. The voters being familiar with this mode of voting, there can be no question they understood the significance of the stamp, and intended to cast their votes exactly as they did.

Clearly the ordinance contemplated that the tickets should be printed and furnished to the voter, and that he should indicate his wish by depositing the ballots so printed in the ballot box. And the form of the ticket required that he should declare his vote on the propositions submitted by adopting in some appropriate manner the "Yes" or "No" already printed on the tickets. By placing or stamping an X, in conformity with the manner of voting under the general election law, he followed strictly the ordinance.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The board of trustees of the city of San Luis Obispo, having advertised for the sale of certain bonds of the city for the purpose of paying the cost of certain municipal improvements authorized by the voters under the provisions of act March 19, 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 399), the plaintiff, a taxpayer of the city, brought the present action to enjoin the sale of the bonds, and the levy and collection of any taxes for their payment, upon the ground that their issuance was illegal. The superior court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed therefrom. The notice of appeal states that an appeal is also taken from an order denying a new trial, but the record does not contain such order, nor does it appear therefrom that a new trial was ever asked for or denied.

The appellant presents three grounds upon which he contends that the issuance of the bonds is illegal, viz.: First, that the bonds are made payable in gold coin of the United States, instead of being made "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States;" second, that at the election upon the question of their issuance the votes were not cast in accordance with the terms of the ordinance by which the question was submitted; third, that the question whether the interest on the bonds should be paid annually or semiannually was not submitted to the voters.

1. Section 6, act March 19, 1889 (Stat. 1889, p. 401), provides: "All municipal bonds for public improvements issued under the provisions of this act shall be of a character of bonds known as serials, and shall be payable in the manner following: [Providing for the denominations of the bonds, and that one twentieth of the issue must be paid in each year, but making no provision in reference to the times for the payment of interest.] Such bonds may be issued and sold by the legislative branch of the city, town, or municipal corporation as they may determine, at not less than their face value, in gold coin of the United States," etc. This section was amended in 1893 (Stat. 1893, p. 61), making the first sentence to read as follows: "All municipal bonds for public improvements issued under the provisions of this act shall be of the character of bonds known as serials, and shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States in the manner following;" and also directing that one fortieth of the issue must be paid in each year, and also that the interest "may be payable annually or semiannually."

The notice under the ordinance calling the special election for the purpose of authorizing the issuance of the bonds in question stated: "The character of said bonds will be what is known as 'serial,' and will be payable in gold coin of the United States, in the manner following: [Providing for distributing their payment over a period of forty years.] The rate of interest to be paid on said bonds will be 5 per cent per annum." The ordinance creating the indebtedness and providing for the issuance and sale of the bonds, which was passed subsequent to the election, provided: "The character of said bonds shall be what is known as 'serial,' and the same shall be payable in gold coin of the United States, in the manner following;" and further provided: "Each of said bonds shall be dated the 6th day of January, 1896, shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum from said date, and to each of said bonds shall be attached as many interest coupons as it may have years to mature, each coupon to be for one year's interest on the bond to which it is attached, one of which coupons on each and every of said bonds shall be payable on the 6th day of January, 1897, and one on the same day of said month of each succeeding year until all are paid."

Under the terms of the original act the municipality was not required to designate any kind of money in which the bonds should be payable, and, in the absence of such designation in the bonds, could at their maturity elect to pay them in any medium that might then be lawful money or legal tender. Whether the municipality had the power to designate in the bonds any specific kind of money in which they should be payable was an unsettled question. It had been held in Judson v. Bessemer, 87 Ala. 240, 4 L. R. A. 742, that the municipality possessed such power, while in Woodruff v. State, 66 Miss. 298, it had been held that such act was ultra vires, and that the bonds were void. The reversal of this case by the Supreme Court of the United States (162 U. S. 299, 40 L. ed. 975), was upon a point which left the question undetermined by that tribunal. It has since been held by the supreme court of Kentucky in Farson v. Louisville Sinking Fund Comrs. 97 Ky. 119, that under a statute authorizing a municipality to issue a bonded indebtedness, which is silent as to the kind of currency or money in which it is to be payable, the municipality may make the bonds payable in gold coin. Experience had shown that if bonds are made payable in a currency of fluctuating value they are less readily negotiated than if the lender or investor knows in advance the precise kind of money in which they will be paid. Under this condition of the law as it had then been expounded, and with the universal experience in financial transactions, and doubtless in consequence thereof, the legislature in 1898 amended the statute by giving to the municipality the right to designate at the issuance of the bonds the specific kind of money in which they should be paid. It is to be assumed that the amendment was for the purpose of remedying some defect in the original act, but if the defect in the original act was a want of power in the municipality to issue its bonds payable in any specific kind of money, as had been held by the supreme court of Mississippi, this defect would not be obviated if the statute required them to be "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." In the absence of any limitation upon the mode of payment, they would be payable in any lawful money of the United States, and, as a provision in the bonds giving to the municipality the alternative of paying them in gold coin or in lawful money of the United States would create no obligation upon it to make the payment in gold coin, it follows that the "lawful money" in which they would be paid would be that kind which the municipality would elect at their maturity, and, consequently, the kind which at that date would have the least value. It cannot be held that the words, "shall be payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," were inserted in the statute merely for the purpose of declaring that the municipality should have the option, at the maturity of the bonds, to pay them in gold coin, or in lawful money, since it needed no legislative declaration to give it that option. The fact that they were payable in money would itself confer upon it that privilege; and, as such a construction of the statute would destroy any efficacy in the amendment, it ought not to be given unless required by its terms. It is not so indicated in specific language, and, as its language will permit a construction by which the municipality may determine in advance whether the bonds shall be payable specifically in gold coin, or generally in lawful money of the United States, a consideration of the purposes of the statute and the objects to be effected by it justifies us in giving it this construction.

The purpose of the legislature in enacting the statute in question was to enable the municipalities of the state to acquire or construct certain municipal improvements which the public interest or necessity might demand, the cost of which would be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income. Unless the bonds that are to be issued under the proceedings thus authorized can be negotiated, the municipality will be unable to acquire or construct the improvements, and the very purpose of the legislature will be defeated. The legislature must be assumed to have been familiar with the laws of trade and finance,—to have known that bonds payable in a fluctuating currency are less salable than if payable in gold coin. Guided by experience and the history of the last forty years, they were aware that obligations which were to run forty years in the future would be subject to the contingencies of a depreciated currency, and that in the light of this experience, capitalists and investors would decline to invest their money unless they could be assured that they would receive the value which they should give for the bonds. The bonds authorized by this act, when issued, become negotiable securities, and the subject of daily traffic in the commercial world, and any provision in them that impedes their free negotiability destroys their value, and prevents the municipality from effecting a sale in accordance with the terms of the act. The requirement in the statute that the bonds shall be sold "at not less than their face value in gold coin of the United States," would prevent the sale of a single bond whose payment at maturity could be made, at the option of the maker, in such currency as it might then elect, and thus the very object of the statute would be destroyed. The recognized standard of value in this state is gold coin, and as this is the only kind of money which the legislature has authorized to be received upon a sale of the bonds, and has required them to be sold for not less than their face value, it must be held that it was the intention of the legislature that they might be made payable in gold coin.

There is an additional consideration which lends weight to this construction of the intention of the legislature by this amendment. By an act passed March 15, 1888 (Stat. 1888, p. 370), certain incorporated cities were authorized to refund their indebtedness by issuing new bonds therefor. The form of the bond was prescribed by the statute, and made payable in "dollars," without designating any kind of money. On the same day that the aforesaid amendment to the act of March 19, 1889, was passed the legislature amended the act of March 15, 1888 (Stat. 1888, p. 59), by giving authority to those cities to refund their indebtedness and issue serial bonds therefor, to run for forty years, "principal and interest being payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States;" and also providing that the bonds should be sold for not less than their face value, "in the same character of money in which they were payable." The provision in this statute that the bonds shall be payable in gold coin or in lawful money of the United States, as in the statute under consideration, and the further provision in that statute that they should be sold for their face value "in the same character of money in which they were payable," clearly indicate that the municipality should exercise its option for the mode of their payment at the issuance of the bonds, and not at their maturity, and that the bonds themselves should be payable in the kind of money for which they were to be sold. The same provision in § 6 of the act under consideration, coupled with the provision that the bonds are to be sold for gold coin at not less than their face value, carries with it the same intention of the legislature that the bond may be made payable in gold coin. See Sutherland, Stat. Constr. §§ 284, 288. In the case of Skinner v. Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 465, 29 L. R. A. 512, cited by appellant, the ordinance calling the election as well as the notice of election, described the bonds as "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States," with interest payable "annually" at a place to be fixed by the city council, while the bonds which the council proposed to sell were made payable "in gold coin," with interest payable "semiannually" in the city of New York, and it was held that the bonds in this form, not having been authorized by the voters of the city, would be invalid. Whether, if the ordinance had provided that the bonds should be issued "payable in gold coin," its approval by the voters would have authorized the issuance of such bonds, was not before the court for decision or discussed in its opinion. The only bonds which the voters had approved were to be "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States,"—that is, as we have seen above, payable in such money as the city might elect at their maturity, and it was held that the city could not be made liable for bonds payable in gold coin, as that would impose upon it a burden which the voters had never authorized.

2. Section 2 of the act of March 19, 1889, provides that the ordinance calling a special election "shall fix the day on which such special election shall be held, the manner of holding such election, and the voting for or against incurring such indebtedness; such election shall be held as provided by law for holding such election in such city, town, or municipal corporation." The ordinance in the present case stated (§ 6): "The manner of holding said election shall be as follows: (1) As provided by law for holding elections in said city; (2) as provided by the general election laws of this state, except where such general laws may conflict with the state law for elections of the kind hereby called, or with this or any ordinance; and, (3) as provided for in this ordinance." It was further provided in this section of the ordinance: "Tickets must be of ordinary election ticket paper, 6×12 inches; the heading of such ticket must be: 'Bond Election, City of San Luis Obispo.' Each proposition set forth in § 2 of this ordinance shall be voted on separately, and must be printed on such tickets as follows: 1. Bonding for city waterworks, $90,000.00. 2. Bonding for sewer improvements, $34,500.00. Each voter shall indicate his wish by writing or causing to be written or printed, 'Yes' or 'No' on the right-hand margin on his ticket, opposite the proposition on which he may desire to vote." At the election which was held under this notice more than two thirds of the voters that voted indicated their wishes by voting a ticket in the following form:

MUNICIPAL TICKET.

BOND ELECTION.

City of San Luis Obispo.

To vote for or against a proposition, stamp a cross (X) in the square at the right.

1	Bonding for City Water Works, $90,000.00.	YES.	X
2	Bonding for City Water Works, $90,000.00.	NO.
3	Bonding for Sewer Improvements, $34,500.00.	YES.	X
4	Bonding for Sewer Improvements, $34,500.00.	NO.

—And indicated their wishes in no other way than by stamping a cross opposite the propositions on said ticket. Whether the proposition to issue the bonds was legally adopted depends upon whether the ballots thus cast should have counted in its favor.

The provisions of the Political Code which are applicable to elections of officers are not by any statute made applicable to elections of the character under consideration, and we have not been cited to any special statute on the subject governing elections in the city of San Luis Obispo. It will be observed that by the terms of the ordinance the general election law of the state is applicable only where it is not in conflict with the mode pointed out in the ordinance, and that the provisions of the ordinance control unless they are in conflict with some of the provisions of the general law. It follows that the statutory provisions requiring the city to fix by its ordinance the manner of holding the election, and the voting for and against it, is the rule by which the voters are to act in voting upon the question. This ordinance, having been passed by virtue of the statute authorizing it, has the force of a statute, and is to be construed with the same effect as if its terms had been prescribed by an act of the legislature.

It is urged by the appellant that the manner of voting which was prescribed in the ordinance calling the election was mandatory upon the voters, and that, as this manner was not observed, the election was invalid. Whether the forms prescribed for holding an election are mandatory or directory, and whether their observance is essential to the validity of the election, depend upon the character of the acts prescribed. In Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 29 L. R. A. 673, Mr. Justice Henshaw stated the rule as follows: "It is the rule that mandatory provisions for the holding of an election must be followed, or the failure will vitiate it, while the departure from the terms of a directory provision will not render it void in the absence of a further showing that the result of the election has been changed or the rights of the voters injuriously affected thereby. . . . But the rule as to directory provisions applies only to minor and unsubstantial departures therefrom. There may be such radical omissions and failures to comply with the essential terms of a directory provision as will lead to the conclusive presumption that the injury must have followed." In Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 898, it was held that, if the requirements of the statute which it is within the power of the elector to control are wilfully disregarded, his vote should be rejected; and in Lay v. Parsons, 104 Cal. 661, it was held that the specific directions to the voter as to the mode in which he shall mark his ballot are mandatory, and cannot be disregarded. In the absence of any direction, the manner in which the voter is to indicate his wish may be immaterial, so long as his wish can be ascertained; but when the mode of its indication has been prescribed by authority of law, the form becomes a matter of substance, and courts are not authorized to say that it may be disregarded, and that the wish of the voter may be determined by conjecture. Whatever the statute requires the form to be is mandatory. In the present case it may be a reasonable conjecture that the votes cast in the above form were intended to be in favor of the issuance of the bonds, but it is still only a matter of conjecture. If the voters had drawn a line through the "Yes" it might be supposed that they intended to vote against their issuance, but, if instead of drawing a line through the "Yes" they had stamped an "X" directly upon it, it would be uncertain whether they intended in this mode to indicate an affirmative vote, or to have it counted as a negative. It is equally a matter of conjecture, though perhaps with less uncertainty, where the "X" has been placed at the side of the "Yes" rather than upon it. Let it be supposed that, with the direction which was given in the ordinance for the mode of voting, 500 ballots had been cast, of which 100 were marked in this mode, 100 with a line drawn through the "Yes," 100 with a line drawn through the "No," 100 with the "X" stamped upon the "Yes," and 100 with the words "For the bonds" written upon the ticket; could it be said that the board would be authorized to declare that the election had resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds, or that there was anything more than conjecture as to the wishes of the voters? The only safe rule is to hold the specific directions to be mandatory, and that the manifest disregard of them by the voter renders his vote nugatory. The notice which was printed upon the tickets that were used by the voters, "To vote for or against a proposition, stamp an 'X' in the square at the right," was unauthorized, and gave to the voters no right to disregard the manner of voting which was directed by the ordinance calling the election. That direction in the ordinance was clear and unambiguous, and it must be held that, as it was disregarded, the election was invalid.

8. It was not necessary that the alternative of making the interest payable annually or semiannually should be submitted to the voters. Section 3 of the act requires the legislative body, after the ordinance has been published two weeks, to publish a "notice of such special election, the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of the tax levy to be made for the payment thereof;" but makes no requirement with reference to the publication of the times at which the interest is payable. The indebtedness cannot be incurred without the assent of two thirds of the qualified electors of the city voting at an election for that purpose (Const. art. 11, § 15); but it is not requisite under this provision, or the aforesaid statute, that the voters shall determine in the first instance whether the interest shall be paid annually or semiannually. The amount of the bonds and the rate of interest constitute the indebtedness proposed to be incurred, and upon which the voters are to exercise their wishes; but, as the city council is to determine in the first instance the rate of interest which the bonds are to bear, it may also in the first instance determine whether the interest shall be payable annually or semiannually. Its determination upon this point may be stated in the proposition to the voters as readily as the rate of interest. The ordinance herein stated in sufficient terms that the interest was to be paid annually.

The judgment is reversed.

✓ We concur: Henshaw, J.; Temple, J.; Garoutte, J.; McFarland, J.; Van Fleet, J.

Beatty, Ch. J., concurring:

I concur. This case certainly reverses one point decided in Skinner v. Santa Rosa. But although the point was involved in that case it was not essential to the conclusion reached, which was fully sustained upon other grounds. And since the decision of that point cannot have given rise to any claim of vested right it ought to be set aside if erroneous. A comparison of the act of March 1, 1893 (Stat. 1893, p. 59), amending the act of March 15, 1883, with the act here in question which was passed on the same day, is conclusive as to the sense in which that legislature used the expression, "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." The same phrase must mean the same thing in both acts, and the former act shows clearly that the bonds were to be made payable specifically in gold coin or specifically in lawful money, and not in either at the option of the municipality. This construction also accords with the object of the amendment, which, as shown by Justice Harrison, would have been defeated by any other construction.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

Charles E. HOVEY, Survivor, etc., Appt.,
v.

George ELLIOTT et al., Exrs., etc., of John Elliott, Deceased, Resp't.

(145 N. Y. 126.)

1. Striking out a defendant's answer to punish him for contempt is not authorized by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725, which restricts such punishment to fine or imprisonment.
2. A judgment pro confesso after striking out defendant's answer to punish him for contempt, rendered by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which has, under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725, no power to impose such punishment for contempt, is void on collateral attack.

NOTE.—Decision against constitutional right as a nullity subject to collateral attack.—

- III. Judgment on unconstitutional contract.
- IV. Other cases.
- I. Denial of due process of law or other constitutional right of procedure.
 - a. In general.

In considering the principle on which the above decision of HOVEY v. ELLIOTT should be based, the first inquiry is whether a lack of jurisdiction is or is not the only ground on which a judgment can be held void upon collateral attack. Another ground is at least hinted at in some cases, and is the necessary logical basis for some decisions which are professedly based on a lack of jurisdiction, when in fact jurisdiction existed. By such decisions judgments denying a constitutional right have been held void on collateral attack when the courts rendering them really had jurisdiction. These cases are further discussed in the subsequent divisions of this note.

If the denial of a constitutional right was in itself a sufficient ground of collateral attack, this would be sufficient to sustain the case of HOVEY v. ELLIOTT and the other similar cases cited in this division. But these cases may quite fairly be based on the general doctrine as to the nullity of decisions when there was lack of jurisdiction to render them. It may be reasonably said that jurisdiction is abdicated or lost when the court strikes out a defendant's appearance and answer. This substantially says that to turn a defendant out of court after he has been duly brought in leaves the court without any more jurisdiction than it had before he was brought in.

Jurisdiction is the right to hear and determine, not to determine without hearing, and where no appearance is allowed there can be no hearing or opportunity of being heard, and therefore no exercise of jurisdiction. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914.

A judgment rendered without due process of law is held void on collateral attack by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hovey v. Elliott, 187 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215, affirming the main case. It is impliedly held that there was a lack of jurisdiction.

"A denial to a party of the benefit of a notice would be in effect to deny that he is entitled to notice at all, and the sham and deceptive proceeding

(February 26, 1895.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York affirming a judgment entered upon the report of a referee dismissing the complaint in an action brought to charge defendants as trustees of certain bonds which it was alleged their testator had purchased pendente lite. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

had better be omitted altogether. It would be like saying to a party, 'Appear, and you shall be heard,' and, when he has appeared, saying, 'Your appearance shall not be recognized, and you shall not be heard.'" Where the court in effect said this and immediately added a decree of condemnation reciting that the default of all persons had been duly entered, it was in fact a mere arbitrary edict clothed in the form of a judicial sentence. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914.

"Of what efficacy or avail was the summons to appear when the court which issued the summons rendered its judgment upon the theory that the summons was ineffectual, and that the defendant had no right either to appear or be heard in his defense?" Hovey v. Elliott, 187 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215.

The fundamental conception of a court of justice is condemnation only after hearing. To say that courts have inherent power to deny all right to defend an action, and to render decrees without any hearing whatever, is, in the very nature of things, to convert the court exercising such an authority into an instrument of wrong and oppression, and hence to strip it of that attribute of justice upon which the exercise of judicial power necessarily depends. Hovey v. Elliott, 187 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215.

The denial to a party of the right to appear is in legal effect the recall of the citation to him. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914; Hovey v. Elliott, 187 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215.

A forfeiture or confiscation of the property of a person in rebellion, made by sentence of the court in a judicial proceeding to which the owner appeared by counsel and answered, was held void on collateral attack where his answer was stricken from the files on the ground that he was an enemy and within the Confederate lines. Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914. This decision was collaterally attacked in an action of ejectment.

A sentence of condemnation and sale was also held, in Underwood v. McVeigh, 23 Gratt. 409, to be void for refusal to permit the defendant to be heard. The court says it was "a nullity—void in toto. It was rendered absolutely void by the act of the court in refusing to permit McVeigh to appear and be heard. The authorities on this point are overwhelming, and the decisions of all the tribunals of every country where an enlightened jurisprudence prevails are all one way. It lies at the very foundation of justice, that every person who is to be affected by an adjudication should have the opportunity of being heard in defense, both in repelling the allegations of fact and upon the matters of law; and no sentence of any court is entitled to the least respect in any other court, or elsewhere, when it has been pronounced ex parte and without opportunity of defense."

Mr. Herbert B. Titus, with Mr. Frederick S. Duncan, for appellant:

A judgment can be attacked collaterally in another state only on the ground of want of jurisdiction over the parties, or over the subject-matter, or that it is not responsive to the issues tendered by the pleadings.

If the decree in Hovey v. McDonald was assailable, the remedy of the defendants was by direct review in the Supreme Court of the United States. Having failed to pursue that remedy, they and their privies are now estopped from collateral attack upon the decree.

994; Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 808, 19 L. ed. 981; Voorhees v. Jackson, Bank of United States, 85 U. S. 10 Pet. 449, 9 L. ed. 490; *Des Moines Nav. & R. Co. v. S. 2 Pet. 168, 7 L. ed. 388; Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 193, 7 L. ed. 650; McCormick v. Sullivan, 23 U. S. 10 Wheat. 192, 6 L. ed. 800; Nash v. Williams, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 226, 22 L. ed. 254; Kempe v. Kennedy, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 173, 8 L. ed. 70; Skullern v. May, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 267, 8 L. ed. 220; Nougué v. Clapp, 101 U. S. 551, 25 L. ed. 1026; Huling v. Kaw Valley R. & Improv. Co. 180 U. S. 559, 32 L. ed. 1045; Graham v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 118 U. S. 161, 30 L. ed. 196; Ex parte Bigelow, 118 U. S. 828, 28 L. ed. 1005.

So, in Henry v. Carson, 96 Ind. 412, it was held that even if the court acquires jurisdiction, its judgment was unauthorized by law where, after defendant had appeared and filed an answer, his appearance and answer were stricken out and judgment rendered against him by default, on the ground that there was no affidavit of his loyalty. The court says: "The effect of the ruling was that although an alleged traitor, when prosecuted, was entitled to a notice requiring him to appear, yet if he should appear he could not be heard in defense."

"The doctrine that when a court has once acquired jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which arises in the cause, and that its judgment, however erroneous, cannot be collaterally assailed 'is only correct where the court proceeds, after acquiring jurisdiction of the cause, according to the established modes governing the class to which the case belongs, and does not transcend, in the extent or character of its judgment, the law which is applicable to it.'" Henry v. Carson, 96 Ind. 412. Citing Windsor v. McVeigh, 98 U. S. 274, 23 L. ed. 914.

But a judgment of a justice of the peace rendered with the statement that "the court being of the opinion that the defendant could not tender an issue until his answer was verified, refused to hear evidence in support thereof; and being well and sufficiently advised in the premises" proceeded to render judgment," was held valid on collateral attack, in Carolan v. Carolan, 47 Ark. 511, as the court says the record does not show an absolute refusal to permit the defendant to appear and defend. It adds: "The justice was in error in striking out the defendant's answer and in refusing to hear his defense without a written or verified answer; but a justice of the peace has the right to determine every question that arises in a cause pending in his court that a superior court has under like circumstances; and when he errs in his conclusions upon the law, the judgments of his court are no more open to attack than those of the circuit court."

In discussing the void character of a judgment rendered without due process of law, the court, in Hovey v. Elliott, 167 U. S. 409, 42 L. ed. 215, says: "Can it be doubted that due process of law signifies a right to be heard in one's defense? If the legislative department of the government were to enact a statute conferring the right to condemn the citizen without any opportunity whatever of being heard, would it be pretended that such an enactment would not be violative of the Constitution? If this be true, as it undoubtedly is, how can it be said that the judicial department, the source and fountain of justice itself, has yet the authority to render lawful that which if done under express legislative sanction would be violative of the Constitution? If such power obtains, then the judicial department of the government sitting to uphold and enforce the Constitution is the only one possessing a power to disregard it. If such authority exists then in consequence of their establishment, to compel obedience to law and to enforce justice, courts possess the right to inflict the very wrongs which they were created to prevent."

b. Habeas corpus cases.

A writ of habeas corpus to release a prisoner held under a sentence is unquestionably a collateral attack upon the judgment against him. Yet it has been sustained in numerous cases to release from imprisonment under a conviction by a court which had jurisdiction of the case but which attempted to enforce an unconstitutional statute or ordinance, or denied some constitutional right. These decisions generally follow the case of Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717, as a leading case, although it was not in fact the first to that effect.

Most of them seem to regard the question as one to be determined by the ordinary rule which allows collateral attack only for want of jurisdiction, and do not seem to lay any stress on the fact that the Federal courts under U. S. Rev. Stat. § 753, are authorized to issue such writs by language broad enough to overthrow that rule entirely so far as Federal courts are concerned. The Federal courts themselves have said very little about the effect of this section to take their habeas corpus cases out of the usual rule. Even in very late cases the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that it can by writ of habeas corpus attack a judgment only for lack of jurisdiction, although in other cases it uses less explicit language, saying it can attack only such judgments as are "nullities," or judgments which are void for lack of jurisdiction, "or for other reasons."

These varying expressions, which are somewhat confusing when we try to get an exact statement of the doctrine of that court, are illustrated by the following quotations: "Judgments of courts of that character [superior jurisdiction] cannot be assailed collaterally, except upon grounds that impeach their jurisdiction." Re Cuddy, 181 U. S. 280, 33 L. ed. 154.

"The proposition is so clear, that in a writ of habeas corpus nothing can be inquired into but the jurisdiction of the court, that it is unnecessary to pursue the entire line of argument of counsel for appellant." Wight v. Nicholson, 134 U. S. 136, 33 L. ed. 866.

"It is only upon the theory that the proceedings and judgment of the court were nullities that we

The supreme court of the District of Columbia made the regularity of its procedure in rendering this decree the subject of judicial determination; it could be questioned, therefore, only in that court, or by appeal.

Ex parte Bigelow, 118 U. S. 881, 28 L. ed. 1006; Ex parte Watkins, 28 U. S. 3 Pet. 203, 7 L. ed. 653; Black, Judgm. § 274; Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 808, 19 L. ed. 931; Voorhees v. Jackson, Bank of United States, 35 U. S. 10 Pet. 449, 9 L. ed. 490; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. McBride, 141 U. S. 180, 35 L. ed. 660; Bryan v. Kennett, 113 U. S. 180, 28 L. ed. 909; Holdane v. Sumner, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 608, 21 L. ed. 259.

If the supreme court of the District of Columbia exceeded its authority in ordering the answer of McDonald and White to be removed from the files, that does not affect the validity of the final decree.

are authorized to reverse its action." Ex parte Lennon, 168 U. S. 548, 41 L. ed. 1110.

But "want of jurisdiction in such court over the person or the cause, or some other matter rendering its proceedings void," is the language in which some of the cases define the ground on which habeas corpus can be granted to release a prisoner. Re Frederick, 149 U. S. 70, 37 L. ed. 653.

Thus, in some cases, the court explicitly declares that want of jurisdiction is the only ground of attack upon a judgment by habeas corpus; in other cases it says only judgments which are "nullities" can be thus attacked; while in still other cases it qualifies the statement by saying that a judgment can be questioned collaterally if, for lack of jurisdiction "or for any other reason," the judgment is void. Cases of the last-mentioned class clearly imply that a judgment may be void for "other reasons" than want of jurisdiction, but they do not make it clear what such other reason or reasons may be.

The fact is the Federal courts do issue writs of habeas corpus to release persons held under judgment of a court, not only when the judgment was without jurisdiction, but when it denies a right conferred by the Federal Constitution, even if the court had jurisdiction to decide the case. This fact clearly appears from the decisions below cited, in the division next following as well as in this.

In numerous cases in which the jurisdiction of the court to try the case was unquestionable, its decision has been held void on habeas corpus because the court erred in its decisions by denying some constitutional right.

Thus, the right of a Federal court to release by habeas corpus a person imprisoned under judgment of a state court without due process of law is declared and exercised in numerous cases. Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 32 L. ed. 223; Re Lee Tong, 9 Sawy. 363; Re Ah Lee, 6 Sawy. 410; Re Parrott, 6 Sawy. 349; Re Wan Yin, 10 Sawy. 532; Re Quong Woo, 7 Sawy. 526; Ex parte Ah Lit, 11 Sawy. 447; Re Ah Jow, 12 Sawy. 88; Re Sam Kee, 12 Sawy. 379; Re Tie Loy, 11 Sawy. 472; Re Wong Yung Quy, 2 Fed. Rep. 624; Ex parte Farley, 40 Fed. Rep. 66; Ex parte McClusky, 40 Fed. Rep. 71.

These are followed by some state decisions to the same effect. State, Larkin v. Ryan, 70 Wis. 676; Re Doyle, 16 R. I. 537, 5 L. R. A. 359; Re Roberts, 4 Kan. App. 232; Re Durbin, 10 Mont. 147.

In several of these cases another ground of relief was the denial of the equal protection of the laws. State, Larkin v. Ryan, 70 Wis. 676; Re Tie Loy, 11 Sawy. 472; Re Sam Kee, 12 Sawy. 379.

But in Re Frederick, 149 U. S. 70, 37 L. ed. 653, where a sentence authorized by a state statute was alleged to have been void because the statute was in violation of the provision of the Constitution as to due process of law, the writ was denied because the court thought it the better practice to put the prisoner to his remedy by writ of error. See similar cases, Ex parte Belt, infra, and Andrews v. Swartz, infra.

Even if the preliminary steps could be reviewed collaterally, and the interlocutory order striking out defendants' answer were held to have been made in excess of the statutory authority of the court, this defect does not invalidate the final decree, or subject it to collateral attack.

The alleged unconstitutionality of a statute allowing indeterminate sentence was held insufficient ground for habeas corpus to release a person thus sentenced, in Re Pikulik, 81 Wis. 158; Re Schuster, 82 Wis. 610.

Trial without a jury in violation of the constitutional right of the accused entitles him to discharge from the conviction by habeas corpus. Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 32 L. ed. 223.

Release on habeas corpus because of the alleged denial of trial by jury was denied on the ground that the constitutional right had not been violated, but without questioning the remedy in Re Staff, 68 Wis. 255, 52 Am. Rep. 285; Re Marron, 60 Vt. 199; Re Clayton, 59 Conn. 510, 13 L. R. A. 66.

But in Ex parte Belt, 159 U. S. 95, 40 L. ed. 88, where the prisoner contended that his constitutional right to trial by jury had not been granted him, and that his attempted waiver thereof in pursuance of an act of Congress for the District of Columbia was void because the statute was unconstitutional, the court said: "We are clearly of opinion that the supreme court of the District had jurisdiction and authority to determine the validity of the act which authorized the waiver of a jury," and therefore denied the writ.

So, in Andrews v. Swartz, 156 U. S. 272, 39 L. ed. 422, where a convict sought release on habeas corpus on the ground that he had been deprived of his rights under the United States Constitution by the arbitrary exclusion from the panel of jurors of all persons of his race, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the writ would not lie, and that his proper remedy, if such right was in fact denied, was to carry the case to the highest court of the state and thence upon writ of error to the United States Supreme Court.

In Indiana the writ of habeas corpus based on the refusal of a constitutional right to a jury to assess punishment on a plea of guilty in a homicide case, was denied on the ground that the court had jurisdiction. Lowery v. Howard, 103 Ind. 440.

So, in Arkansas the denial of a jury trial is held not to be a jurisdictional matter, and not to constitute ground for habeas corpus. Ex parte Brandon, 49 Ark. 143.

by habeas corpus if imprisoned for contempt in refusing to answer. Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 35 L. ed. 1110, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 816. No question was made in this case as to the remedy, but only as to the constitutional right.

So, a person imprisoned for contempt in refusing to answer questions as to which he claimed a constitutional privilege under the state Constitution attempted to get his discharge by habeas corpus in People, Hackley, v. Kelly, 12 Abb. Pr. 150, but while the remedy was unquestioned, it was held that his constitutional rights had not been infringed.

A person sentenced to imprisonment for an infamous crime without having been presented or indicted by a grand jury as required by the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is entitled to be discharged on habeas corpus. Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. This constitutional requirement is declared to be jurisdictional. Re Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849; Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 29 L. ed. 89.

And it is applied to an indictment amended under order of court by striking out some words. Re Bain, 121 U. S. 1, 30 L. ed. 849.

Likewise in Texas one indicted by a grand jury composed of fourteen instead of twelve as the Constitution required was released on habeas corpus. Ex parte Reynolds, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 437, overruling Ex parte Fuller, 19 Tex. App. 241.

In Montana the want of an indictment by a grand jury was held to be a want of due process of law sufficient to make a conviction void when attacked by habeas corpus. Re Durbon, 10 Mont. 147.

Though this is denied in other cases which do not question the right to the remedy by habeas corpus if the constitutional provision had been in fact violated. Re Dolph, 17 Colo. 35; Re Wright, 3 Wyo. 478, 13 L. R. A. 748; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232.

The unconstitutionality of a statute which violated a bill of rights providing for plain description of the crime and for protection against furnishing evidence to criminate one's self and for the right to face witnesses and be heard personally by counsel, was held, in State, Cunningham, v. Ray, 63 N. H. 406, 56 Am. Rep. 523, a good ground of habeas corpus.

Whether imprisonment in violation of the constitutional provision that no man shall be twice placed in jeopardy entitles the prisoner to release on habeas corpus, although his imprisonment is under a 89 L. R. A. sentence of a court, is a question on which the decisions have not been quite agreed.

In Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163, 21 L. ed. 872, a person sentenced to fine and imprisonment both, when the court could rightly sentence him to one of them only, paid the fine and then sought release by habeas corpus from the same court. This was denied and he was resentenced. But the Supreme Court of the United States granted the relief on the ground that he had fully satisfied the judgment so that the second sentence was void because made after the authority of the court was ended.

But this case was distinguished in the later case of Re Bigelow, 113 U. S. 328, 28 L. ed. 1006, where the infringement of the constitutional exemption against second jeopardy was held insufficient to make a sentence void when collaterally attacked by writ of habeas corpus. In this case the alleged former jeopardy was created by the swearing of a jury and presentment of the case by the district attorney under an order for consolidation of indictments, but the order was rescinded and there was a subsequent trial. It is held that the case "remained with the trial court to decide whether the acts on which he relied were a defense to any trial at all." This is said to be within the jurisdiction of the court. It is asked if articles 5, 6, and 7 of the Amendments to the United States Constitution all go to the jurisdiction of courts, and if all judgments are void where these constitutional provisions have been disregarded.

That question is substantially answered in the negative by the decision in Ex parte Bigelow. But the other decisions of the same court above cited as to necessity of indictment and trial by jury and exemption from self-crimination seem to answer it in the affirmative.

In Ex parte Ulrich, 43 Fed. Rep. 661, reversing 42 Fed. Rep. 587, habeas corpus to release a prisoner held under judgment of a state court because his plea of former jeopardy had been overruled, was denied on the ground that his remedy was by writ of error, since the case was not within the special grounds on which a Federal court could discharge prisoners from a state court, as the 5th Amendment of the United States Constitution did not apply to the proceedings in a state court.

In Re Snow, 120 U. S. 274, 30 L. ed. 653, it was held that a person sentenced on each of three convictions on separate indictments for a single offense could be released from punishment on more than one of them by writ of habeas corpus because the lack of jurisdiction was shown on the face of the judgment.

In respect to the power of a chancellor to release a prisoner on writ of habeas corpus, it is said, in Re Graves, 29 Fed. Rep. 60; Thomson v. Wooster, 114 U. S. 104, 29 L. ed. 105; Fuller v. Cluffin, 98 U. S. 14, 23 L. ed. 785.

He is simply empowered to hold the keys of the Constitution over those whose liberty is infringed by void process of law, or, what is the same thing, no process at all." On the ground that the warrant did not set forth any offense as the ground of commitment it was held in this case that the prisoner should be discharged on habeas corpus.

If the defect in the warrant prevented the court from getting jurisdiction of the case, the "seign of the Constitution" was not needed to protect the prisoner, as the judgment would be void without reference to any constitutional provision.

A prisoner who is held in violation of the constitutional provision against imprisonment for debt can be released on habeas corpus. It is immaterial that this is done under a statute authorizing the imprisonment as a contempt of court for refusal to pay the debt. Ex parte Hardy, 68 Ala. 303.

Habeas corpus was also granted to release a prisoner on the ground that his imprisonment was in violation of the constitutional provision against imprisonment for debt, but without any discussion of the remedy in Ex parte Clark, 20 N. remedy if the constitutional right had been denied.

For further consideration of the use of habeas corpus, see next division, respecting release from conviction for violation of unconstitutional statute or ordinance.

In respect to the above cases, as well as those discussed in the next division of this note, it seems clear that the judgments held void were rendered by courts which had jurisdiction to try the issues involved, and that their alleged want of jurisdiction was, at most, a want of authority to decide wrong on a constitutional question which they have jurisdiction to decide right.

This is the strange position into which a court is inevitably placed when it decides that a judgment is void for lack of jurisdiction because it denies a constitutional right, although it was rendered by a court of general jurisdiction whose judgment would have been valid if the court had decided the question the other way.

But while the Federal courts have in most habeas corpus cases decided the question as if it must be decided by the general rule as to collateral attack it will be seen, as above stated, that some cases speak of "other reason" besides want of jurisdiction for holding a decision void. In several cases also there is language implying that the Federal statute had materially changed the rule of such procedure in Federal courts.

Thus, it was said by Mr. Justice Bradley: "In view of our late civil strife, and the necessity of protecting those who claim the benefit of the national laws, Congress, by the act of February 5, 1867, extended the writ to 'all cases where any person may be restrained of his or her liberty in violation of the Constitution, or of any treaty or law of the United States,' and made it issuable by 'the several courts of the United States and the several justices and judges of said courts within their respective jurisdictions.'" Ex parte Bridges, 2 Woods, C. C. 429.

Judge Dady also says: "If the jurisdiction to discharge a person from imprisonment, who is deprived of his liberty without due process of law by a state, was not conferred upon the district and circuit judges, this provision of the 14th Amendment, that was plainly intended as a bulwark against local oppression and tyranny, as well 'up North' as 'down South,' would be a dead letter. The Supreme Court is too far away, and the way there is too expensive, to furnish relief in the great majority of cases, either upon a direct application or on an appeal from the state court." Re Wan Yin, 10 Sawy. 532. This clearly implies that habeas corpus is to some extent at least a substitute for a writ of error when a state court had denied the constitutional right to due process of law.

Again, in speaking of the rule that habeas corpus will be granted only for lack of jurisdiction, it is said in Kingen v. Kelley, 8 Wyo. 566, 15 L. R. A. 177: "There is an apparent exception to this rule in some special cases, provided for by § 753 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

The authority given by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 753, is not in its terms limited to cases in which persons are held without jurisdiction. The question of collateral attack is not mentioned therein, and possibly the Federal courts might hold the statute broad enough to permit the issuance of the writ to a state court even when the latter had conceded jurisdiction. The fact seems to be that the Federal courts have in fact done so without discussing the matter in this light, or expressly claiming to do so.

Some of the state courts also, as in several decisions above mentioned, have used the writ of habeas corpus to release a person sentenced in violation of his constitutional rights. In many other state cases the writ has been assumed to be proper without questioning the remedy, where the court has proceeded to discuss the existence of alleged violation of the constitutional right.

II. Conviction for violating unconstitutional statute or ordinance.

It has been repeatedly declared that an unconstitutional statute is a nullity, and that a decision attempting to enforce it is therefore void for lack of jurisdiction. Just what is meant by such a declaration is not quite clear. It surely does not mean that the court in such case cannot have jurisdiction to decide the question of constitutionality of a statute, because that is a judicial question of the highest class which the courts are expressly created to decide. Moreover a decision against the validity of a statute seems never to have been held or claimed to be void on the ground that the statute was a nullity. Therefore, unless we adopt the peculiar theory that the court has jurisdiction to decide right, but none to decide wrong, we are driven to the conclusion that a decision is not void for lack of jurisdiction merely because it decides that an unconstitutional statute is valid. If such a decision is void on collateral attack, it must be for some other reason than a lack of jurisdiction of the court to decide the question. If the courts should say that constitutional rights are too important to be cut off by wrong decisions, and that decisions which deny such rights will therefore be held void, even on collateral attack, because of the serious consequences involved, it would merely express the actual attitude of the courts; but they do 89 L. R. A.

In the first sense only, the word is used when it is said that a particular judgment is void for want of jurisdiction, and is therefore open to collateral attack.

not say this. They usually attempt to justify their repudiation of such decisions by what seems to be a demonstrably untenable argument against the jurisdiction of the courts which rendered the decisions. Either the rulings which hold such decisions void on collateral attack are wrong in toto, or else they are based on wrong reasons so far as they declare the decisions void for lack of jurisdiction.

To say that state courts have no jurisdiction to decide the question of the constitutionality of a state statute under the Federal Constitution would be absurd. That proposition is contradicted in all possible ways. The jurisdiction is assumed or implied in the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 709, providing for a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States to review decisions of this kind. So in a great number of cases the Supreme Court of the United States has reviewed such judgments of state courts on writs of error without intimating that the state courts did not have jurisdiction to decide the questions involved, and on such writs of error have proceeded to determine the constitutional questions on the merits. If the state court in such a case was without jurisdiction, it would seem to be the business of the Supreme Court of the United States to reverse the decision because of the want of jurisdiction of the lower court, without going into the merits of the case further than that. In Mansfield, C. & L. M. R. Co. v. Swan, 111 U. S. 379, 28 L. ed. 462, the court quotes from and follows the decision in Jackson v. Ashton, 33 U. S. 8 Pet. 148, 8 L. ed. 898, to the effect that on appeal from a decision of the circuit court when it had no jurisdiction the Supreme Court "had no jurisdiction except for the purpose of reversing the decree appealed from on that ground."

But the Supreme Court of the United States has declared in the most express language that state courts have jurisdiction to decide as to the constitutionality of state statutes when they are claimed to violate the Federal Constitution. It says: "Upon the state courts, equally with the courts of the Union, rests the obligation to guard, enforce, and protect every right granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States and the laws made in pursuance thereof, whenever those rights are involved in any suit or proceeding before them." Robb v. Connolly, 111 U. S. 624, 28 L. ed. 542.

This is plainly decided also by holding that while the Federal courts have the power and may discharge the accused in advance of his trial, if he is restrained of his liberty in violation of the Federal Constitution or laws, they are not bound to exercise such power, but may in their discretion require the accused to sue out his writ of error from the

Messrs. William G. Choate and John Selden, with Mr. E. D. Harris, for respondent:

The court had no power to inflict any punishment for contempt except fine or imprisonment.

U. S. Rev. Stat. § 725.

The supreme court of the District of Columbia is a court of the United States and within this section of the Revised Statutes.

United States v. Emerson, 4 Cranch, C. C.

highest court of the state, or even from the Supreme Court of the United States. Ex parte Royall, 117 U. S. 271, 29 L. ed. 868; Ex parte Fonda, 117 U. S. 516, 29 L. ed. 994; Duncan v. McCall, 139 U. S. 449, 35 L. ed. 219; Wood v. Brush, 140 U. S. 278, 35 L. ed. 505; Cook v. Hart, 146 U. S. 133, 36 L. ed. 984; Whitten v. Tomlinson, 160 U. S. 281, 40 L. ed. 406; New York v. Eno, 155 U. S. 89, 39 L. ed. 80.

Even after a final judgment based on a state statute alleged to be unconstitutional, the Federal courts in some cases have refused the prisoner relief on habeas corpus and compelled him to resort to his remedy by writ of error. Pepke v. Cronan, 155 U. S. 100, 39 L. ed. 84; Re Frederick, 149 U. S. 70, 37 L. ed. 658; Ex parte Belt, 159 U. S. 95, 40 L. ed. 88; Re Spickler, 43 Fed. Rep. 658, 10 L. R. A. 445.

In Pepke v. Cronan, 155 U. S. 100, 39 L. ed. 84, although the petitioner expressly claimed that a state law was void because in contravention of the Federal Constitution, the court denied the writ, refusing to consider the merits, because, as it said, "the validity of the law and of the sentence could be tested by the supreme court of the state on certiorari or habeas corpus, and no reason was suggested why, if the judgment of the district court was the final judgment of the highest court of the state in which a decision in the matter could be had, a writ of error from this court might not be applied for."

We have then the repeated recognition by the Supreme Court of the United States of the right of other courts to proceed and determine the constitutionality of statutes, and even its express declaration that it is their province to do so. Therefore the denial of jurisdiction for judgments based on unconstitutional statutes or ordinances is uncontestedly shown to be, not a denial of their jurisdiction to determine the case, but a denial of their jurisdiction to render a wrong judgment. This is a strange doctrine of jurisdiction, but this is what the courts have quite generally brought themselves to.

In fact the issue of a writ of habeas corpus to release a prisoner convicted under an unconstitutional statute or ordinance has become an established practice in the Federal courts and in most of the state courts; and most of the decisions proceed on the theory that such an unconstitutional statute or ordinance is insufficient to give jurisdiction to the court. Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. The leading case in the Federal courts is Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717, in which it is said: "An unconstitutional law is void and is as no law. An offense created by it is not a crime. A conviction under it is not merely erroneous, but is illegal and void, and cannot be a legal cause of imprisonment. It is true, if no writ of error lies, the judgment may be final, in the sense that there may be no means of reversing it. But personal liberty is of so great moment in the eye of the law that the judgment of an inferior court affecting it is not deemed so conclusive but that, as we have seen, the question of the court's authority to try and imprison the party may be reviewed on habeas corpus." The court expressly concludes "if the laws are unconstitutional and void, the circuit court acquired no jurisdiction of the case."

But the supreme court of Massachusetts, long before the case of Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717, declared, in Herriock v. Smith, 1 Gray, 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381: "That section of the law under which the conviction was had is unconstitutional, and therefore the judgment is void and the prisoner is entitled to be discharged from custody."

Where the statute under which a person was convicted was unconstitutional it was said, in Re Paul, 94 N. Y. 497: "That being so, it follows that the relator is held for an alleged crime which did not exist and which he could not commit, and that he should be discharged."

If the law or ordinance under which a court assumes to try and convict a person is void, its judgment is declared not to constitute a final judgment

The operation of every judgment must depend upon the power of the court to render that judgment, or, in other words, on its jurisdiction over the subject-matter which it has determined.

of a competent tribunal, and the person imprisoned under it is entitled to his discharge on habeas corpus. Re White, 43 Minn. 360.

Instances of the particulars in which statutes have been held unconstitutional, and therefore insufficient to sustain a judgment collaterally attacked by habeas corpus, are the following:

Violation of the provision as to religious liberty and of the provision as to liberty of citizens to acquire property. Ex parte Newman, 9 Cal. 502.

Provision against disqualifying a person on account of sex from engaging in any lawful business, vocation, or profession. Re Maguire, 37 Cal. 604, 40 Am. Rep. 125.

The provision against unreasonable searches and seizures and other provisions for the security of persons and property, and as to the law of the land. Herrick v. Smith, 1 Gray, 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381.

The provision against special legislation. Ex parte Westerfield, 55 Cal. 550, 36 Am. Rep. 47.

Statutes unconstitutional because of defective title were held insufficient to sustain a judgment when attacked by habeas corpus, in Re Paul, 94 N. Y. 497, and Re Hauck, 70 Mich. 396.

The same was held as to ex post facto laws. Re Medley, 134 U. S. 160, 33 L. ed. 835; Re Savage, 134 U. S. 176, 33 L. ed. 842.

In Riley's Case, 2 Pick. 172, the court refused relief on habeas corpus from an additional sentence by reason of former convictions in accordance with a statute passed after the last crime was committed. But the statute did not apply to prior crimes, and its constitutionality was not the question.

The constitutional questions involved in other cases present a considerable variety including matters as to delegation of power, regulation of commerce, denial of due process of law, of the equal protection of the laws, etc.

Among the numerous cases in which writ of habeas corpus has been denied when sought on constitutional grounds, because the statute or ordinance was valid, and without denying the propriety of the remedy if the Constitution had been in fact violated, are the following: Re Curtis, 106 U. S. 371, 27 L. ed. 232; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923; Ex parte Kinney, 3 Hughes, 9; Re Krug, 79 Fed. In Ex parte Robinson, 12 Neb. 263, 28 Am. Rep. 794, it is said that as to the remedy by habeas corpus, "We express no opinion."

In Re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, although a person was discharged on habeas corpus because the statute was unconstitutional, the court said they did not pass upon the form of the remedy.

But the remedy seems to have been assumed to be proper in Re Hauck, 70 Mich. 396.

In Re Underwood, 30 Mich. 502, the court refused to inquire on habeas corpus into the constitutionality of a statute under which petitioner had been committed as insane. But in Ex parte Donahoe, 24 Neb. 66, the court did inquire into the constitutionality of a statute in such a case without discussing the right to do so, and disposed of the case by holding that the statute was valid.

In Missouri, habeas corpus to test the constitutionality of a statute or ordinance was formerly denied by the supreme court of that state, where a person is held under judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. Ex parte Boenninghausen, 91 Mo. 301, citing Re Harris, 47 Mo. 164; Ex parte Bowler, 16 Mo. App. 14, as authorities on this point, although those were cases in which the petitioner was held for trial before conviction.

The decisions of the courts of appeals in Missouri had also been inharmonious. Thus, in Ex parte Boenninghausen, 21 Mo. App. 267; Re Wooldridge, 30 Mo. App. 612; and Ex parte Olden, 37 Mo. App. 116,—the St. Louis court of appeals had refused to issue the writ in such cases on the ground that it was an obvious impropriety for that court, as a "limited appellate court," to do so, while the decision of constitutional questions belonged to the supreme court.

On the other hand, in Re McDonald, 19 Mo. App. 370, the Kansas city court of appeals held that it

In the national tribunals, jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the parties is not the test of jurisdiction to render given judgments or decrees.

Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 176, 21 L. ed. 879; United States v. Walker, 109 U. S. 267, 27 L. ed. 980; Re Nielson, 181 U. S. 182-184, 33 L. ed. 120; Griffith v. Frazier, 12 U. This decree deprives the defendants Mc-could exercise jurisdiction on habeas corpus to decide the unconstitutionality of a statute under which the petitioner was then held for trial.

But in Ex parte Bethurum, 66 Mo. 545, and Ex parte Swann, 96 Mo. 44, the supreme court of Missouri on writs of habeas corpus considered the constitutionality of statutes and upheld them without questioning the right to that remedy.

Moreover, in Ex parte Marmaduke, 91 Mo. 228, 60 Am. Rep. 250 (decided almost at the same time with Ex parte Boenninghausen, 91 Mo. 301), and in Re Thompson, 117 Mo. 83, 20 L. R. A. 462, the same court, without discussing the remedy, did hold statutes unconstitutional in habeas corpus cases and discharge the prisoners held under them.

Finally, in Ex parte Smith, 135 Mo. 223, 33 L. R. A. 606, the court has expressly overruled its decision in Ex parte Boenninghausen, and declared that it has the power to investigate the constitutionality of a statute in habeas corpus proceeding.

In Nebraska the court in Ex parte Fisher, 6 Neb. 306, held that the constitutionality of a statute under which a person was held must be tested by writ of error or other appropriate remedy, and not by habeas corpus. It was said: "We are not prepared to say that, upon a writ of habeas corpus, we can . . . pronounce the judgment an absolute nullity on the ground that the constitutionality of the statute . . . is controverted."

In New York, in Re Donohue, 52 How. Pr. 251, 1 Abb. N. C. 1, it was held that the constitutionality of a statute could not be tested by habeas corpus.

But this was disapproved in Re Kemmler, 7 N. Y. Supp. 145, where the contrary doctrine was declared. This decision was affirmed on other grounds without discussing the question. People v. Kemmler, v. Durston, 119 N. Y. 569, 7 L. R. A. 715. See also Re Paul, 94 N. Y. 497.

In Texas, in Parker v. State, 5 Tex. App. 579, it was held that a prisoner could not inquire into the constitutionality of the law under which he was arrested after indictment by writ of habeas corpus. But in Ex parte Mato, 19 Tex. App. 112, the court overrules its former decision in deference to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717. It says it will follow this rule "whatever may be our individual opinion as to the expediency of such practice," for the sake of harmony. This doctrine is acted upon in later Texas cases, supra.

The unexpressed idea that a constitutional right is peculiarly sacred and important, and that a decision against such right is not entitled to the same respect when attacked collaterally as a decision against any other right, seems to be at bottom the basis of the collateral attack upon judgments for unconstitutionality. It is also apparently the foundation of a discrimination which is in effect made by the decisions between judgments upon ordinances which are unconstitutional and those which are otherwise invalid. A conviction under an unconstitutional ordinance, as shown above, is treated as a nullity on collateral attack, while in most of the cases (though there are exceptions, such as Re Sic, 78 Cal. 142, and Ex parte Garza, 28 Tex. App. 381) a conviction under an ordinance which is invalid for other reasons is not treated as void on collateral attack. The theory that an unconstitutional ordinance is a nullity applies equally well to ordinances which are invalid because unauthorized by statute, but the courts have not usually so applied it.

But while the theory that judgments based on unconstitutional statutes or ordinances are void because of a lack of jurisdiction seems to be untenable, as shown above, it must be conceded that the extension of the writ of habeas corpus to relieve from imprisonment under such judgments has become substantially universal in American courts. So far as the Federal cases are concerned, this doctrine is not necessary to sustain such relief by habeas corpus, since the provisions of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 753, as pointed out in the preceding division, are broad enough to sustain the writ, even in cases where the judgments attacked were rendered in the exercise of jurisdiction. Still the Federal courts have not usually claimed authority, by virtue of the statute, to use the writ by way of attack on a final judgment except for want of jurisdiction. On this point, see discussion in division III. following.

III. Judgment on unconstitutional contract.

In Smith v. Henderson, 23 La. Ann. 649, it was held that a judgment rendered on an obligation given for the price of slaves, which was in violation of the Constitution of the state which prohibits the court from enforcing such a contract, is void: In this case the Constitution expressly declared such contracts "null and void."

But it is held in other cases that judgments based on unconstitutional contracts are not void on collateral attack. Thus, in Mitchell v. State Bank, 2 Ill. 526, and Buckmaster v. Jackson, Carlin, 4 Ill. 104, it was held that judgments based on notes given for bills of credit which were in violation of the United States Constitution could not be collaterally attacked.

Likewise in Cassel v. Scott, 17 Ind. 514, a judgment on bonds given under an unconstitutional act to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors was held not to be a nullity which could be collaterally attacked. The court said: "It was founded upon the bonds, and not on the act, and of the suit upon them, the circuit court had full jurisdiction." It was also said: "No authority has been cited, nor do we know of any, in support of the position assumed by the appellant."

The judgment is not binding upon Riggs & Co., even if they are considered to be purchasers of the bonds pendente lite.

The decision in Strong v. Daniel, 5 Ind. 348, that a replevin bond given to stay execution of a judgment under an unconstitutional statute was held unenforceable, overruling Magruder v. Marshall, 1 Blackf. 333, is clearly distinguishable as there was no judgment in question.

IV. Other cases.

In many cases the courts have declared in general terms that an unconstitutional statute is in legal contemplation a nullity. But this is not universally declared.

In respect to the objection that title obtained by sale under a judgment was not valid because the n. fa. was not signed by the clerk, and the Constitution provided that writs must "bear test and be signed by the clerk," it was said: "A directory enactment of the Constitution is of no more validity as a law than a like enactment by statute,—both are laws." The court also held that the writ being amendable, when collaterally questioned it might be considered as amended. Whiting v. Beebe, 12 Ark. 421.

But in this place we are considering only the effect of judgments based on such statutes. On this point also the cases are conflicting. Some hold such judgments valid when thus questioned.

"If it be admitted that the Constitution virtually repeals the law . . . it does not prove that it [a judgment of confiscation based upon the law] is therefore a mere nullity, which can be taken advantage of in this way," that is, by collateral attack. McNeil v. Bright, 4 Mass. 232.

"Judgments rendered under an unconstitutional law are not nullities." Webster v. Reid, Morris (Iowa) 467. It was objected in this case that the act through which the indebtedness accrued and the judgment was obtained was unconstitutional.

In an action for property sold by a marshal on execution under a judgment which was based on an unconstitutional statute, it was held that the judgment could not be treated as void by such collateral attack. Arnold v. Booth, 14 Wis. 181. The court said, suppose a complaint based on the unconstitutional statute was demurred to, "could it not rightfully act upon the demurrer, decide all questions raised by it, and sustain it for the reason that the law is unconstitutional?" Also "The court might have held that there was no cause of action because the law was void. It had jurisdiction to decide. This, it seems to me, is incontestable."

Riggs & Co. were not purchasers pendente lite.

Memphis v. Brown, 94 U. S. 715, 24 L. ed. 344; Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 78 U. S. 6 Wall. 153, 18 L. ed. 762; Secombe v. Steele, 61 U. S. 20 How. 105, 15 L. ed. 886; *Hayden v. S. 22 Wall. 248, 23 L. ed. 857; Story, Eq. Pl. § 904; 1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 5th Am. ed. 402, 408; Kinsman v. Kinsman, 1 Russ. & M. 622; Herrington v. McCollum, 78 Ill. 478; *Turner v. Dec. 441; Pierce v. Stinde, 11 Mo. App. 389; Page v. Waring, 76 N. Y. 474; Lee County v. Rogers, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 181, 19 L. ed. 160, Approved, Warren County v. Marcy, 97 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 980; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566; Holbrook v. New Jersey Zinc Co. 57 N. Y. 616; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Butchers' Union S. H. & L. S. L. Co. 130 U. S. 159, 30 L. ed. 621; Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 33, 27 L. ed. 865.

In Northampton County v. Herman, 119 Pa. 373, it was held that where an officer had accepted fees as they were settled under an unconstitutional statute, although this fixed them at a lower amount than he was entitled to, the settlement was binding upon him as against a collateral attack.

But such judgments have been held nullities.

A divorce granted under an unconstitutional statute of another state was held void in Simonds v. Simonds, 106 Mass. 572, 4 Am. Rep. 576.

The effect of such judgments to protect officers who act under them or the magistrates who render them is also in dispute.

Judge Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, 6th ed. p. 122, says that an unconstitutional statute "constitutes a protection to no one who has acted under it." This is the doctrine of some of the cases, such as Astrom v. Hammond, 3 McLean, 107; Woolsey v. Dodge, 6 McLean, 142; Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665; Lynn v. Polk, 8 Lea, 121; Campbell v. Sherman, 35 Wis. 103.

Although it is held, on the contrary, in People, Atty. Gen., v. Salomon, 54 Ill. 33, that an officer who has failed to execute a statute because he believes it to be unconstitutional is not relieved from liability for contempt in failing to comply with a mandamus to execute it after the time has passed, when his inability to execute it is due to his previous disobedience of the statute. The court says it is his duty to obey the law, and not to deny its constitutionality.

So, in State, Nicholas, v. Shakespeare, 41 La. Ann. 156, it is held that the mayor and council of a city cannot defy the law and constitute themselves the judges of its constitutionality, but that it is their duty to obey it until it is judicially declared void.

Likewise, in Seassums v. Botta, 34 Tex. 335, it is held that until a statute is adjudged unconstitutional it will protect clerks and other ministerial officers in obeying it. The court says: "It is there-

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to have the defendants' testator adjudged to be a trustee of certain bonds for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and that they have a lien thereon, and that the defendants account to them therefor. In September, 1878, the mixed commission in British and American claims, sitting at the city of Washington, awarded to one Augustin R. McDonald the sum of $197,000, in satisfaction of his claim for cotton destroyed during the war of the Rebellion. In the following October the plaintiffs filed in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a bill in equity against McDonald and one William White, his assignee, for the sum of $49,297.50, alleging therein that McDonald was indebted to them under an agreement whereby, in consideration of services to be rendered in the prosecution of such claim, they were to receive a sum equal to 25 per centum of the amount that should be recovered, and that they have a lien to the extent of such sum upon the award in his favor. Such proceedings were thereafter had that one George W. Riggs, a banker in the city of Washington, was appointed receiver, and one half of the sum so awarded was paid over to him as such to meet the claim and lien of the plaintiffs. As such receiver, and pursuant to the directions of the court, he invested the funds in certain bonds of the District of Columbia guaranteed by the United States, and payable at its treasury. The defendants then interposed a demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill, which was sustained, and on the 24th day of June, 1875, a decree was entered dismissing the plaintiffs' bill, with costs. On the same day the plaintiffs entered an appeal from the decree to the general term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia. On June 28, 1875, another decree was entered in precise conformity with the former decree, but supplemented by a direction to the receiver to pay to the defendants McDonald and White the funds in his hands as such receiver. On the same day McDonald and White called upon the receiver, and demanded the bonds in question. He thereupon first consulted with the judge holding the court in which the decree was entered, and, after being advised by such judge that the bonds should be surrendered, he delivered them over to McDonald and White, who on the same day sold and delivered the bonds for full value to the banking firm of Riggs & Co., of which the receiver was a partner. Riggs & Co. then surrendered the bonds to the treasury of the United States, receiving new bonds therefor, which were thereafter sold and delivered to various purchasers. On July 2, fore deemed advisable for every good citizen to obey whatever may be promulgated by the law-making power as law until the same shall have been passed upon by the courts."

And a ministerial officer's belief that a statute is unconstitutional will not justify him in disobeying it, if it is valid. Clark v. Miller, 54 N. Y. 528.

A threat to collect a tax under an unconstitutional statute is deemed insufficient to make the payment involuntary. Detroit v. Martin, 34 Mich. 170, 22 Am. Rep. 512, citing Taylor v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 31 Pa. 73, 72 Am. Dec. 724.

But without proceeding further to investigate this general question of the effect of unconstitutional statutes to protect officers, we are here concerned particularly with the effect of a judgment based upon an unconstitutional statute to protect them.

A considerable number of decisions hold that officers are not protected in the execution of judgments based on unconstitutional statutes. In Sumner v. Beeler, 50 Ind. 341, 19 Am. Rep. 718, which was a case of alleged illegal imprisonment, it was said that no question of law is better settled than that "ministerial officers and other persons are liable for acts done under an act of the legislature which is unconstitutional and void."

In Kelly v. Bemis, 4 Gray, 83, 64 Am. Dec. 50, a justice of the peace was held liable for his judgment rendered under an unconstitutional statute.

The same was said to be the law in Barker v. Stetson, 7 Gray, 53, 66 Am. Dec. 457, although the real question in that case was as to the liability of persons who made the complaint before the justice.

In Ely v. Thompson, 3 A. K. Marsh. 70, also, a justice of the peace was held liable for giving sentence under an unconstitutional statute. The court said that if it be the correct doctrine that magistrates are liable for issuing a warrant unknown to the provisions of the law, "how much more so ought it to be in a case where the Constitution is violated?" and that the justice "cannot justify an act against its provisions, even with the authority of the legislature to aid him."

On the other hand, some cases hold that officers in such instances are protected.

Thus, in Webster v. Reid, Morris (Iowa) 487, it was held that the sheriff was not a trespasser for levying and selling under a judgment based on an unconstitutional statute.

"It was no part of the officer's duty to examine into and decide upon the constitutionality or construction of the statute which authorized his warrant." This was said respecting a deputy sheriff in State v. McNally, 34 Me. 210, 56 Am. Dec. 650.

Where a justice of the peace proceeded under a void ordinance, it was held in Henke v. McCord, 55 Iowa, 378, that he was not personally liable. The court said: "There is neither reason nor justice, it seems to us, in holding a justice of the peace liable to a civil action for such an error in judgment." The ordinance does not seem to have been attacked on constitutional grounds, but the court expressly disapproves of Kelly v. Bemis, 4 Gray, 83, 64 Am. Dec. 50.

As to the personal liability of judicial officers in general, see Austin v. Vrooman (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 138, and note; also Thompson v. Jackson (Iowa) 27 L. R. A. 92, and note.

It should be said in reference to this review of the cases on this subject, that a careful search has been made for all the decisions that have been rendered on the specific question of effect of judgments upon collateral attack when they are based on unconstitutional statutes or deny in any way a constitutional right; but the difficulty of the subject is such as to make it uncertain whether this has been literally accomplished.

The conclusion seems plain that the courts have quite generally, although not universally, regarded constitutional questions as essentially different from other questions to be decided, and have in numerous cases held in substance that a wrong adjudication of a constitutional question renders the judgment an entire nullity, even when the jurisdiction of the court to decide the question, provided it shall decide correctly, is unquestioned. Yet while this seems to be the necessary foundation for these decisions, the courts have not treated it so. The result is an unsatisfactory condition of the subject.

B. A. R.

1875, the plaintiffs took an appeal to the general term of the supreme court of the District of Columbia from the decree of June 28, 1875; and on March 4, 1876, that decree, as well as the one that preceded it, was reversed, and the cause was remanded to the special term, with leave to the defendants to answer. An answer was then interposed, and, upon the issues raised thereby, testimony was taken at divers times during the years 1876 and 1877. On the 15th day of June, 1877, plaintiffs obtained an order from the supreme court of the District of Columbia, requiring the defendants McDonald and White to pay over to the registry of the court the sum which had been delivered to them by the receiver. This order was not complied with, and thereupon the plaintiffs moved that the defendants McDonald and White show cause why they and each of them should not be punished as for a contempt; and such proceedings were thereupon had that they were adjudged to be guilty of a contempt, and that the answer filed by them in the cause be stricken out, and removed from the files of the court. Judgment was thereafter entered against them pro confesso adjudging that the plaintiffs had a lien upon the bonds. This action is based upon the judgment so entered, and is prosecuted upon the theory that notice to Riggs of the pendency of the action was notice to all of his partners. Weetjen v. St. Paul & P. R. Co. 4 Hun, 529; 8 Kent, Com. 105. The defendants' testator resided in the city of New York, and was one of the members of the banking firm of Riggs & Co. He only was served with summons in this action. The referee has found, as conclusions of law: "First, that, in order to enable the plaintiffs to sustain this action, the decree rendered by the supreme court of the District of Columbia must be a valid decree, binding upon the defendants; second, that from the operation of that decree the defendants in this action enjoy exemption and immunity, under § 725 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; third, that from the effect and operation of the decree the defendants enjoy immunity and exemption, under that provision of the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which prohibits the deprivation of property without due process of law; fourth, that the supreme court of the District of Columbia had no jurisdiction to render the said decree, and that the same was and is null and void," etc.

As to the first conclusion of law the parties agree. The controversy is in reference to the other three. The third conclusion is based upon the 5th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits the deprivation of persons or property without due process of law. Inasmuch as the consideration of what is due process of law will to some extent be involved in the determination of the validity of the judgment upon which this action is based, we only deem it necessary to consider the second and fourth conclusions of law found by the referee. We shall also, for the purpose of this review, assume, without deciding the question, that Riggs & Co. were purchasers of the bonds pendente lite, with knowledge of the existence of the suit, although it appears that the purchase was made after judgment, for full value, in good faith, under the supposition that they had the right to purchase freed from all liens, and that they had no notice that an appeal had been taken.

Considering them as such purchasers, were they bound by the determination made in the action then pending? Section 725 of the United States Revised Statutes provides that "the said courts [referring to the courts of the United States] shall have power to impose and administer all necessary oaths, and to punish, by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority; provided, that such power to punish contempts shall not be construed to extend to any cases except the misbehavior of any person in their presence, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, the misbehavior of any of the officers of said courts in their official transactions, and the disobedience or resistance by any such officer, or by any party, juror, witness, or other person, to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the said courts." Under this statute the referee has reached the conclusion that the supreme court of the District of Columbia had no power to punish the defendants for a contempt by striking out their answer, and adjudging that the plaintiffs had a lien upon the bonds.

In Ex parte Robinson, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 512, 22 L. ed. 208, Field, J., in delivering the opinion for the court, says: "The power to punish for contempts is inherent in all courts; its existence is essential to the preservation of order in judicial proceedings, and to the enforcement of the judgments, orders, and writs of the courts, and consequently to the due administration of justice. The moment the courts of the United States were called into existence, and invested with jurisdiction over any subject, they became possessed of this power. But the power has been limited and defined by the act of Congress of March 2, 1831. The act in terms applies to all courts; whether it can be held to limit the authority of the Supreme Court, which derives its existence and powers from the Constitution, may, perhaps, be a matter of doubt, but that it applies to the circuit and district courts there can be no question. These courts were created by an act of Congress. Their powers and duties depend upon the act calling them into existence, or subsequent acts extending or limiting their jurisdiction. The act of 1831 is therefore to them the law specifying the cases in which summary punishment for contempts may be inflicted. It limits the power of these courts in this respect to three classes of cases; . . . the law happily prescribes the punishment which the court can impose for contempts. The 17th section of the judiciary act of 1789 declares that the court shall have power to punish contempts of their authority in any cause or hearing before them, by fine or imprisonment, at their discretion. The enactment is a limitation upon the manner in which the power shall be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment. The judgment of the court disbarring the petitioner, treated as a punishment for a contempt, was therefore unauthorized and void." In Anderson v. Dunn, 19 U. S. 6

Wheat, 204-227, 5 L. ed. 242, 248, Johnson, J., says: "It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempts; . . . it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution, or a legislative declaration that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment." In United States, D. & N. O. R. Co., v. Atcheson, T. & S. F. R. Co. 16 Fed. Rep. 853, McCrary, J., says: "The power of the court is limited to the punishment of the party charged with contempt, and, under the provisions of § 725 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, such punishment must be by fine or imprisonment. That section provides that circuit courts shall have power 'to punish by fine or imprisonment, at the discretion of the court, contempts of their authority.' This enactment, says the supreme court, is 'a limitation upon the manner in which the power may be exercised, and must be held to be a negation of all other modes of punishment,'"—citing Ex parte Robinson, 86 U. S. 19 Wall, 512, 22 L. ed. 208. In United States, Southern Exp. Co., v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. 6 Fed. Rep. 287-289, Hammond, J., says: "Obedience to an injunction against privileged persons and corporations was sometimes enforced by sequestration, which placed the property of the contemnor in custody until obedience was given. 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 5th ed. 1685, 1687; 2 Bishop, Crim. L. 6th ed. §§ 241, 278; Spokes v. Bunbury Bd. of Health, L. R. 1 Eq. 42, and cases cited by these authorities. Our Revised Statutes, taken from the act of March 2, 1831, chap. 99, and prior acts of Congress, have prescribed the mode of punishment, and directed that it shall be by fine or imprisonment, and this operates as a negation of all other modes of punishment." See also Re Cary, 10 Fed. Rep. 622, 625; Re Graves, 29 Fed. Rep. 60; Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson, 154 U. S. 447-489, 88 L. ed. 1047-1061, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 645; Ex parte Bradley, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 864, 19 L. ed. 214. It may be that the cases above referred to are not in strict accord with the rule recognized in this state, in which a court of equity may refuse to a party in contempt the benefit of proceedings pending in it, when asked by him as a favor, until he has purged himself of his contempt. Brinkley v. Brinkley, 47 N. Y. 40; Walker v. Walker, 82 N. Y. 260; Gross v. Clark, 87 N. Y. 272. But in this state the supreme court, on its equity side, is invested by the Constitution with all the power and authority that formerly existed in the high court of chancery in England, the common law remaining in force excepting so far as it has been changed by statute. The legislature in this state, therefore, may not be able to limit or deprive the supreme court of any of its jurisdiction or powers.

Has the supreme court of the District of Columbia like jurisdiction and powers? It was created by act of Congress, and not by the Constitution. It consequently follows that Congress, which gave it life and invested it with power, may restrict and limit its exercise, 39 L. R. A.

and this notwithstanding the fact that it may have given it general jurisdiction in law and equity. To Congress is given the exercise of exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such district as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of government of the United States. U. S. Const. art. 1, § 8, subsec. 17. It may therefore create, empower, limit, and remove. In creating the supreme court of the District of Columbia, it was provided that it "shall possess the same powers and exercise the same jurisdiction as is now possessed and exercised by the circuit court of the District of Columbia, and the justices of the court so to be organized shall severally possess the powers and exercise jurisdiction now possessed and exercised by the judges of said circuit court." Act March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. at L. 762, chap. 91). The circuit court of the District of Columbia and the judges thereof, prior thereto, had been invested with "all the powers by law vested in the circuit courts and the judges of the circuit courts of the United States." 2 Stat. at L. 105, chap. 15, § 3. And by the judiciary act of February 13, 1801, it was provided "that the circuit courts shall have, and hereby are invested with, all the powers heretofore granted by law to the circuit courts of the United States, unless where otherwise provided by this act." 2 Stat. at L. 92, chap. 4, § 10. By the judiciary act passed September 24, 1789, it was provided that "the circuit courts shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of $500, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners, or an alien is a party, or the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state." 1 Stat. at L. 78, chap. 20, § 11. This provision was re-enacted in the revision of 1873. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 629. In 1871 it was provided that "the Constitution and all the laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said District of Columbia as elsewhere within the United States." 16 Stat. at L. 426, chap. 62, § 34; D. C. Rev. Stat. § 93. By § 760 of the Revised Statutes of the District of Columbia it is provided that "the supreme court shall possess the same powers and exercise the same jurisdiction as the circuit courts of the United States." It is thus apparent that the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the circuit courts of the United States are placed upon the same footing and invested with the same jurisdiction and powers, except as to the residence of parties. They are each given jurisdiction of suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity. Neither has common-law jurisdiction except that conferred by statute, and consequently each is controlled by subsequent legislation. In 1801 the laws of Maryland were continued in force over that portion of the District of Columbia ceded to the government by that state, but this statute only remained in force in so far as it was not inconsistent with other statutes or not modified or repealed. D. C. Rev. Stat. § 92; 2 Stat. at L. 104, chap. 15, § 1.

Does § 725 of the Revised Statutes apply to the District of Columbia? Our attention has been called to no rule of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or statute that is in conflict with its provisions. It is not locally inapplicable, and, under § 98 of the statute above referred to, we see no reason why it is not given the same force and effect within the District that it has elsewhere within the United States. It may be that other sections of the same chapter may not apply to the District of Columbia, but it is because they are either locally inapplicable or there are local rules or statutes covering the same subject-matter. See Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 27 L. ed. 888, construing § 1007 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. We consequently are of the opinion that § 725 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is in force in the District of Columbia, and, as construed by the United States courts, it restricts the supreme court of the District, in its punishment for contempt, to either a fine or imprisonment.

Was the decree entered in the action against McDonald and White void, or was it merely voidable, and are the defendants in this action bound thereby? In 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 1470, under the head of "Judgments," it is said that "it is an axiom of the law that judgments entered without any jurisdiction are void, and will be so held in a collateral proceeding, and there is a strong and growing tendency in all the courts to hold that although a court had jurisdiction over both the person and the subject-matter, but did not have jurisdiction to enter the particular judgment entered in the case, such judgment is void, and may be collaterally impeached." See note 3 thereunder and note 1 on page 247. In McVeigh v. United States, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 259-267, 20 L. ed. 80, 81, a libel for information was filed in the district court for the district of Virginia for the forfeiture of certain real and personal property of one William McVeigh. The libel alleged that he held an office under the Confederate government, and that he had taken the oath of allegiance to support the Constitution of that government. He appeared by counsel, made a claim to the property, and filed an answer. The attorney for the United States moved that the claim, answer, and appearance be stricken from the files, upon the ground that he was at the time a resident of the city of Richmond, within the Confederate lines, and a rebel. The motion was granted, and subsequently his default was taken, and a decree rendered pro confesso for the condemnation and sale of his property. The judgment was reversed in the supreme court. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion, says: "In our judgment, the district court committed a serious error in ordering the claim and answer of the respondent to be stricken from the files. As we are unanimous in this conclusion, our opinion will be confined to that subject. The order, in effect, denied the respondent a hearing. It is alleged that he was in the position of an alien enemy, and hence could have no locus standi in that forum. If assailed there, he could defend there. The liability and the right are inseparable. A different result would be a blot upon our jurisprudence and civilization. We cannot hesitate or doubt on the subject. It would be contrary to the first principles of the social compact and of the right administration of justice." In Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 274, 28 L. ed. 914, the same question was again brought before the court under an action of ejectment to recover certain real property which had been acquired under the decree mentioned in the former case. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The doctrine invoked by counsel, that, where a court has once acquired jurisdiction, it has a right to decide every question which arises in the cause, and its judgment, however erroneous, cannot be collaterally assailed, is undoubtedly correct as a general proposition, but, like all general propositions, is subject to many qualifications in its application. All courts, even the highest, are more or less limited in their jurisdiction. They are limited to particular classes of action, such as civil or criminal, or to particular modes of administering relief, such as legal or equitable. . . . Though the court may possess jurisdiction of a cause, of the subject-matter, and of the parties, it is still limited in its modes of procedure and in the extent and character of its judgments. It must act judicially in all things, and cannot then transcend the power conferred by the law. If, for instance, the action be upon a money demand, the court, notwithstanding its complete jurisdiction over the subject and parties, has no power to pass judgment of imprisonment in the penitentiary upon the defendant. If the action be for a libel, or personal tort, the court cannot order in the case a specific performance of a contract. If the action be for the possession of real property, the court is powerless to admit in the case the probate of a will. Instances of this kind show that the general doctrine stated by counsel is subject to many qualifications. The judgments mentioned, given in the cases supposed, would not be merely erroneous, they would be absolutely void; because the court in rendering them would transcend the limits of its authority in those cases." In Ex parte Lange, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 163-176, 21 L. ed. 872-879, the prisoner had been convicted of the crime of stealing mail bags. He was sentenced to one year's imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $200, and was on the same day committed to jail in execution of his sentence. On the following day he paid the fine. The statute authorized imprisonment or fine. It did not authorize both. On the next day the prisoner was brought before the court, and an order was entered vacating the former judgment, and the prisoner was again sentenced to one year's imprisonment. Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court, says in reference thereto: "We are of the opinion that when the prisoner, as in this case, by reason of a valid judgment, had fully suffered one of the alternative punishments to which alone the law subjected him, the power of the court to punish further was gone. . . . It is no answer to this to say that the court had jurisdiction of the person of the prisoner, and of the offense, under the statute. It by no means follows that these two facts make valid, however erroneous it may be, any judgment the court may render in such case. If a justice of the peace, having jurisdiction to fine for a misdemeanor, and with the party charged properly before him, should render a judgment that he be hung, it would simply be void. Why void? Because he had no power to render such a judgment. So, if a court of general jurisdiction should, on an indictment for libel, render a judgment of death or confiscation of property, it would, for the same reason, be void. Or if, on an indictment for treason, the court should render a judgment of attainder whereby the heirs of the criminal could not inherit his property, which should, by the judgment of the court, be confiscated to the state, it would be void as to the attainder, because in excess of the authority of the court and forbidden by the Constitution." Ex parte Fisk, 118 U. S. 718-718, 28 L. ed. 1117-1119; Re Bonner, 151 U. S. 242, 38 L. ed. 149; Re Mills, 135 U. S. 268-270, 34 L. ed. 107-110; Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289-304, 32 L. ed. 405-408; Ex parte Reed, 100 U. S. 18-23, 25 L. ed. 588, 589; Re Frederick, 149 U. S. 70-76, 37 L. ed. 658-656; Bigelow v. Forrest, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 389, 19 L. ed. 696. See also note entitled Want of Authority under Jurisdiction Conferred, in Morrill v. Morrill, 11 L. R. A. 157, 20 Or. 96.

We have examined, but do not here refer to, the cases in which irregularities only appear in the judgment entered, in which it has been held that they are voidable only, and cannot be attacked collaterally. The question presented may be close and upon the border, but we are inclined to the view that as to Riggs & Co. the judgment is void; that, after the answer had been interposed by the defendants, the court had no power to order judgment without a trial of the issues presented. In the language of Justice Field, above referred to, the court, although having jurisdiction of the case and of the parties, "is still limited in its modes of procedure and in the extent and character of its judgments." Assuming that the members of the firm of Riggs & Co. purchased the bonds with notice of the pendency of the action, and that they took the same subject to the determination therein to be made, they had the right to have the questions at issue determined upon the merits. McDonald and White were, as to them, assignors for value, and they had no power, by acts or declarations thereafter done or made, to impeach the title so transferred to Riggs & Co. McDonald and White could not, by fraud or collusion with the plaintiffs, impair their title, or, by a confession of judgment, deprive them of their rights to the bonds. Riggs & Co. were not parties to that action, and it does not appear that they ever had notice of the proceedings in contempt. As purchasers pendente lite, Riggs & Co. took the risk of the litigation then pending, but in so doing did not assume the risk of any punishment that might be inflicted upon McDonald & White in an independent proceeding. Conner v. Reeves, 108 N. Y. 527-532; Ferguson v. Crawford, 70 N. Y. 253, 26 Am. Rep. 589.

It is contended that the decree striking out the defendants' answer was not based upon the proceedings in contempt; but the proceedings, orders, and decree do not support this contention. If the answer was not stricken out as a punishment for the contempt of which the defendants had been convicted, then by what authority were the defendants deprived of their right to a trial and a determination of the issues involved? Again, it is said that § 725 of the Revised Statutes has reference to criminal and not civil contempts; but no such distinction is found in the statute, or is made by the authorities construing the same.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

ARKANSAS SUPREME COURT.

James H. PEAY, Appt.,
v.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COM-PANY.

(.....Ark.....)

Damages for mental anguish, independent of and unaccompanied by physical injury of any kind, cannot be recovered for delay in delivering a telegram.

(January 8, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Greene County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's neglect to promptly deliver a telegram. Affirmed.

Statement by Hughes, J.:

This action was commenced to recover damages by the appellant against the appellee for a failure to deliver promptly the following telegram, sent to appellant, at Paragould, Ark., to wit:

Central City, Ky. 6-23-1894.

To James Peay, City:

Sallie, Dot, Saline Smith, and Jim Maddox killed in accident at McHenry to-day. Madge Smith seriously injured.

[Signed]

Ed. Batsill.

NOTE.—For cases on both sides of the question as to the right to damages for mental suffering on account of the default of a telegraph company, see note to Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers (Miss.) 13 L. R. A. 859.

The complaint stated that the telegram was received at Paragould, Arkansas, where plaintiff resided, at 9:15 o'clock p. m., and that it was not delivered until 8:10 o'clock the next morning; that, if it had been promptly delivered, the plaintiff could and would have left Paragould on a north-bound train, on the Cotton Belt Railroad, that departed thence at or about 8:30 A. M. of said morning, and would have reached McHenry, Kentucky, in time to have attended the funeral of the persons named in the telegram, who were killed, and to have administered to the wants of the person named therein who was injured, who, the complaint alleged, were all of close kin to the plaintiff. The complaint further alleged that, by reason of the delay in delivering said telegram, he could not leave Paragould on that road till the second morning succeeding the day of the receipt of the telegram by the company's agent at Paragould, or arrive at McHenry, Kentucky, until after the burial of the relatives of his who had been killed in the accident referred to; that, by reason of such delay in delivering said telegram, he was deprived of the opportunity to attend the burial of his dead relatives, or to administer to the wants of his relative who was injured; that, by reason thereof, he suffered great mental anguish, disappointment, and grief, and was damaged $1,000. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and the plaintiff declined to amend. Judgment was rendered against him, and he appealed to this court.

The following authorities define what notice is requisite to put the company on inquiry as to the importance of the message and the relationship of the parties:

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Carter, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 624; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Nations, 82 Tex. 539; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Moore, 76 Tex. 66; *Western U. Teleg. Co. v. The following authority holds that the sendee or beneficiary of a telegraphic message can maintain an action:

Martin v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 1 Tex. Civ. App. 148.

The message in this case was ample to put the company on notice of its urgency, and if it desired further information that might have been had by inquiry; it was its duty to inquire.

Messrs. Rose, Hemingway, & Rose and George H. Fearons, for appellee:

In actions for damages, the recovery must be limited to such matters of loss as might reasonably have been anticipated as a natural and probable consequence of the wrong complained of.

3 Sutherland, Damages, p. 216; Morrell v. Pacific Exp. Co. 54 Ark. 22; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Short, 53 Ark. 434, 9 L. R. A. 744; Thompson, Electricity, § 386; Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 168.

The plaintiff does not show any damage for which he can recover in this case.

There is not the slightest intimation in the telegram that the persons referred to were related to the plaintiff.

Even in Texas the complaint is fatally defective.

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 71 Tex. 723, 2 L. R. A. 766; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217; Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583.

Even if defendant was negligent in not delivering the message more promptly, it was plaintiff's duty to make reasonable exertions to save himself from loss.

Warren v. Stoddart, 105 U. S. 224, 26 L. ed. 1117; Marsh v. McPherson, 105 U. S. 709, 26 L. ed. 1189; Cunningham Iron Co. v. Warren Mfg. Co. 80 Fed. Rep. 878; Daughtery v. American U. Teleg. Co. 75 Ala. 168; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 287, note 3; Walworth v. Pool, 9 Ark. 394; Miller v. Mariner's Church, 7 Me. 51.

This is not a case of failure to deliver the message, or of delivering it in a changed form, which are technical breaches of contract for which nominal damages are recoverable.

It is not a case where the law allows nominal damages for the breach of a contract.

8 Sutherland, Damages, p. 295.

Mental anguish of itself has never been treated as an independent ground of damages so as to enable a person to maintain an action for that injury alone, neither has insult nor contumely.

Man had suffered all kinds of mental injury at the hands of his neighbors for centuries,—his hopes had been disappointed, his pride had been humbled, his anger had been aroused, he had been frightened, grieved, and subjected to every conceivable form of mental discomfort,—but such wrongs alone had never been made the subject of compensation in damages until 1881, when So Belle v. Western Union Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 308, was determined by the commission of appeals in Texas.

After the decision in that case, the principle was invoked in many other cases in the courts of Texas, with varying results.

Gulf, O. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 568, 46 Am. Rep. 278; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 71 Tex. 723, 2 L. R. A. 766; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Kirkpatrick, 76 Tex. 217; Roswell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 75 Tex. 26.

The Texas rule has found no support in the Federal courts, except in a charge delivered by Judge Maxey to a jury in the circuit court for the western district of Texas in 1889.

Beasley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. Rep. 181.

But it has been approved, partially or wholly, by the highest courts of six states as follows:

Wadsworth v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695; Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 583; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265; Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L. R. A. 669; Mentzer v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 93 Iowa, 752, 28 L. R. A. 72.

The Texas rule has been considered and repudiated in the Federal courts as follows:

Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Wood, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. Rep. 471, 6 C. C. A. 432, 21 L. R. A. 706; Chase v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 554, 10 L. R. A. 464; Crawson v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 544; Tyler v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 684; Kester v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 603; Gahan v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 438; Wilcox v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 8 U. S. App. 118, 52 Fed. Rep. 264, 3 C. C. A. 73, 17 L. R. A. 804; Gilmer v. Kennon, 181 U. S. 22, 33 L. ed. 110.

It has been repudiated entirely by the decisions of the highest state courts as follows:

West v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Kan. 98; Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 3 Dak. 315; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748; International Ocean Teleg. Co. v. Saunders, 32 Fla. 434, 21 L. R. A. 810; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ga. 768, 17 L. R. A. 430; Butner v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Okla. 234; Connell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L. R. A. 173; Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406; Summerfield v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Wis. 1; Curtin v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 18 App. Div. 253.

The mature and better considered judgments of the courts are against the rule.

Hughes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Pretermittin discussion of other questions in the case, we proceed to consider the main and most important question involved. In considering this question, the labor of the court has been minimized in the investigation of cases by the full and excellent briefs of counsel on both sides of the question. The question we propose to consider is whether or not injury to the feelings,—anguish and pain of mind,—unattended by physical injury, occasioned by the breach of duty on the part of the telegraph company, in failing to deliver the telegram promptly, can be regarded as an element of damages, under the law. Are damages recoverable at law for mental anguish, caused by the negligent omission of duty upon the part of the telegraph company, when such mental anguish is independent of and unaccompanied by physical injury of any kind? Upon this question the decisions of the courts of last resort are not harmonious.

While there is considerable conflict in the adjudged cases upon this question, we are of the opinion that the better considered cases are against the right of recovery for mental pain and anguish, unaccompanied by physical injury. The best cases we have read which so hold are Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 88 Ga. 763, 17 L. R. A. 430; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 13 L. R. A. 859; Francis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 58 Minn. 252, 25 L. R. A. 406; Connell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 116 Mo. 34, 20 L. R. A. 172. See also West v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Kan. 98; Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 8 Dak. 315; Butner v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 2 Okla. 284; Summersfield v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 87 Wis. 1; Curtin v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 13 App. Div. 258. The first case in this country of which we have any knowledge that held damages recoverable for mental anguish, independent of physical injury, is the case of So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 808, 40 Am. Rep. 805, decided in 1881. Judge Lumpkin, in his able discussion of this question in Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co., says that the court in the So Relle Case "adopts as law a bare suggestion made by the text-writers Shearman and Redfield, in their work on Negligence, vol. 2, § 756. The cases referred to in the opinion were actions for physical injuries, of which the mental agony forms an inseparable component." The decision in the So Relle Case is followed in Texas in quite a number of other cases, and the doctrine seems to have involved that court in some inconsistencies commented upon in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Rogers, 68 Miss. 748, 13 L. R. A. 859. This doctrine, which seems to have had its origin, in this country, in Texas, has been followed in Beasley v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Fed. Rep. 181; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 90 Ky. 265; Young v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 107 N. C. 370, 9 L. R. A. 669; Wadsworth v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510; Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 123 Ind. 294, 7 L. R. A. 588; Thompson, Electricity, §§ 878 et seq.; and in Iowa, in Montener v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 98 Iowa, 752, 23 L. R. A. 72. In case of Wadsworth v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695, Judge Caldwell delivered the opinion of the court, and maintained his position with much ability; but we are of the opinion that the very able dissenting opinion in that case by Judge Lester announces the correct doctrine. We adhere to the doctrine announced in the cases which held that for mental pain and anguish alone, unaccompanied by physical injury, damages are not recoverable at law. We could not hope to add anything in support of this view to the able, full, and elaborate discussion of this question in the cases we have referred to.

It is not to be controverted that in cases of torts that produce physical injury, attended with mental suffering, the mental suffering is an element of damages, recoverable in an action at law, because they are so intimately connected as to make separation impracticable. So, also, damages may be recovered for torts that are wilful and calculated to injure the feelings, but only in aggravation of damages, on account of the wanton and wilful character of the wrong done; but no action lies for injury to the feelings merely, or for mental anguish alone. It will be borne in mind that the damages claimed in this case are alleged to have been caused by a breach of contract. In a majority of instances the breach of a contract merely causes disappointment, annoyance, and more or less mental trouble or distress. But it would be an unwarranted stretch of the law, in our opinion, to hold that, for mental anguish caused by violation of a contract merely, damages could be recovered in an action at law. We do not think that damages for mental pain and suffering alone can be measured by any practical or just rule.

It is asked, What difference can there be between allowing damages for mental pain and anguish unattended with physical wrong and allowing damages for pain and anguish resulting from physical injury? There is the difference with us that damages for mental pain and anguish caused by physical injury have always been allowed by law, while damages for mental pain and anguish unattended with physical injury have been allowed by law only since the decision of the So Relle Case, in 1881, when the decision of the Texas court departed from the doctrine of the common law, which we think sound, and announced a new doctrine, unsupported by authority, as we believe, of any well-considered case before it. While we do not want to be understood as clinging to ideas and doctrines that are ancient, because they are ancient merely, if they are contrary to reason and right, yet we have great respect for the conservatism of the law, and will not depart from its long and well settled doctrines, supported by eminent authority, and founded in reason and justice. Even if the difference in principle between allowing damages for mental pain and anguish, the result of physical injury, and disallowing damages for such pain and anguish unaccompanied by physical injury, be such as not to be defined,—merely chimerical,—this is no reason why we should say that damages for mental anguish, independent of physical injury, should be allowed. No statute allows them in such case. The common law does not allow them, and, in our opinion, the weight of adjudication is against the right of recovery in such cases. In determining a principle in the law which in its application, at least, seems to be new and but recently thought of, it is highly important to consider precedents, and is legiti-mate, in our view, to look to consequences that will follow as certainly as night follows the day from the recognition of a doctrine that will affect most seriously the welfare of the people. The intolerable and interminable litigation such a doctrine would foster is beyond the reach of an ordinary imagination.

The decisions of the state courts repudiating this doctrine find support in the decisions of the courts in England. In Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 598, the court says: "Mental pain or anxiety the law cannot value, and does not pretend to redress, when the unlawful act complained of causes that alone." In Allopp v. Allopp, 5 Hurlst. & N. 584, Pollock, C. B., said: "We ought to be careful not to introduce a new element of damage, recollecting to what a large class of actions it would apply, and what a dangerous use might be made of it." In Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 18 App. Cas. 22, the court holds that an action cannot be maintained for mental shock unaccompanied by physical injury. This seems to be the settled doctrine of the courts in England. In the case of Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Barker, 33 Ark. 350, 34 Am. Rep. 44, Judge English, in delivering the opinion, said: "There must be a loss to the claimant that is capable of being measured by a pecuniary standard. . . . and mere injury to feelings cannot be considered." Pages 359 and 360. He said this is the rule in England, under Lord Campbell's act, and in this country, under similar statutes. However, the precise question at bar has not been decided in this court before this. The Federal courts have also repudiated the doctrine that an action can be maintained for mental pain and anguish not accompanied with physical injury. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Wood, 13 U. S. App. 317, 57 Fed. Rep. 471, 6 C. C. A. 482, 21 L. R. A. 706; Chase v. Western U. Tele. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 554, 10 L. R. A. 464; Crawson v. Western U. Tele. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 544; Tyler v. Western U. Tele. Co. 54 Fed. Rep. 684; Kester v. Western U. Tele. Co. 55 Fed. Rep. 608; Gahan v. Western U. Tele. Co. 59 Fed. Rep. 433; Cobb v. Telegraph Co. (Kan.; not yet published). Only one Federal court in Texas has followed the Texas cases, as far as we know. In Wood's Mayne on Damages, at page 75, it is said: "Mental anguish of itself has never been treated as an independent ground of damages, so as to enable a person to maintain an action for that injury alone; neither has insult nor contumely." Pierce on Railroads says (p. 302): "Mental is not readily distinguished from physical suffering. Pain of mind, when connected with bodily injury, is the subject of damages; but it must be so connected in order to be included in the estimate, unless the injury is accompanied by circumstances of malice, insult, or inhumanity. See Pollock, Torts, enlarged Am. ed. pp. 54-56, and note by editor, p. 56; 2 Greenl. Ev. 267; Field, Damages, §§ 26, 73; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 862. Several of the recent text-writers have approved the doctrine of the Texas courts, notably Thompson on Electricity and Sedgwick on Damages. To support the opinion in the So Relle Case, § 756 of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence is quoted in the opinion, which is as follows: "In case of delay or total failure of delivery of messages relating to matters not connected with business, such as personal or domestic matters, we do not think that the company in fault ought to escape with mere nominal damages." This may be true, but, if so, it presents a question for the action of the legislature. The courts do not make law, but determine what it is, not what it ought to be. At furthest, this is their legitimate province only. After the fullest argument by the learned counsel in this cause, and the best consideration we have been able to give the question, we are all agreed that no recovery can be had at law for damages for mental suffering alleged to have been endured in this case, no physical injury having been alleged.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

ST. LOUIS, IRON MOUNTAIN, & SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.,

v.

W. J. MATHEWS.

(.....Ark.....)

1. If a provision in a contract for the employment of railroad engineers, by which the employer undertakes to reinstate any engineer discharged from service whenever, upon his complaint, specified persons shall on investigation decide that the discharge was unjust, is void as against public policy, such provision does not render invalid a further provision in the contract that the engineers shall not be discharged without just cause.
2. Want of mutuality in the contract will permit the discharge at any time of a railroad engineer employed under a contract by which the employer agrees to pay him according to specified rates for his services, not to discharge him without just cause, to promote him according to specified grades of service, and when discharges of engineers are made to discharge in the order of juniority in service, where there is no agreement on his part to serve for any specified time.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pulaski County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for breach of an employment contract. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dodge & Johnson, for appellant:

The contract is void because it binds the defendant railway company, and prevents it from performing those duties to the public which are enjoined by law and public necessity.

passengers, are bound to the utmost diligence which human skill and foresight can effect; and if injury occurs by reason of the slightest omission, in regard to the highest perfection of all the appliances of transportation, in the mode of management at the time the injury occurs, whether caused by defective appliances, or incompetent or careless servants, the carrier is liable.

When a contract seeks to bind the maker to do something opposed to the public policy of the state or nation, or conflicts with the wants, interests, or prevailing sentiment of the people, or our obligations to the world, or is repugnant to the morals of the times, it is void, however solemnly the same may be made.

If the tendency of contracts is towards a corrupt or illegal result, they will be unhesitatingly declared void.

Messrs. Rose, Hemingway, & Rose for appellees.

Battle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On or about the 18th day of May, 1894, W. J. Mathews instituted this action against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Company. The complaint filed in the action is as follows:

"The plaintiff is by profession a locomotive engineer, and has been such for many years, and for over four years past he has been in the employment of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railway Co. as such locomotive engineer, working under a contract, a copy of which is herewith filed, and made part hereof. By article 1 of said contract it is provided: 'No engineer shall be discharged or suspended without just and sufficient cause, and, in case an engineer believes his discharge or suspension to have been unjust, he shall make a written statement of the facts in the premises, and submit it to his master mechanic, and at the same time designate any other engineer who may be in the employ of the company at the time; on the same division; and the master mechanic, together with the engineer last referred to, shall, in conjunction with the superintendent, investigate the case in question, without unnecessary delay, and give prompt decision, and, in case the aforesaid discharge or suspension is decided to have been unjust, he shall be reinstated, and paid half time for all the time he has lost on such account.'

"By rules 18, 14, 16, and 17 of said contract it is provided that engineers shall be employed and discharged in the order of their seniority, the oldest engineer in service being entitled to be first employed, and the youngest engineer in the service being subject to be first discharged in case the company should reduce its force.

"The plaintiff was one of the oldest engineers in the service of the company, and, there being no possibility of the requirements of the service being diminished to such an extent as ever to necessitate his discharge under the contract, his employment was for life, or during good behavior.

"The plaintiff was earning under that contract from $185 to $185 per month, and would have continued to earn that sum during the remainder of his natural life, but on the 2d day of January, 1894, in violation of said contract, and without cause, the plaintiff was, by the defendant, discharged from its service.

"Plaintiff has pursued the steps required by said article 1 for reinstatement, but the master mechanic of the defendant, acting under its orders, and without cause, refuses to reinstate him in the service.

"The plaintiff therefore prays judgment for the sum of $10,000."

Rules 18, 14, 16, and 17, referred to in the complaint, are as follows:

"(13) When, from temporary slackness of business, an engineer in road service is thrown out of employment, he will be reduced from passenger to freight service, from freight to pusher service, and from pusher to switch-engine service, according to his seniority on the division. If it is necessary to lay off an engineer, the youngest engineer in switch-engine service will be taken off. This not to apply to switch engineers who are not eligible to road or pusher service by reason of not having fired on the road, or having waived their rights to same.

"(14) During slackness of business, employment for surplus engineers will be found, if possible, on other parts of the system where needed, in preference to hiring new men, or promoting men already in service, with the understanding that whoever accepts such temporary transfer will be required to remain until business on his own territory justifies his recall by his own master mechanic. No man to be promoted, or engineer hired, during absence of such transferred engineer, and while subject to recall to his own division, unless to meet an emergency or pressing demand of business; in which case such newly hired or promoted engineer shall hold no rights over the absent engineer. Men so transferred will hold seniority rights on their own territory for a period of six months only, unless the master mechanic of the territory to which they are transferred finds it necessary for despatch of business to retain them for a longer period. Further, they have a preference, in accordance with seniority, to any engine becoming vacant on their own territory over extra men still remaining on said territory. If, after accepting such transfer, they return to their own territory, before they are recalled by their own master mechanic, they shall be considered new men on said territory."

"(16) Promotions of engineers will be made according to seniority from switch-engine service to pusher-engine service, if any, on the division, and from pusher service to road service.

"(17) When a passenger engine becomes vacant, the oldest freight engineer on the division where the vacancy occurs is entitled to the same. When a freight engine becomes vacant, the oldest freight engineer in regular service on the division where the vacancy occurs is entitled to the same. When any run becomes vacant, and the engineer entitled to said run refuses same, he loses his right to this run only, but will retain his rights, according to seniority, to next vacancy that may occur. When a passenger run extends over two or more freight divisions, each division is entitled to representation pro rata upon said run, each freight division selecting a representative in turn, as may be agreed upon by the divisions interested. In the absence of regular passenger engineer, when the extra passenger engineer is not available, the oldest freight engineer on the division shall be assigned to this service. Any freight engine becoming vacant for a period of fifteen days or more shall be given the oldest extra freight engineer. No engineer shall be allowed to run on territory other than that to which he is assigned, except in case engineers assigned to such territory are not available. This shall not apply to systems officers, specials."

These rules, among others, were signed only by Frank Reardon, Superintendent of Locomotive and Car Department," and "Geo. C. Smith, Assistant General Manager."

The defendant answering, admitted that the plaintiff was a locomotive engineer, and was in its employ as such on the 2d day of January, 1894, and that it had entered into an agreement with the engineers in its employment, which became effective on the 1st of January, 1892, and was in force on January 1, 1894, and that article 1 of the agreement is set out in the complaint; but denied all the other allegations of the complaint, and averred that it discharged him from its service on the 2d of January, 1894, for gross negligence, and stated in what it consisted.

The issues in the case were tried by a jury. In the trial it was shown that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant as a locomotive engineer. It was admitted in the answer that the following article was a part of the contract:

"Article 1. No engineer shall be discharged or suspended without just and sufficient cause, and, in case an engineer believes his discharge or suspension to have been unjust, he shall make a written statement of the facts in the premises, and submit it to his master mechanic, and at the same time designate any other engineer who may be in the employ of the company at the time on the same division; and the master mechanic, together with the engineer last referred to, shall, in conjunction with the superintendent, investigate the case in question without unnecessary delay, and give a prompt decision; and, in case the aforesaid discharge or suspension is decided to have been unjust, he shall be reinstated, and paid half time for all the time lost on such account."

On the 2d of January, 1894, while he was in the employment of the defendant, he was in control of one of its locomotives pulling a freight train going north. When near Higginson station, 50 miles north of Little Rock, the boiler exploded. The company discharged him, and he demanded an investigation under article 1 of his agreement. He designated M. W. Cadle as the person who should make the investigation in conjunction with the master mechanic of the defendant. Cadle and the plaintiff appeared before the master mechanic and demanded the investigation, which was granted. They made a joint examination of the boiler, and together discussed the cause of the explosion. The master mechanic reached the conclusion that the cause was the failure of the engineer to keep the boiler supplied with a sufficient quantity of water, and so reported to the proper officer. Cadle made no announcement of his conclusion,—perhaps disagreed with the other arbitrator. No appeal to the superintendent was made, and no other investigation was demanded.

The names appended to the rules before referred to were those of Frank Reardon, the superintendent of the locomotive and car department of the Missouri Pacific Railroad Company, and of George C. Smith, the general manager of the same company. The rules were agreed upon by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the company, and were accepted by them as modifications of the agreement entered into by them, of which article 1 of plaintiff's contract was a part. There is no direct evidence that these rules were made a part of the contract of plaintiff and defendant adduced, except that the plaintiff was a member of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and the admission of the defendant that article 1 was a part of their contract.

Evidence was adduced in the trial on the part of the plaintiff to show that he was discharged without sufficient cause, and on the part of the defendant that the explosion of the boiler was occasioned by the negligence of the plaintiff in permitting the water to get too low, and for that reason he was discharged.

The court, over the objection of the defendant, instructed the jury at the request of the plaintiff, as follows:

"1. If you find that the plaintiff was discharged from the service of the defendant because of the blowing down of the crown sheet of the engine of which he was in charge, and that said crown sheet was not blown down in consequence of his misconduct, then you will find for the plaintiff, and will assess his damages at the sum which he might reasonably be expected to have earned under his contract with the defendant down to the time of this trial, deducting such sums as he, by reasonable diligence, might have earned in similar business; but the burden of proof is on the defendant to show that the plaintiff might have obtained other similar employment."

At the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury as follows:

"The court charges the jury that, if they find from the evidence that plaintiff was careless in the handling of his engine, and that such carelessness contributed to cause the said engine to blow down its crown sheet, then the discharge of said plaintiff by defendant railway company was not a violation of the contract sued on, and your verdict must be for defendant."

Except upon the credibility of witnesses, and the preponderance of evidence, and the burden of proof, no other instructions were given. The jury returned a verdict for $500 in favor of the plaintiff, and the court rendered judgment accordingly, and the defendant appealed.

Appellant contends that the contract sued on is void, because it is contrary to public policy. The reason given for this contention is that it takes from it the right to discharge its employees without the approval of a board of arbitration, and thereby deprives the railroad company of the power to discharge those duties imposed upon it by law which can be fully exercised only when it is allowed to discharge incompetent, careless, or inefficient servants, whenever, in its opinion, it may be necessary to do so. It is true that appellant undertook to reinstate any engineer who shall be discharged from its service, whenever, upon his complaint, its master mechanic and superintendent, and an engineer selected by him, shall, upon investigation, decide that the discharge was or is unjust. But if we assume that this stipulation is void because it is contrary to public policy, it may be eliminated without affecting the remainder of the contract; for it is separate and distinct from, and independent of, the other promises of the railroad company, which are legal, and the whole contract founded upon one lawful consideration,—the services of appellee. If, therefore, it be illegal, it is void, and the remainder of the contract is valid; the rule in such cases being that, "where the consideration is tainted by no illegality, but some of the promises . . . are illegal, the illegality of those which are bad does not communicate itself to or contaminate those which are good, except where, in consequence of some peculiarity in the contract, its parts are inseparable, or dependent upon one another." Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 8 McCrary, 130, 11 Fed. Rep. 1; State, Laskey, v. Perrysburg Bd. of Edu. 35 Ohio St. 519; Erie R. Co. v. Union Locomotive & Exp. Co. 35 N. J. L. 245; Corcoran v. Lehigh & F. Coal Co. 188 Ill. 390; Peltz v. Eichele, 62 Mo. 171; Dean v. Emerson, 102 Mass. 480; Clark, Contr. p. 474.

But appellee is not seeking to enforce the article as to arbitration. He has abandoned that, and now asks for compensation for the damages occasioned by his discharge. Assuming that he can waive the arbitration, is he entitled to recover? That depends upon the terms of his contract. This brings us at once to inquire what the stipulations of the contract were. As said by Mr. Justice Strong in Coffin v. Landis, 46 Pa. 481: "It matters not what, in our opinion, would have been a reasonable arrangement, nor what it may be supposed the parties anticipated, nor whether the plaintiff's early discharge was a hardship to him. The true question is, What was the contract? To what did the parties bind each other? We are not at liberty to make contracts for them, or to add any stipulations which they have not seen fit to incorporate. We cannot give to a mere expectation the sanction, or the binding force of a covenant."

Appellee, for a stipulated consideration, agreed to serve appellant in the capacity of an engineer. There was no contract as to the time he should continue to serve. Appellant agreed to pay him according to certain rates for his services, not to discharge him without just cause, to promote him according to certain grades of service, and, when it saw fit to reduce the number of its engineers, to discharge them in the order of their juniority in service, first discharging the youngest, and then the next, and so continuing until the number should be sufficiently reduced. There might have been in these promises an implied undertaking on the part of appellant to retain appellee in its service so long as he should serve it acceptably as an engineer, unless he should be sooner discharged in the manner indicated. But we fail to discover any evidence of an agreement on the part of appellee to serve any specified time. Hence there was no contract that he would serve, and that the appellant would employ him, for any stated time,—the agreement of both being necessary to fix the time of service,—and, consequently, no violation of a contract by the discharge of appellee before the expiration of any particular time.

Quotations from the opinions of courts in a few cases will add force to and explain what we have said. In Harper v. Hassard, 113 Mass. 188, Chief Justice Gray, speaking for the court, said: "The written agreement in which the parties have expressed the contract between them, and by the construction of which this case must be determined, consists of, 1, a recital that the defendants intend to carry on the business of making oil and water colors, and wish to secure the services of the plaintiff in the making of said colors; 2, an agreement of the plaintiff with the defendants that he will, during the term, not exceeding three years from the date of this agreement, render and give his exclusive time, service, skill, and energy to them in the manufacture of oil and water colors, and also instruct and teach them during the said term the art of manufacturing or making colors in all its details, so far as it is in his power to do so; 3, in consideration of the above, an agreement of the defendants 'during said term' to pay to the plaintiff 'thirty dollars per week as compensation for his services so rendered;' 4, an agreement of the plaintiff that he will not, 'during the continuance of this agreement, be connected with any other persons in the manufacture of colors. . . . There is no express agreement of the defendants to employ the plaintiff for three years, and no stipulation from which, in our judgment, such an agreement can be implied. The agreement appears to have been framed and adapted to secure to the defendants the right to the exclusive services of the plaintiff for such time, not extending beyond three years from its date, as he should perform such services, . . . paying him the stipulated compensation weekly, so long only as he should be employed by and faithfully serve them; but not to oblige them to continue the business, or to employ him therein, except at their own election, or to pay him any compensation after reasonable notice that they should no longer require his services."

In East Line & R. River R. Co. v. Scott, 72 Tex. 70, the agreement alleged was "that the said company thereafter, when this plaintiff should ask for and accept service and employment by the said company in the running and operating its said railroad, in the employment of locomotive engineer, that this being and still is the trade, occupation, and profession of your petitioner, would employ petitioner for whatever length of time your petitioner might desire to retain such employment, and at the reasonable and customary pay and wages of such employee on railroads, which then was and still is from $100 to $150 per month," etc. The court in speaking of this contract, said: "We must take the contract as alleged in the petition to be the contract on which appellee must recover, if at all; and, looking to that, there can be no doubt that whether appellee should serve the appellant, and the term of such service, depended upon his own will. It is very generally, if not uniformly, held, when the term of service is left to the discretion of either party, or the term left indefinite, or determinable by either party, that either may put an end to it at will and so without cause. Harper v. Hassard, 113 Mass. 187; Coffin v. Landis, 46 Pa. 431; Wood, Mast. & S. 133, 136, and citations. When such a state of agreement exists it is no breach of contract to refuse to receive further services; and the refusal to accept any at all, it would seem, at most would entitle the engaged servant only to nominal damages. If the pleadings of appellee be accepted as true, there can be no doubt that there was an agreement that appellant would give employment to appellee; but, as the period for which this should be done was dependent on the will of appellee, to be exercised in the future, there was no contract binding appellant to employ appellee for any fixed period. The minds of the parties had not met as to a material element of the contract to which the agreement looked—the period of service."

In Bolles v. Sachs, 37 Minn. 315, the parties executed an agreement in writing "whereby, for the expressed consideration of the agreement of the plaintiff to conduct the business of the defendants, selling such goods at Minneapolis as provided in that instrument, the defendants agreed, for so long a time as the plaintiff might elect, to employ the plaintiff in that business; agreeing also that the plaintiff should have absolute and sole control of the business, and that the defendants would not employ any other agent or sell their goods to any other person. The defendants further agreed by this instrument to pay to plaintiff $2,000 out of the first moneys collected from the accounts of the firm of Bolles & Co., . . . and as compensation for such employment, to pay to the plaintiff one half of all the profits to be derived from the business conducted by the latter," who agreed to conduct and manage it to the best of his ability. No period was specified for the continuance of the service of the plaintiff. He was discharged. He then brought an action, and recovered about $1,100 on account of an alleged breach of the contract. The court said: "The period of service or agency was left expressly and entirely to plaintiff's election; and in view of this it is most reasonable to construe the plaintiff's engagement to manage the business to the best of his ability, etc., not as qualifying his right of election, but as meaning that during such time as he may elect to carry on the business he will do so to the best of his ability. There was not, then, any obligation on the part of the plaintiff to enter upon the employment; and, unless the agreement of the defendants to employ him is supported by some other consideration, it would not be obligatory upon them, but might be revoked before the other party had acted upon it. . . . But here we come to a difficulty which must avoid the verdict, involving, as it does, a receiving of some $1,100 for the breach of this agreement. The damages so assessed consisted of the supposed loss of the profits of the business for a little more than a year intervening between the time of the plaintiff's discharge and the time of the trial. The difficulty to which we refer is the want of certainty in the contract respecting the period of service. The contract was, perhaps, effectual to give to the plaintiff the option to himself fix the duration of it; but unless he exercised that election, and actually determined the period so as to make certain that which, by the terms of the contract, was uncertain, he could recover only for the period of his actual service. He could not recover, as damages for the breach of the contract, the profits or remuneration which the business might have yielded during any period beyond the time when the contract was broken and the employment terminated."

For the reasons given, we conclude that there was no breach of the contract, in the case before us, by the discharge of the appellee before the expiration of any particular period of time, and that he was not entitled to recover any sum except compensation for actual service. As the instruction given by the circuit court at the request of appellee is in conflict with this conclusion, the judgment against appellant must be reversed, and it is so ordered, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Hughes, Wood, and Riddick, JJ., concur.

Bunn, Ch. J., dissenting (Filed November 27, 1897):

The judgment in this case is reversed mainly, if not altogether, on the ground of a want of mutuality in the contract or agreement sued on, in this: that the said contract, while it in effect binds the appellant company to give the appellee permanent or life employment, with certain exceptions, it does not compel the appellee to continue in its service for any particular period, or to continue at all. In support of this theory the majority of the court cites, and mainly relies upon the rule of the common law as stated in East Line & R. River R. Co. v. Scott, 72 Tex. 70, and Bolles v. Sachs, 37 Minn. 315,—the first a railroad case, and the other a trader's employment case,—and some cases therein cited. In East Line & R. River R.

Co. v. Scott, an engineer (whether while in the employ of the defendant company or not he received the injury is not stated) sued the company for personal injuries, laying his damages at a certain amount; and before the termination of the suit it was compromised by the defendant paying plaintiff the sum of $4,500, and, as the plaintiff claims in addition to this, the defendant, as part of the consideration of the compromise, was to furnish plaintiff employment in his line for such time as he might desire; and when the plaintiff demanded to be employed under this agreement, defendant refused to employ him, and the plaintiff sued for such refusal, laying damages in the sum of $20,000. There was judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $2,400, and defendant appealed to the supreme court of Texas, where the same was reversed mainly on the ground that the contract sued on was too indefinite, and wanting in mutuality, the plaintiff having the election and choice for fixing the period for his services to continue, and failed to exercise that choice; thus leaving the courts without definite basis upon which to found a judgment, as in that case, for damages for refusal to employ as agreed, which case demanded the same definiteness and clearness of proof as if the prayer had been for specific performance of the contract; and a lengthy discussion is indulged as to the doctrine of mutuality in contracts in general. The case of Bolles v. Sachs went off on pretty much the same course of reasoning as the case of East Line & R. River R. Co. v. Scott, and was somewhat the stronger, because the nature of the employment was necessarily less permanent than the other, in the very nature of things. The case at bar is quite different, and therefore the authorities cited by the majority of the court, in my opinion, are more or less inapplicable, principally because they are decisions in which it was not necessary for the courts rendering them to look away from the mere letter of the law, formulated in a different age, and in times when men's conditions as respect labor and employment, to the changed condition of things and circumstances by which we are now surrounded. The case at bar is not for refusal to employ, but for discharging unjustly and without a cause, which the contract forbade, and for refusing to keep the agreement to investigate the causes of discharge, and reinstate if found to be proper. The plea of want mutuality in the contract or agreement sued on is simply to the effect that a railway company cannot obligate itself to keep a competent engineer in its service for life, or as long as its business continues, and it needs the services of such a one, because that one may have the option to quit its service when his business, convenience, or pleasure may move him to do so. I do not care to worry the profession with a lengthy argument on this subject; but in support of my dissent I beg leave to refer to and adopt the decision in the case of Carnig v. Carr, 167 Mass. 544, 85 L. R. A. 512, and especially the very copious notes thereunder, wherein, I think, the position of the court is successfully overturned. I cannot refrain from expressing the opinion that the decision in this case is more far-reaching than any that has been rendered by this court in a long time. I am of the opinion that the contract or agreement sued on is not only not objectionable for want of mutuality, but, on the contrary, is the result of the best thought of men, both professional and practical, whose lives have been devoted to the peculiar and wonderfully complicated and intricate business of operating modern railways. It is, in fact, a necessity to the employee, and an advantage to the employer's business at the same time, that some such arrangement be had between them; and I think it should be embodied in their contracts rather than in attempts at legislation on the subject, for obvious reasons.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

H. O. SHUEY, Receiver of Seattle Savings Bank, Resp't.,
v.

George B. ADAIR, Appt.

(..... Wash.)

1. Oral evidence is inadmissible to show that the maker of a note was only an agent and signed it under an agreement with the payee that the principal only should be liable.
2. The sole apparent maker of a note when sued thereon is not entitled to have his alleged principals brought in as defendants.
3. An agent who made a note in his own name is not released by an agreement after its maturity between the payee and the principal for the substitution of the latter's note, when this was never made.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCutcheon & Gillian, for appellant:

It may be shown "that the principal was doing business in the agent's name." Such was the case here. The agency was disclosed to the bank and it had full knowledge of the true relations of the parties.

Messrs. Clise & King, for respondent:

Where an agent contracts in his own name and pledges his own credit, he will bind himself.

The English rule is that in cases in which the note is signed by the agent, and the suit is against him, he is personally liable, and that proof is not admissible as between the maker and the payee, to show that the latter knew the representative character of the signer and accepted the paper as the principal's contract.

The rule in the United States is: Upon a negotiable promissory note, made by an agent in his own name, and not disclosing on its face the name of the principal, no action lies against the principal.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant executed to the Seattle Savings Bank the following note:

2,000.00. Seattle Wash., May 6th, 1892.

One year after date, without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of the Seattle Savings Bank, at the banking house of said bank, in the city of Seattle, the sum of two thousand dollars, with interest at the rate of ten per cent per annum, payable semiannually, from date hereof until paid. And if suit shall be commenced for the recovery of any amount due upon this note, I agree to pay an attorney's fee of fifty dollars.

Geo. B. Adair,

P. O. Address, City, No. 230.

Due May 6th, 1893.

This note was discounted by the bank to Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson; and the proceeds thereof, the sum of $2,000, were paid by the bank to the above-named parties. In course of time, after the maturity of the note, the bank sued the appellant, the maker of the note. The essential parts of the amended answer were as follows: "(3) That at the time said note was so discounted as aforesaid, and in consideration thereof, and of the payment of the said proceeds to them, said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, agreed to and with said bank and this defendant that they, the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, would within a few days thereafter take up the said note, and pay the amount thereof to said bank. (4) That, at and before the discount of said note as aforesaid, said bank well knew that the same was made and executed by the defendant so as aforesaid for and in behalf of said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, and not otherwise, and that the proceeds thereof were to be used by, and for the sole benefit of, the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, and that it was discounting the same for, and for the sole benefit of, the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, and the said defendant received no part of the consideration thereof. And the said bank then and there agreed to and with defendant and said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson that it, the said bank, would look to the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson for the payment of said note, and that this defendant should never at any time be held by said bank liable upon or for the note so made by him as aforesaid, nor be called upon to pay the same. And the said bank, pursuant to said agreement, has never asked said defendant to pay said note, or any part thereof, but, on the contrary, has at all times held the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson liable and responsible to it to pay the same, pursuant to the said agreement so made as aforesaid when said note was discounted by it. (5) That there was no other consideration for the note upon which this action is brought, and no part thereof was received by defendant, or any other person for him, as is hereinabove stated, all of which was well known to said bank at and before it discounted said note. (6) Defendant further answering, says that since he so made and executed said note he has frequently demanded of said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson that they pay and take up the said note so made by the defendant as aforesaid, and that they frequently promised him they would do so, but have neglected to carry out their said promise and agreement to and with defendant and said bank. (7) Defendant further answering, says that, about two years after said bank had so discounted said note as aforesaid, it, said bank, entered into an agreement to and with the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, that it would accept the note of said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson for the amount of, and in place of, the said note so discounted by it for the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson as aforesaid, and that the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson thereupon agreed to and with said bank that they would make, execute, and deliver to said bank their note for the said amount and take up and deliver to defendant said note so discounted for them."

The plaintiff interposed a general demurrer to the said affirmative defense, which demurrer was sustained by the court. Appellant, standing upon his answer, moved the court for an order to bring in the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson as necessary and proper parties to this action, which motion was overruled by the court; and judgment was entered, as prayed, for plaintiff, and against defendant. From such judgment an appeal is taken to this court. So that it will be seen that this case involves the question whether an agent who executes a promissory note for his principal can introduce parol evidence to exonerate himself from responsibility, for it may be conceded that paragraph 4 of the answer is sufficient to raise this question. It is contended by the appellant that the authorities sustain this rule, while the respondent contends that the case falls squarely within the rule that the terms of a written contract cannot be contradicted by parol evidence. Many cases have been cited by the counsel for appellant, all of which we have carefully examined; and it must be said that upon this important question there is at least an apparent conflict of authority, and the expressions of different courts are somewhat bewildering. But, while there were expressions used by the courts in some of the cases cited by the appellant which would seem to sustain his contention, yet, when the case itself is examined, the decision in most of them will be found to be based upon a state of facts unlike the state of facts disclosed by the answer in this case; and most of them fall within one of the three following principles, which seem to be well established, viz.: (1) Where the check or order drawn by the agent discloses the principal; (2) where there is enough on the face of the written instrument to render it doubtful whether it was the intention to bind the agent or the principal; and (3) where the instrument was to be delivered upon the taking effect of some future stipulated condition, and it has been delivered before such condition is performed. In each case parol evidence is admissible to show the actual contract; as, for instance, the first case cited by appellant, viz., Brockway v. Allen, 17 Wend. 40, a case which has been cited by many of the subsequent cases, falls within the first rule announced. A note was given by the trustees of the First Baptist Church and Society of the Village of Brockport. This Society was indebted to the plaintiff for materials furnished to the society, and on account of such indebtedness the note was executed. The trustees signed the note individually, adding, "Trustees of Baptist Society." In that case it was held by the supreme court of New York that the principal was bound, and not the agent, but the court gives as the reason of its decision that the fact of the agency substantially appeared on the face of the note. In Whitney v. Wyman, 101 U. S. 392, 25 L. ed. 1050, there are some expressions, as we have before indicated, used by the court, which, if applied to the general proposition, would support appellant's contention; as, for instance, that the question is always one of intent, and the court being untrammelled by any other consideration, is bound to give it effect. It is also said: "The intent developed is alone material, and when that is ascertained it is conclusive. Where the principal is disclosed and the agent is known to be acting as such, the latter cannot be made personally liable unless he agreed to be so." The whole case, however, shows that the order for machinery plainly indicated that the same was ordered for the use and benefit of the company, the Prudential Grand Haven Fruit-Basket Company. As in the case above mentioned, the agent's name alone was signed to the order, but to it was added, "Prudential Committee, Grand Haven Fruit-Basket Company." And, while it is true that these words are merely descriptio personarum, yet it brought the case within the rule announced above, that there was sufficient on the face of the order to disclose the principal, or at least to render ambiguous the meaning of the order, so far as the responsibility was concerned. In Hill v. Ely (Pa.) 9 Am. Dec. 376, the syllabus of the case was as follows: "In an action by an indorsee against the indorser of a note in blank, parol evidence is admissible to show that at the time of the indorsement the indorsee agreed that he would not have recourse upon it against the indorser; and that the note so indorsed was delivered upon that express condition." The court, in its opinion [5 Serg. & R. 364], says: "The notes of Jabez Lamb, were drawn in favor of William Hill, and by him handed to Elisha Ely, without indorsement. Elisha Ely then said, 'Hill you must indorse these notes,' to which Hill replied, 'That is not our understanding.' Elisha Ely rejoined: 'They are made payable to you; how will you convey them to me? You must indorse them in order that I may collect them.' William Hill then said, 'I indorse them, but remember, I am not to be held responsible for the payment by this indorsement;' and Elisha Ely accepted the notes on that condition." This case was especially decided by the court on the ground of actual fraud, and, as will be readily perceived from the statement given by the court, the transaction was actually fraudulent; and, as a matter of course, the defense of fraud or mistake is always available. The case of Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, 18 U. S. 5 Wheat. 326, 5 L. ed. 100, was a case where there was an ambiguity on the face of the instrument, which was a check, and which falls within the second rule supra. The court, after arguing this case, says: "But it is enough for the purposes of the defendant, to establish that there existed, on the face of the paper, circumstances from which it might reasonably be inferred that it was either one or the other;" having reference to the question whether it was the check of the party who signed, or whether the check was given for the benefit of the bank. Michels v. Olmstead, 14 Fed. Rep. 219, is another case where the want of the happening of some future condition provided for was pleaded in exoneration of the agent. In this case the agreement stipulated for machinery to be furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant at specified prices, and the defense was that it was the understanding at the time the contract was made that the defendant, who had signed the contract, was not to be held liable personally in the event that the corporation for which the machinery was ordered was not formed; but the court recognized and stated the principle that "the contract read in evidence must be taken to set out the whole of the agreements of the parties, and no change of it can be made by verbal testimony unless the instrument itself shows on its face that certain matters pertaining to it are left undetermined; and when this is the case testimony may be admitted to complete the contract, so to speak." But that is an entirely different proposition from the one at bar, where the conditions of the contract are absolutely and plainly disputed, and one defendant is sought to be substituted for another without any future conditions agreed upon not having been complied with, and without any indication or ambiguity on the face of the note as to who the actual payor was. The next case cited (Dix v. Akers, 30 Ind. 481), we think, has no bearing on the subject in controversy; and the same might be said of Rawlins v. Fuller, 31 Ind. 255. It simply decides that "one who contracts merely as the agent of another, and has no personal interest in the contract, is not the trustee of an express trust within the meaning of the statute, and cannot, under the Code, sue on such contract in his own name." There was no promise to pay the rent here to Fuller, and no claim of title whatever in Fuller to the property, and the complaint expressly stated that the property belonged to Sarah Floyd. Small v. Smith, 1 Denio, 588, is another case of fraud, where a note was indorsed under an agreement that it should not be deposited until a future condition had been complied with. And the court especially found that it was clear that the note was delivered in violation of the agreement on which it had been indorsed by the defendant. The case of Kost v. Bender, 25 Mich. 515, simply decides that "the general rule that a purchaser from a bona fide holder of negotiable paper, takes with it all the rights of such holder, whether he has notice of any infirmity, as between the original parties, or not, is subject to the exception that, when the payee becomes such purchaser, he takes it subject to all equities and defenses originally existing."

We do not think that the citation from Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 1875 et seq., states the rule contended for by the appellant, although it is somewhat difficult to determine what the author's views are on this particular point. In substance, the announcement is that the general doctrine is now that, where the purchaser takes a general bill or note with notice, he is subject to defense, like the payee. Thus, the maker may set up against such holder that he had retired from a partnership before the firm note was delivered, or that the note was given especially on condition of another surety being added,—a proposition which we have discussed above,—or that the consideration was illegal, or on conditions as to purchase of goods or other consideration, or he may show that the note was obtained by fraud, or he could show that it was for accommodation for a particular purpose, which had failed or been disregarded, or that the accommodated party had fraudulently diverted the paper; but the announcement is made that the mere fact of its being accommodation paper constitutes no defense, even against a party with notice. While the note in question, according to the answer, is not technically accommodation paper, not being made for the benefit of the payee, it was really for the accommodation of Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson; and the same reasons, it seems to us, would apply for making the fact of its being drawn for the accommodation of the parties mentioned above no defense, even against a party with notice, as, for instance, the payee in this case. Edwards, Bills & Notes, p. 316, is not very definite on this subject, but what is said, we think, must be construed rather against the contention of the appellant. Murray v. Reed, 48 Pac. 348 [17 Wash. 1], simply decided that "where a note is executed with an agreement that a new one shall be substituted when the exact amount of the debt is ascertained, a subsequent delivery of the new note to the payee renders the original note unenforceable in the hands of one who purchased the same after maturity with notice of the agreement;" citing 3 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 1876, and Small v. Smith, 1 Denio, 588. This is simply the announcement of the admitted doctrine that one who purchases a note after its maturity takes it subject to any equities which really existed in its favor. We can scarcely see what application it has to the case at bar. Merchants' Exch. Bank v. Luckow, 37 Minn. 542, is not in point on the question under discussion, but was probably cited to support the next proposition, viz., that the receiver in this case stood in no different relation to the appellant than did the bank,—a proposition which is, we think, indisputable. The case of Metcalf v. Williams, 104 U. S. 93, 26 L. ed. 665, is another case where the instrument, upon its face, was ambiguous as to who was the actual payee, and it was decided by the court on that proposition; and the court cites the case of Kean v. Davis, 21 N. J. L. 683, 47

Am. Dec. 182, in regard to which case it says: "The court of errors and appeals of New Jersey, in an elaborate opinion by Chief Justice Green, decided that parol proof was admissible to show that the bill was the bill of the company, and not of the defendant individually; and held that, although where a written instrument is not ambiguous or uncertain on its face, parol proof cannot be resorted to to show what was the real intention of the parties; yet, that in cases of ambiguity on the face of the instrument, as in that case, it might be introduced to explain which of two doubtful constructions was the intent of the parties." Merchants' Bch. Bank v. Luckow, 35 N. W. 434 [87 Minn. 542], is another case where the defense was that the written instrument was to become operative only on the happening of some contingent future event, as, on its being signed by some other person, and falls within the rule above mentioned, and cites Michels v. Olmstead, 14 Fed. Rep. 219, deciding that "it is always admissible to show by parol that a document was conditioned on an event that never occurred." Nothing else is decided in this case.

The case that most nearly sustains the construction claimed by appellant is a Pennsylvania case (Roberts v. Austin, 5 Whart. 313); and it may here be said that the Pennsylvania cases are generally quoted as sustaining the doctrine that parol evidence may be introduced to release a payor of the responsibility of payment, where it can be shown that he signed as agent with the knowledge of the payee; but we think these cases, as we shall hereafter show, have been misunderstood. In this case the defendant gave the following note:

Dolls. 187.50. Kensington, Philada., October 1st, 1886.

Four months after date, pay to the order of Mr. Charles B. Austin, agent of the Union Glass Works, one hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents, for value received, and charge the same to the account of, yours, &c.,
Wm. Roberts, Jr.

Mr. Richard Jukes, Newark, N. J.

Across the face was written; "Accepted, for Richard Jukes. Richard Jukes, Jr." Indorsed. "Chas. B. Austin, Agt. Union Glass Works." The affidavit of defense showed that the payor was the agent for Richard Jukes, and purchased merchandise for which this note was given, that the name of the principal was disclosed to the plaintiff before the time of said purchase, and that the said merchandise was furnished to the said principal upon the credit and for the use of this said principal, and averred that he had received no consideration whatever for said bill. The district court, after argument, gave judgment for the plaintiff, for want of a sufficient affidavit for defense, and it was taken to the supreme court of Pennsylvania on a writ of error. There is no argument by the attorneys reported in this case, and the opinion is exceedingly meager; the argument of the opinion principally going to the question of the real meaning of the affidavit, rather than its legal effect. The case of Milligan v. Lyle, 24 La. Ann. 144, is another meager case, where it was held that an agent who had given a draft for his principal was exonerated upon showing that he was simply an overseer upon a plantation, and that the parties in whose favor the draft was given for work knew that they were working for the principal and not for the agent. The case of Westman v. Krumweide, 30 Minn. 318, is another case deciding that "parol evidence is admissible to show that a contract not under seal, delivered by the maker to the party in whose favor it runs, was not intended to be operative as a contract from its delivery, but only on the happening of some future contingent event." Neaves v. North State Min. Co. [90 N. C. 412], 47 Am. Dec. [Rep.] 529, is evidently a miscitation, as the case is not reported in that volume. The appellant also cites Mechem, Agency, § 449, and cases cited. We think the section cited sustains the announcement that we have made. It is simply that: "Where an agent has entered into a contract which in terms charges himself, parol evidence is not admissible to discharge him by showing that he intended to charge the principal, although it is admissible to show that it was the intention to charge himself personally; but where the contract bears upon its face evidence that the person signing was in fact an agent, and where the contract is so framed as to render it uncertain whether the agent or the principal was intended to be bound, parol evidence may be received to show that it was the intention to bind the principal, and not the agent." And it is shown conclusively, in the opinion of the author, that evidence of this kind is not admissible for the purpose of contradicting the express provisions of a contract. He proceeds: "But although parol evidence may not be admissible to release the agent, it may be made use of to charge the principal. Thus, the principal, as will be seen hereafter, may be charged as such by parol evidence upon a single contract made by his agent, even though the contract gives no indication on its face of an intention to charge any other person than the signer. And this doctrine applies as well to those contracts which are required to be in writing as to those to whose validity a writing is not essential. This rule is not obnoxious to the principle which forbids the contradiction of written instruments by parol testimony, for the effect is not to show that the person appearing to be bound is not bound, but to show that some other person is bound, also."

And as casting some light upon the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which are cited by the appellant in favor of his contention, and as showing how the Supreme Court of the United States construed the Pennsylvania cases, which are conceded the cases which support the admissibility of this kind of testimony, if they are supported by the cases at all, we cite the case of Bast v. First Nat. Bank, 101 U. S. 93, 25 L. ed. 794, a Pennsylvania case appealed from the circuit court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, and where the Supreme Court of the United States would have followed the decisions of the Pennsylvania courts in a matter of this kind. There the court said, through Chief Justice Waite: "No principle of evidence is better settled at the common law than that when persons put their contracts in writing, it is, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, 'conclusively presumed that the whole engagement, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, was reduced to writing.' . . . In Pennsylvania, the stringency of this rule has been very considerably relaxed, but we have been referred to no case where, in the absence of fraud or mistake, parol evidence has been admitted to alter the plain and unequivocal terms of a written instrument. In Martin v. Borens, 67 Pa. 468, the court says: 'Where parties, without any fraud or mistake, have deliberately put their engagements in writing, the law declares the writing to be, not only the best, but the only, evidence of their agreement; and we are not disposed to relax the rule. It has been found to be a wholesome one, and now that parties are allowed to testify in their own behalf, the necessity of adhering strictly to it is all the more imperative.' In this case the Pennsylvania decisions are extensively reviewed, and the exceptions to the rule of the common law which they recognize carefully stated; but the conclusion is that, 'as a general rule, it (parol evidence) is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument.' Again, in Bornhart v. Riddle, 29 Pa. 96, this language is used: 'Where parties have deliberately put their engagements in writing, and no ambiguity arises out of the terms employed, you shall not add to, contradict, or vary the language mutually chosen as most fit to express the intention of their minds. What if parol evidence prove, never so clearly, that they used such and such words in making their bargain; the writing signed, if it contain not those words, is final and conclusive evidence that they were set aside in favor of the other expressions that are found in the written instrument. . . . It is not always easy to determine when in Pennsylvania parol evidence is admissible to explain a written instrument; but in Anspach v. Bast, 62 Pa. 356, it is expressly declared that 'no case goes the length of ruling that such evidence is admitted to change the promise itself, without proof, or even allegation, of fraud or mistake. The contrary has been repeatedly decided.' To the same effect is the case of Hacker v. National Oil Ref. Co. 78 Pa. 98, as well as many others that might be cited." In this case of Bast v. First Nat. Bank, the judgment was assigned to the bank as collateral security for the payment of certain notes, with authority, in case said notes were not paid at maturity, to sell said judgment, and apply the proceeds to their payment, with the provision that the bank should not, before the maturity of the notes, take measures to collect the judgment assigned, without the consent of Bast. The offer was to prove a contemporaneous agreement that it should do so. The court concludes by saying, "This is a clear contradiction of the terms of the written contract, in a matter where there is no pretense of ambiguity, and where there has been no fraud or mistake;" and it was not allowed. The authorities, however, holding that this kind of testimony is inadmissible, speak with no uncertain sound; and in Cragin v. Lovell, 109 U. S. 194, 27 L. ed. 908, the 89 L. R. A.

cases of Metcalf v. Williams and Mechanics' Bank v. Bank of Columbia, cited by the appellant, are distinguished, and shown not to come within the rule that "upon a negotiable promissory note, made by an agent in his own name, and not disclosing on its face the name of the principal, no action lies against the principal" — a rule which is distinctly announced in Cragin v. Lovell. And this, it will be seen, goes beyond the proposition in this case, where it is simply sought to hold the alleged agent or payor, and where the payee has elected to sue the payor or maker of the note. In Nash v. Towne, 73 U. S. 5 Wall. 689, 18 L. ed. 527, it is decided that "where an agent has entered into a written contract in which he appears as principal, parol evidence is inadmissible to show, with a view of exonerating him, that he disclosed his agency, and mentioned the name of his principal at the time the contract was executed;" and the court, in concluding its opinion in this case, said: "Cases may be found, also, where it is held that the plaintiff may prove by parol that the other contracting party named in the contract was but the agent of an undisclosed principal and in that state of the case he may have his remedy against either, at his election;" citing Thomson v. Davenport, 9 Barn. & C. 78: "Evidence to that effect will be admitted to charge the principal or to enable him to sue in his own name; but the agent who bids himself is never allowed to contradict the writing by proving that he contracted only as agent, and not as principal;" citing Jones v. Littledale, 6 Ad. & El. 486; 1 Parsons, Contr. 5th ed. 64; Titus v. Kyle, 10 Ohio St. 444; 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 6th Am. ed. 421. In Sharswood's Byles, Bills, p. *37, the rule is stated as follows: "An agent will be personally liable to third persons on his drawing, indorsing or accepting, unless he either sign his principal's name only, or expressly state in writing his ministerial character, and that he signs only in that character; 'unless,' to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, . . . 'he states upon the face of the bill that he subscribes it for another,' unless he says, plainly, 'I am the mere scribe.' Thus, where the defendant, agent of a banker, drew the following bill, 'Pay to the order of A. B. £50 value received, which place to the account of the Durham Bank, as advised,' and subscribed his own name, it was held that the defendant was personally answerable, and he alone, though the plaintiff, the payee, knew that he was only agent." And the final announcement is made: "The rule of law as to simple contracts in writing, other than bills and notes, is, that parol evidence is admissible to charge unnamed principals, and so it is to give them the benefit of the contract; . . . but it is inadmissible for the purpose of discharging the agent, who signs, as if he were principal, in his own name. . . . And the rule of law is reasonable, for in the two former cases the evidence is consistent with the instrument, for it admits the agent to be entitled or bound; but in the latter case such evidence would be inconsistent with the terms of the instrument." In support of this rule, see Davis v. England, 141 Mass. 587; Wing v. Glück, 56 Iowa, 473, 41 Am. Rep. 118; Hypes v. Griffin, 89 Ill. 135, 31 Am. Rep. 71; Bank v. Cook, 38 Ohio St. 442.

Many of these cases go further than it is necessary to go to sustain the demurrer in this case. See also 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 415, 416, and cases cited.

We are satisfied, from such investigation as we have been able to make, that the answer in this case was demurrable, and that parol evidence could not have been admitted to prove the facts alleged in the answer. It is contended by the appellant that in any event the motion to make Rinehart et al. parties to this action should have been sustained, for the reasons that the law abhors a multiplicity of suits, and that all the rights might have been determined in one action; but, the plaintiff here having a right to elect, the defendant cannot invoke this rule in this case, for it would delay the rights of plaintiff for the defendant's benefit. The plaintiff had a right to sue the real party, as disclosed by the instrument itself; and, having done so, if the defendant is entitled to contributions from his alleged principals, that is a matter in which this plaintiff has no interest, and his rights cannot be affected or delayed by it.

As to the seventh paragraph of the answer, vis. that the bank entered into an agreement some two years after the note had been discounted, and evidently a year after it had become due, with said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson, that it would accept their note for the amount of, and in place of, the said note so discounted by it for the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson as aforesaid, and that the said Ballard, Rinehart, Holmes, & Robertson thereupon agreed to and with said bank that they would make, execute, and deliver to said bank their note for the said amount, and take up and deliver to defendant said note so discounted to them, we do not think it states sufficient. This was not done. Either party could have withdrawn. It was no part of the original agreement. There was no consideration for any such contract, and there is no allegation that the new note was ever tendered. A may enter into an agreement with B that, if B will tender him his note at a certain time, he will deliver to B a note which A holds against C. But such agreement would be no defense in an action on the note against C providing the agreement had not been executed. It is also claimed that in any event this demurrer should not have been sustained, for the reason that the defendant pleaded want of consideration; but the want of consideration that he urges depends upon the oral testimony which he seeks to introduce in this case under his pleadings, and which we have found is not competent testimony. Consequently the plea of want of consideration falls when the foundation for such a plea is stricken from the case.

This court has always been of the opinion that the faith and credit attaching to written agreements should not be easily destroyed, and the best of reasons could be adduced for holding a contract of this kind sacred, and unchangeable by the admission of parol testimony,—except, of course, in cases of fraud or mistake. These reasons have been so often advanced by courts and law writers, and are so well understood by the profession, that it is not necessary to repeat them here.

The judgment will be affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

GAGE HOTEL COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

UNION NATIONAL BANK.

(171 Ill. 581.)

After a check is given, the depositor cannot, in Illinois, by arrangement with the bank, prevent the application of future deposits to its payment.

(February 14, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enforce payment of a bank check. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. M. Cox, with Messrs. Ashcraft & Gordon, for appellant:

The appellant was entitled to receive payment of the check on presentation.

NOTE.—As to the right to stop payment of a check, see note to Canterbury v. Bank of Sparta (Wis.) 80 L. R. A. 845.

Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 85; Chicago, M. & F. Ins. Co. v. Stanford, 28 Ill. 168; Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 80 Ill. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 185; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 288, 89 Am. Dec. 486; National Bank v. Indiana Bkg. Co. 114 Ill. 488.

The attempt to stop payment of the check was a fraud upon the appellant, of which the bank had notice.

Thom v. Sinsheimer, 66 Ill. App. 555; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 2d ed. § 1596; Ames v. Merriam, 98 Mass. 294.

The appellee was legally bound to pay the check, if the depositor had sufficient funds when the check was presented.

Barton v. People, 35 Ill. App. 578; Queen v. Hazelton, L. R. 2 C. C. 184; Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 85; Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 288, 89 Am. Dec. 486; Fourth Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 68 Ill. 898; Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Jones, 187 Ill. 684, 12 L. R. A. 492; Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 80 Ill. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 185.

Messrs. Tenney, McConnell, Coffeen, & Harding, for appellee:

The bank was not bound to pay the check out of funds which it received after the check was drawn, and with specific directions not to pay them out on that check.

The principle of the cases is that the depositor, having a right to the money, may transfer his right to another by drawing a check, and that the bank is bound to recognize this transfer and pay the money to the holder, subject to the contingency that the money which was thus assigned is not otherwise appropriated before the check is presented.

When Knill drew his check his balance was only $98.53, and he therefore had no right to draw a check for $300. The initial step in the transaction was a violation of the contract under which appellant claims the right to recover.

Pabst Brewing Co. v. Reeves, 43 Ill. App. 154.

When this check came to appellant's hands, payment of it had already been refused because the drawer had not then funds sufficient to meet it.

The next step was the transfer of the check from Payne to the Gage Hotel Company for value, and without notice of the want, or failure, of consideration between Knill and Payne and of the fact that it was already dishonored. Still no liability had attached to the bank.

The bank was under no obligation to anyone, either upon the check or because of the check. It could with safety have paid to Knill the small balance standing to his credit. Knill was under no obligation to make further deposits, the bank was under no obligation to receive them, even if tendered.

The bank and Knill, then, were at liberty to deal further with each other or not, as they saw fit, and no limitation on this right was created by the fact that this check was outstanding.

Richardson v. International Bank, 11 Ill. App. 532.

While the drawing of the check operates as an assignment pro tanto of the fund, this is so only as between the drawer and the payee; and it has no effect whatever upon the rights of the bank until the check is presented for payment.

Bank of Antigo v. Union Trust Co. 60 Ill. App. 434, 149 Ill. 343, 23 L. R. A. 611.

Cartwright, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Henry C. Knill was a depositor in the bank of appellee, and on June 21, 1893, drew his check on appellee for $300 payable to the order of Leroy Payne, and delivered it to the payee. Payne on the same day indorsed the check, and delivered it to appellant, who paid him $300 for it. Appellant deposited the check to the credit of its account with its bank, the Union Trust Company of Chicago; and the latter sent it through the clearing house, and it was presented to appellee for payment on June 23. On the day the check was drawn the amount of Knill's deposit was $98.53, but he made subsequent deposits, and when the check was presented he had on deposit with appellee funds in excess of the amount of the check. Appellee refused payment on the ground that Knill had ordered it not to pay the check, and the paying teller marked it, "Payment stopped." On June 24 the dishonored check was returned to appellant by the Union Trust Company, and appellant on that day again presented it to appellee, which still had sufficient money to Knill's credit to pay it; but payment was again refused on the ground that it had been stopped by Knill. Thereupon the appellant brought this suit against appellee for the amount of the check. A jury was waived, and the cause tried before the court, resulting in a finding and judgment for appellee. On appeal the judgment was affirmed by the appellate court for the first district, which granted a certificate of importance, and the case has been brought to this court.

There is no dispute as to the material facts as above stated, and the rights of the parties depend upon the question whether appellee was justified in its refusal to pay the check because of the order of Knill that it should not be paid. This question is presented by the action of the court in refusing and modifying propositions of law presented at the trial. The relation of the banker to the check holder has been frequently considered by this court, and the right of the check holder to payment on presentation of the check, provided there are sufficient funds on deposit to meet it, has been recognized and upheld in every case. This court has constantly held that when the check of a depositor is presented to the banker, if the deposit is sufficient to pay the check, it is an absolute appropriation of the amount of the check to the holder, and that the contract implied by law between the banker and his depositor, for the benefit of whoever may become the holder of a check, is one upon which such holder can maintain an action. A different rule prevails in some other jurisdictions, but this one has been affirmed by many courts and leading text-writers as the logical one. The case of Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 35, has been generally regarded as the leading case in this country stating the nature of the contract, and affirming the right of the check holder to sue and recover from the bank for refusing to honor a depositor's check under such circumstances. In that case, after stating the universal custom which enters into, and forms a part of, every contract between a banker and depositor, it was said (p. 40): "This universal custom shows us what the contract of all the parties is. It shows us that the banker, when he receives the deposit, agrees with the depositor to pay it out, on the presentation of his checks, in such sums as those checks may call for, and to the person presenting them; and with the whole world he agrees that whoever shall become the owner of such check shall, upon presentation, thereby become the owner, and entitled to receive the amount called for by the check, provided the drawer shall at that time have that amount on deposit. Who shall object to that portion of the contract which the law raises by implication on the part of the banker to the third person,—to anybody and to everybody?" And it was further said: "We hold, then, that the check of a depositor upon his banker, delivered to another for value, transfers to that other the title to so much of the deposit as the check calls for, which may again be transferred to another by delivery; and when presented to the banker, he becomes the holder of the money to the use of the owner of the check, and is bound to account to him for that amount, providing the party drawing the check has funds to that amount on deposit, subject to his check at the time it is presented. In Fourth Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 68 Ill. 398, this court said (p. 402): "The universal custom informs us what the contract of all the parties to such transaction is. It informs us that the banker, when he receives the deposit, agrees with the depositor to pay it out, on the presentation of his checks, in such sums as those checks may specify, and to the person presenting them; and with the whole world the banker agrees that whoever shall become the owner of such check shall, upon presentation thereof, become thereby the owner, and entitled to receive the amount specified in the check, provided the drawer shall at that time have that amount on deposit." The same doctrine has been affirmed in the following cases: Bickford v. First Nat. Bank, 42 Ill. 238, 89 Am. Dec. 436; Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 80 Ill. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 185; National Bank v. Indiana Bkg. Co. 114 Ill. 488; Metropolitan Nat. Bank v. Jones, 137 Ill. 684, 12 L. R. A. 492; Bank of Antigo v. Union Trust Co. 149 Ill. 348, 28 L. R. A. 611. It is also the rule that the drawer of a check cannot stop payment of it after it has passed into the hands of a bona fide holder. Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana County Bank, 80 Ill. 212, 22 Am. Rep. 185.

These decisions are not controverted by appellee, but the argument in its behalf is that, after the check was given, Knill could make an arrangement with appellee that future deposits should not be applied to its payment. When the check was drawn the amount to Knill's credit was not sufficient to pay it, and after Knill had given the order not to pay it the bank received deposits before the presentation which increased his balance to more than the amount of the check. It is insisted that Knill was free to make, and appellee to receive, deposits under an arrangement that this check should not be paid. Of course, if Knill could make such an arrangement on June 21 as to further deposits, he or any other depositor in a bank could make a special contract, when opening an account, that only certain checks should be paid, or at any time limit the liability of the bank by a secret arrangement between himself and the bank as to checks that might be drawn in the future, in any manner that they saw fit. We think such a proposition plainly unsound, and in conflict with the decisions above referred to. If such a special agreement could be made, a person about to take a check could not rely upon the contract implied by the law, but would be compelled to go to the bank and ascertain whether the account had been opened under any special or private arrangement between the banker and depositor, or whether any instructions had been given by the depositor as to what checks should be paid. Even if he should find that there was no agreement or instruction, and should take the check, he could not then rely upon the banker's contract to pay it if the funds were on deposit, since they might be checked out or withdrawn, and a new deposit made under an agreement or instruction that he should not be paid. The basis of the decisions has been that by universal custom there is a contract between the banker and depositor, created by the deposit and receipt of the money, with the whole world, and for the benefit of every person who shall become the holder of a check. If the funds are in the bank when the check is drawn, the drawing is an appropriation, as between the drawer and the payee, of the sum of money named in the check, which is to lie in the bank until called for by a presentation of the check. It is true that in such a case there is no privity between the bank and the check holder until presentment, and that priority in drawing a check does not give priority of right to the fund, as against the banker, but that such priority of right is determined by the order of presentation. In Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 85, it was said (p. 40): "Surely every sound lawyer will at once perceive a privity of contract between the banker and the holder of the check, created by the implied promise held out to the world by the banker, on the one side, and the receiving of the check for value, and presenting it, on the other. It is a familiar principle of daily illustration, that a promise made to the public that the performance of a particular act shall entitle the person performing the act to a particular right is a valid assumption to such person. The promise on the one hand, and the performance on the other, creates a privity between the parties as intimate and as obligatory as if the promise had originally been made to the particular person." In 3 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (§ 1638), the author says: "The objection to the check holder's suing the bank, on the ground that there is no privity between him and the bank, seems to us utterly untenable. It is true that there is no privity before the presentment of the check, but by that very act they are brought in privity, and the check holder's right to sue the bank completed. Knill had a right to draw his check in the reasonable expectation that he would have funds at the time of presentment, adequate to meet it, and he did have sufficient funds to his credit at the time of presentment. By giving the check he assumed the obligation that the funds should be there. Of course he might have withdrawn his deposit before presentment, or have declined to make a further deposit to meet the check, and have thus committed a fraud upon appellant; but, if he had done so, it would have been his fraud, and not that of appellee, and appellee would have been in no wise responsible for it. If does not aid appellee that Knill might have committed a fraud in that way, so that appellant is no worse off than it would have been if he alone had committed the fraud. Its duty was to stand indifferent and perform its obligation. When it accepted his account, it did so with an agreement with the whole world that whoever should become the owner of his check should, upon presentation thereof, become the owner and entitled to receive the amount specified in the check,—not as a matter of favor, but as a matter of right,—provided Knill at the time had the amount on deposit. This agreement was for the benefit of such check holder, and we think no special contract could be made to abrogate it, without the consent of the check holder. Appellant in taking the check had a right to rely upon the contract implied by the law and was entitled to enforce it.

The judgments of the Appellate Court and Circuit Court are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court.

v.
City of CHICAGO.

(171 Ill. 388.)

An ordinance precluding competition for a street-paving contract by requiring the use of asphaltum which can be obtained only from premises owned and controlled by one private corporation is void as against public policy in creating a monopoly, although the ordinance provides that the work shall be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder.

(February 14, 1896.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County enforcing payment of an assessment for the paving of Gladys avenue. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Wilson, Moore, & McIlvaine and Charles D. Richards, for appellants:

The provision limiting the material to asphaltum obtained from Pitch lake in the island of Trinidad, is contrary to law, being in restraint of trade, and contrary to public policy.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 362, note 3, p. 544; Dean v. Charlton, 23 Wis. 590, 99 Am. Dec. 205; Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Painter, 85 Cal. 699; Dolan v. New York, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 397; Burgess v. Jefferson, 21 La. Ann. 143.

Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a petition for judgment confirming a special assessment to defray the expense of improving Gladys avenue, in the city of Chicago. Objections interposed by the appellants were overruled, and judgment entered in accordance with the prayer of the petition. This is an appeal to bring the judgment into review in this court.

The ordinance provides that "the cementing material shall be a paving cement prepared from refined Trinidad asphaltum, obtained from Pitch lake, in the island of Trinidad;" and the objection is, that the effect of this provision is to prevent competition among those desiring to contract to perform such work and furnish the material necessary to complete the improvement. It is conceded this alleged objection does not appear from the face of the ordinance, but appellants offered to produce evidence to show said Pitch lake, in the island of Trinidad, is, and was when the ordinance was passed, the private property, and under the absolute control, of the Barber Asphalt Company; that said Barber Asphalt Company is a private corporation, having its principal office in the city of Chicago; that there were at least five other companies or corporations having offices in the city of Chicago engaged in the business of selling asphaltum procured in the island of Trinidad for street paving, but not procured at Pitch lake, in said island, but which asphaltum was equal, for street-paving purposes, to the asphaltum obtained from said Pitch lake; and that all of said companies and said Barber Asphalt Company were competitors in the business of supplying asphaltum for paving streets in the city of Chicago.

It is a well-settled general rule that all contracts, in which the public are interested, which tend to prevent competition, whenever a statute or known rule of law requires competition, are void. Chicago v. Rumpff, 45 Ill. 90, 92 Am. Dec. 196; People, Peabody, v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497; Poss v. Cummings, 149 Ill. 353; 1 Addison, Contr. p. 273; 2 Beach, Modern Law of Contr. § 1108. The statute by the authority of which the city council enacted the ordinance under consideration provides as follows: "All contracts for the making of any public improvement, to be paid for in whole or in part by a special assessment, and any work or other public improvement, when the expense thereof shall exceed $500, shall be let to the lowest responsible bidder, in the manner to be prescribed by ordinance—such contract to be approved by the mayor or president of the board of trustees; provided, however, any such contract may be entered into by the proper officer without advertising for bids, and without such approval, by a vote of two thirds of all the aldermen or trustees elected." 1 Starr & C. Anno. Stat. 1896, chap. 24, p. 777, ¶ 166. The ordinance in question provided the contract to perform the work should be awarded to the lowest responsible bidders. If the requirement that the asphaltum to be used in the improvement should be obtained from Pitch lake, in the island of Trinidad, tended to restrict competition among those who might desire to become bidders for the performance of the work of improving the street, or tended to create a monopoly in favor of anyone having for sale the asphaltum necessary to be used in the work of paving the said street, it would fall under the ban of this general rule of the law, and must be declared inoperative and void. It does not appear from the face of the ordinance that the effect is necessarily to so prevent competition or create a monopoly; but the proffered proof, which the court excluded, unmistakably disclosed that the asphaltum required by the ordinance to be used in making the street was a product which could only be obtained by purchase from a single corporation. The direct effect of the requirement, therefore, was to create a monopoly in favor of that corporation and to restrict competition in bidding accordingly. The principle under which the rejected evidence under consideration must be, as it is, held by us to be competent, came before this court for discussion in the case of Chicago v. Rumpff and Chicago v. Turner, which cases were consolidated and decided together, and are reported in 45 Ill. 90. The conclusion of the court was that the ordinance then under consideration tended necessarily to create a monopoly, and was therefore void; and the doctrine of the case is approved in People, Peabody, v. Chicago Gas Trust Co. 130 Ill. 268, 8 L. R. A. 497, and Foss v. Cummings, 149 Ill. 353.

The only cases to which we have been referred which support the view that a city, when providing by ordinance for a public improvement, where the work is to be done and materials to be furnished by the lowest responsible bidder, may, by provisions in the ordinance, restrict the bidders, or provide for the use of an article solely controlled by one person, are cases where the city desired to use some patented article or process covered by patent. The supreme courts of Michigan and of New York (in the former state, by a divided court) entertained the view that an ordinance which provided a contract should be let to the lowest bidder for the improvement of the street by the use of a designated patented pavement was valid; and the decisions of the supreme court of Kansas in Yarnold v. Lawrence, 15 Kan. 126, is frequently cited as an authority in support of the same view of the question. In Yarnold v. Lawrence, 15 Kan. 126, the decision was rested upon the ground the statute of that state did not require the contract in question should be let to the lowest bidder, and for that reason that court upheld the ordinance, without deciding the question here involved. The supreme court of Wisconsin and other states have adopted the view that such ordinances are void; and Mr. Dillon, after discussing the question in the first volume of his work on Municipal Corporations (in § 467), says, "The question is close, but there seems, so far, to be a tendency in the courts to adopt the Wisconsin view." In all of the cases where an ordinance has been held valid which provided for the use of some patented article or process, the argument most relied upon by the courts to justify the view the ordinance was valid is that municipal corporations ought not to be denied the right to avail themselves of the advantages arising from the discoveries and inventions of the age, and that when the general government protected a discovery or invention by a patent, which created a monopoly therein, competition in the purchase or use of such patented article or process became impossible, and that the monopoly which it was urged the ordinance tended to create in fact had legal existence entirely independently of the ordinance, and that, therefore, the ordinance did not have any effect to create a monopoly, or prevent competition among bidders. In Mr. Dillon's view, these cases are rather overcome by the current of authority; but, if they should be accepted as stating the correct rule, they have little application to the case in hand, for the reason the monopoly created under the ordinance under consideration is not in favor of a patented article. The asphaltum offered for sale by the Barber Asphalt Company has no superior legal right in the markets, and is not entitled to be given any by the terms of the ordinance, nor is it lawful for the ordinance to give it an improper preference; but it should be left to depend upon its merits for any monopoly it may obtain in the good opinion of the public. But it may be said that cities, in the construction of public improvements, ought to have, as have individuals in the construction of private structures, the right to select for use the article or substance best fitted and adapted to the purpose, and that to deprive the public of the right to select and use such superior articles is opposed to public policy, and positively disadvantageous to the public. The force of this argument must, of course, be admitted; but upon reflection it is readily seen it is not necessary to foster and create a monopoly, and prevent competition in the letting of public contracts, by providing in ordinances that a certain substance or article, and no other, shall be used. If it be the judgment of the city council that the most suitable and best material to be used in any contemplated improvement is the product of some particular mine or quarry, or some substance or compound which is in the control of some particular firm or corporation, the ordinance might be so framed as to make such production, substance, or compound the standard of quality and fitness, and to require that material equal in all respects to it should be employed. An ordinance making it indispensable that an article or substance in the control of but a certain person or corporation shall be used in the construction of a public work must necessarily create a monopoly in favor of such person or corporation, and also limit the persons bidding to those who may be able to make the most advantageous terms with the favored person or corporation. If all the ordinances adopted by the city council of the city of Chicago providing for the paving of streets and public places in the city should select the stock in trade of a particular firm or corporation as the only material to be used in making such street improvements, the evil would be intolerable; and, if they may lawfully select such article in one ordinance, it cannot be unlawful to make it the settled policy of the city that material for paving streets shall be purchased of but one seller.

Because of the error of the court in ruling the proffered testimony was inadmissible, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. An original package is that package which is delivered by the importer to the carrier at the initial point of shipment, in the exact condition in which it was shipped.
2. The determination of the internal revenue department that a package is a proper and original package for purposes of taxation does not show that it is an original package of commerce.
3. A pine box in which are packed for convenience in shipment packages of cigarettes, each of which contains ten cigarettes and is sealed with an internal revenue stamp, without any other packing or inclosure around or about them except the box itself, is the original package of commerce; and when that is opened the packages of cigarettes are subject to the police power of the state as a part of the common mass of property therein.

A PPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Superior Court of Cedar Rapids County denying a petition for writ of habeas corpus to obtain petitioner's release from custody of the sheriff of Linn County to which he had been committed for violation of the anti-cigarette law. Affirmed.

Statement by Deemer, Ch. J.:

This is a habeas corpus proceeding in which plaintiff and appellant alleged that he was unlawfully restrained of his liberty by defendant, who is sheriff of Linn county, under a warrant of commitment issued by one Rall, a justice of the peace in and for said county, in pursuance of a judgment of conviction for violation of what is familiarly known as the "Anti-Cigarette Law." Plaintiff alleges that his commitment was and is illegal, for the reason that while he sold cigarettes, yet that the same were sold in the "original package" in which imported, and that the law under which he was convicted is unconstitutional in so far as it applies to such sales. The trial court remanded the petitioner, and from the order and judgment so entered he appeals.

Messrs. John M. Redmond and W. W. Fuller, for appellant:

It was admitted by the Supreme Court of the United States that the prohibitory liquor laws "were enacted in the exercise of the police power of the state" (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 84 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86; Wilkerson v. Rahrer (Re Rahrer), 140 U. S. 559, 85 L. ed. 576), "and not at all as regulations of commerce" (Wilkerson v. Rahrer (Re Rahrer), 140 U. S. 559, 85 L. ed. 576); that they "were enacted solely to protect the health and morals of the people, and to promote peace and good order among them" (Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 514, 515, 31 L. ed. 700, 717, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 114, 84 L. ed. 184, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86), by suppressing the manufacture and sale of an "article the use or abuse of which it [the state of Iowa] deemed deleterious" (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 114, 84 L. ed. 128, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86); and that those laws were "fairly adapted to accomplish those objects."

Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 514, 515, 31 L. ed. 700, 717, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823.

And yet that court in passing on these laws, held that a state cannot, without the consent of Congress, express or implied, regulate commerce between its people and those of other states of the Union, in order to effect its end, however desirable such a regulation might be.

Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 113, 84 L. ed. 184, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 86; Wilkerson v. Rahrer (Re Rahrer), 140 U. S. 559, 85 L. ed. 576.

The sealed packages, containing ten cigarettes each, were the "original packages" notwithstanding that, for convenience of shipment, a number of them were put in a wooden case.

The very question in issue here has been decided more than once by this court, and it would seem to be unnecessary to fortify the court by the citation of decisions in other jurisdictions, and that the appellant should be able to invoke with confidence and safety the wholesome maxim, Stare decisis.

Identical cases, in all respects, with the case at bar, were the cases of State of Washington v. Covert, decided by the United States Circuit Judge Hanford in June, 1898.

State v. Goetze, 27 S. E. 225, decided in June, 1896, by the circuit court of West Virginia, was a case where the facts were in every particular identical with the facts in this case.

Mr. J. M. Grimm also for appellee.

Deemer, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The case was tried upon the following agreed statement of facts: "The defendant purchased in Illinois from the American Tobacco Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and having a factory for the manufacture of cigarettes in the city of New York and 89 L. R. A.

state of New York, a number of packages of cigarettes, manufactured at its said factory in New York by said company. Each said package so purchased contained ten cigarettes, and had upon it the label bearing the name or brand of the cigarettes contained in it, the caution notice, the number of the factory and of the revenue district in which the factory was located, the name of the state in which such factory was, the name of the manufacturer, and the internal revenue stamp for ten cigarettes, duly canceled, pasted across the end of each of said packages so as to seal the same (which said stamp had to be broken and destroyed in opening said package), and all other requirements of the acts of Congress and of the internal revenue laws governing the packing, shipment, and sale of cigarettes. The packages of cigarettes so purchased by said defendant of said company were placed in a common pine box, for convenience of shipment, without any other packing or inclosure around or about said packages of ten cigarettes each, and were so shipped by said company to said defendant by a common carrier, from the factory of said company in the city of New York, in the state of New York, to the warehouse and offices of said company in the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois, and from Chicago, in the state of Illinois, shipped by said company in the same package, without opening the same, to the defendant, in Cedar Rapids, in the state of Iowa, by common carrier. Upon the arrival of such pine box at the place of business of defendant in Cedar Rapids, in the state of Iowa, he opened said pine box, by taking the lid therefrom, and sold one of the packages, containing ten cigarettes, in Cedar Rapids, Linn county, Iowa, on July 10, 1896, to Andrew Harmon. The remaining packages of cigarettes were not removed from said pine box, and are still therein as they were received. The one package of ten cigarettes, sold to said Andrew Harmon, was of like kind in every respect with the other packages in the same box, and said Andrew Harmon was not a customer outside of the state but resided in the state of Iowa." It further appears that the American Tobacco Company submitted to the department of internal revenue of the general government a sample package of cigarettes similar to the one for the selling of which appellant was convicted, and received the following letter in response:

American Tobacco Company, No. 45 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: In reply to your inquiry of April 3d, submitting a sample package of cigarettes bearing thereon the internal revenue stamp, and the printed marks and caution label, and inquiring as to the necessity for a reinclosing, in an additional covering of paper, wood, or other material in placing the same upon the market, you are notified that said package being a statutory quantity, and properly stamped and canceled, and bearing thereon the caution label and the number of the manufactory, the district and state, and the number of cigarettes contained therein, meets with the approval of this bureau, being a proper and original package, as contemplated by existing laws and regulations.

Therefore the repacking of said packages in additional coverings of wood, paper, etc., is optional with the manufacturer, and does not concern this bureau. The option is permissible, under existing regulations (series 7, No. 8, Revised, page 46, and Internal Revenue Record, Vol. 32, page 365, dated November 22, 1886).

Respectfully yours,
[Signed] John W. Mason, Commissioner.

The so-called "Anti-Cigarette Law," being chapter 96, Acts 26th Gen. Assem., prohibits the sale of cigarettes within this state by all persons whomsoever, save jobbers doing an interstate business with customers outside of the state. Appellant contends that this law is unconstitutional, in so far as it interferes with commerce among the several states; that the package which he sold was an "original package;" and that his detention was and is illegal. This statute was enacted in virtue of the police power of the state, and, unless it infringes upon some constitutional provision, it is undoubtedly valid. The contention is, however, that the statute is invalid in so far as it interferes with, interrupts, or embarrasses interstate commerce, on the theory that the Federal Constitution (art. 1, § 8) confers upon Congress the exclusive right to regulate commerce among the several states. It seems to be well settled by the latter decisions of the United States court that, while the states have the undoubted right to control their purely internal affairs, yet whenever the law enacted in the exercise of this power amounts to a regulation of commerce among the states, as it does when it directly or indirectly inhibits the receipt of an imported commodity, or its disposition, before it has ceased to become an article of trade between one state and another, it comes in conflict with a power which has been invested in the general government, and is therefore void. That the use of the article is deleterious to the inhabitants of the state is not regarded as material, so long as it is recognized by the commercial world, by the laws of Congress, and by the decisions of the courts as a commodity in which a right of traffic exists. Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Leisy v. Hardin, 185 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36; Wilkerson v. Rahrer (Re Rahrer), 140 U. S. 559, 35 L. ed. 576; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823.

That cigarettes are a recognized commercial commodity must be conceded, and it follows that, in so far as the law in question amounts to a regulation of commerce, it is unconstitutional and void. There must of necessity be a time, however, when an article which is the subject of interstate commerce becomes subject to the taxing power and police regulations of the state; a time when the article loses its character as an import, and its owner becomes subject to local regulations. In the case of Brown v. Maryland it is said that the point of time when the prohibition ceases, and the power of the state to tax commences, is not the instant when the article enters the country, but when the importer has so acted upon it that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, which happens when the original package is no longer such in his hands; that the distinction is obvious between a tax which intercepts the import as an import on its way to become incorporated with the general mass of property, and a tax which finds the article already incorporated with that mass by the act of the importer; and that the right to sell any imported article is an inseparable incident to the right to import it. In another case (Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823), it is said in the dissenting opinion that while the question involved did require a decision, yet the argument of the majority conduces to the conclusion that the right of transportation included by necessary implication the right of the consignee to sell in unbroken packages at the place where the transportation terminated. This language was subsequently approved by a majority of the court in the case of Leisy v. Hardin.

Again in the License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256, Chief Justice Taney said: "These state laws act altogether upon the retail or domestic traffic within their respective borders. They act upon the article after it has passed the line of foreign commerce, and become a part of the general mass of property in the state." Justice Field declared in the Bowman Case that "it is only after the importation is completed, and the property imported has mingled with and become a part of the general property of the state, that its regulations can act upon it, except so far as it may be necessary to insure safety in the disposition of the import until thus mingled." In the case of Leisy v. Hardin the beer was held for sale in the original barrels and cases in which it was imported, and none of it was broken or opened upon the premises. Chief Justice Fuller said, referring to these facts, that the brewers who brewed and owned the beer had the right to import it into this state, and also had the right to sell it, by which act alone it would become mingled in the common mass of property within the state, and that up to that time the state had no power to interfere by seizure or otherwise. All the cases agree that, when the article is once sold by the importer, it then becomes subject to the taxing and police power of the state; and it is quite generally held that the same result occurs when the original package in which it is imported is broken, and the several parcels are so mingled with other property, or so exposed for sale, as to destroy the identity of the package as imported. See Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694.

As the law is confessedly valid, except in so far as it interferes with or impedes commerce between the states, it follows that the constitutional provision has reference to and protects that which is the subject of commerce, and only so long as it preserves the form and remains the exact subject of importation. It is the "original package" which is protected. The question then arises, what is an "original package?" The definition commonly accepted, and believed by us to be correct, is that "it is a bundle put up for transportation or commercial handling, and usually consists of a number of things bound together, convenient for handling and conveyance. See State, Gelpi, v. Orleans Bd. of Assessors, 46 La. Ann. 145; Keith v. State, 91 Ala. 2, 10 L. R. A. 430; United States v. One Hundred and Thirty-Two Packages of Spirituous Liquors & Wines, 40 U. S. App. 333, 22 C. C. A. 228, 76 Fed. Rep. 364. In the case of State, Cochran, v. Winters, 44 Kan. 723, 10 L. R. A. 616, it is said: "The original package . . . was and is the package . . . as it existed at the time of its transportation from one state into the other." It is quite apparent, we think, that the words "original package" have reference to the unit which the carrier receives, transports, and delivers as an article of commerce. The importer decides for himself the size of the package which he desires to import, and when he delivers it to the carrier for transportation he gives it the initial step, and from that time until sold in that form, or broken and transformed, it is the subject of interstate commerce. But when sold or broken, or when it changes form, it ceases to be an article of interstate commerce, and no longer enjoys this protection. The original package, then, is that package which is delivered by the importer to the carrier at the initial point of shipment, in the exact condition in which it was shipped. If sold, it must be in the form as shipped or received; for, if the package be broken after such delivery, it, by that act alone, becomes a part of the common mass of property within the state, and is subject to the laws of that state passed in virtue of its police power.

Appellant contends that the internal revenue department has declared the small package sold by him to be "an original package," and that this is conclusive. We do not so regard it. The package referred to in the letter from the internal revenue department is the one recognized by that department for the purposes of taxation, and has no reference to the unit of commerce which is protected by the Federal Constitution. The commissioner of internal revenue, in his letter heretofore set forth, says that "the repacking of said packages in additional coverings is optional with the manufacturer, and does not concern this bureau." In the case at bar the "original package," the unit of commerce, was broken, the contents exposed to sale, and one of the small packages was sold. Such sale was, as it seems to us, of an article which had lost its distinctive character as an import, and was therefore in violation of law. In this respect it differs from most of the cases to which our attention has been called, for in all but one of them it appears that the sales were of original and unbroken packages. See Re Minor, 69 Fed. Rep. 285, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 829; Iowa v. McGregor, 76 Fed. Rep. 957; Sauris v. Tennessee, 82 Fed. Rep. 615. The one case, and the only one, which we have been able to find holding to a contrary doctrine (State v. Goets (W. Va.) 27 S. E. 225), fails to recognize the distinction between the original package of commerce and that recognized by the internal revenue department of the general government for purposes of taxation. There are a number of liquor cases in line with our holding as to what constitutes an original package. State, Cochran, v. Winters, 44 Kan. 723, 10 L. R. A. 616; Keith v. State, 91 Ala. 2, 10 L. R. A. 430, and State, Gelpi, v. Orleans Bd. of Assessors, 46 La. Ann. 145. See also State v. Chapman, 1 S. D. 414, 10 L. R. A. 432; Haley v. State, 42 Neb. 556; Com. v. Zell, 138 Pa. 615, 11 L. R. A. 602; Com. v. Bishman, 138 Pa. 639; Com. v. Paul, 170 Pa. 284, 296, 30 L. R. A. 396, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 506; Com., Philadelphia County, v. Schollenberger, 156 Pa. 201; Re Beine, 42 Fed. Rep. 545; Smith v. State, 54 Ark. 248; Re Harmon, 43 Fed. Rep. 372; United States v. One Hundred and Thirty-Two Packages of Spirituous Liquors & Wines, 40 U. S. App. 333, 76 Fed. Rep. 364, 22 C. C. A. 228; Tinker v. State, 96 Ala. 115. We find no cases in the Federal courts holding to a contrary doctrine. On the contrary, it is said specifically in the case of Brown v. Maryland, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 419, 6 L. ed. 678, that, "if the importer breaks up the original packages for sale or for use, or changes the form in which they were imported, or they pass into second hands, the goods will lose their distinctive character as imports, and become subject to the taxing power of the state; and in such cases nothing that has been said will protect an article so acted upon by the importer." Walton v. Missouri, 91 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 347. See also State v. Shapleigh, 27 Mo. 344; State v. North, 27 Mo. 464.

The question as to what constitutes an original package of liquor imported into the state was considered in the following cases, heretofore decided by this court: Collins v. Hills, 77 Iowa, 181, 3 L. R. A. 110; State v. Coonan, 82 Iowa, 400, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 670; State v. Miller, 86 Iowa, 638; Hopkins v. Lewis, 84 Iowa, 690, 15 L. R. A. 397. The matter was also referred to in Wind v. Iler, 93 Iowa, 324, 27 L. R. A. 319. What was said in Collins v. Hills, 77 Iowa, 181, 3 L. R. A. 110, must be regarded as dictum, for it was not essential to the determination of the question involved. Moreover, the decision of the controlling point in that case was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Reference to the point in Wind v. Iler, was purely arguendo, and Hopkins v. Lewis contains nothing in conflict with the views here expressed. Moreover, the rule of the Collins Case was questioned. State v. Miller simply follows State v. Coonan. In the Coonan Case it appeared that Coonan was the agent of nonresident importers; that he kept an "original package house" which was leased by his principals; that the liquor was shipped by the importers, consigned to themselves; that the beer was put into bottles and sealed and labeled at the brewery, and for the convenience of shipment was placed in open frame boxes, with twenty-four separate compartments; that the whisky was sealed and labeled, and packed in barrels, and that Coonan removed the bottles from boxes and barrels, and sold them as sealed and labeled. It was held, under this state of facts, citing the Collins and the Beine Cases, that the separate bottles were the original packages. We have already seen that the Collins Case should not be regarded as authority upon the proposition involved, and an examination of the Beine

Case will disclose that it does not hold to any such rule. The contrary seems to be the holding in that case. Aside from this, however, the facts are essentially different from those of the case at bar. Here the appellant is a resident of the state, engaged in the business of selling cigarettes at retail, and as such is amenable to all its laws which do not deprive him of some constitutional right. When he received the package which had been made up by the manufacturer, and started upon its journey, he opened it and displayed its contents, not the package, for sale; and it affirmatively appears that he sold one of the small parcels from the original package to a customer who applied for the same. We think these distinguishing features are quite important; for if it is to be the rule that all imported goods, no matter how treated or sold, are exempt from state taxation or regulation, it is apparent that the state must forego the exercise of the power of taxation and regulation in cases where the right has never heretofore been questioned. See State v. Wheelock, 95 Iowa, 577, 80 L. R. A. 429. But, aside from these distinctions, we are abidingly convinced that the Coonan Case, if it holds to the doctrine contended for by the appellant, is wrong, and ought to be overruled; and in so far as it may be said to be out of harmony with this opinion, and the great weight of reason and authority, it is overruled.

The order of the district court remanding the appellant is right, and it is affirmed.

J. E. FOGARTY.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. The one alleging the unconstitutionality of a statute has the burden of substantiating his claim.
2. Continuing a case to the following day to permit the completion of the jury from the regular panel, rather than from talesmen, is no abuse of discretion or violation of law.
3. Negligence in failing to turn to the right upon meeting a traveler on the highway is not established by the mere fact that it would have been possible to discover his approach in time to do so.
4. Absence of negligence in failing to turn out upon meeting a traveler upon the highway in the night is shown by the fact that the driver was watching the horse and the road in advance for the purpose of seeing anyone who might be on the road, and did not see or hear anyone until a collision occurred.
5. No duty rests upon one driving on a highway to turn out until he knows or with reasonable care could have known that someone was approaching, under a statute making one failing to turn out liable for the damages resulting therefrom.

(October 26, 1897.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Greene County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for injuries resulting from a collision in a highway. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Gallaher, for appellant:

When the plaintiff saw defendant coming towards him, and hallooed two or three times and turned his wheel 2 feet beyond the beaten track of the highway, he had a right to presume that the defendant would turn to the right and obey the law, and he had a stronger right to presume that defendant would not turn to his (defendant's) left and run into him, and there is no evidence showing that any other condition existed. The only excuse that defendant makes is "that he did not see him."

Schimpf v. Sliter, 64 Hun, 463.

A bicycle is a vehicle, and comes under the same laws governing vehicles in general.

State v. Collins, 16 R. I. 371. 3 L. R. A. 394;

Thompson v. Dodge, 58 Minn. 555, 28 L. R. A. 608.

There is a presumption against the plaintiff's contributory negligence, and the burden of proof rests upon the defendant.

Hoyt v. Hudson, 41 Wis. 105, 22 Am. Rep. 714; Weiss v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 79 Pa. 387; Johnson v. Hudson River R. Co. 5 Duer. 21.

In an action for negligence the plaintiff need not allege that the injury of which he complains was caused without his fault, or that he was not guilty of contributory negligence, as the rule is that "it is not necessary to allege matters which would come more properly from the other side," and contributory negligence is considered a defense that the defendant must make.

Mayer v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 562; Abree v. Floyd County, 46 Iowa, 177; Priedenau v. Mineral Point, 43 Wis. 524, 23 Am. Rep. 558.

Where one, by the negligence of another, is so placed that he must choose on the instant and in the face of grave and impending peril between two hazards, and he makes such a choice as an ordinarily prudent person might make, his choice cannot constitute contributory negligence.

Twomley v. Central Park, N. & E. R. R. Co. 69 N. Y. 158, 25 Am. Rep. 162; Coulter v. American Merchants Union Exp. Co. 56 N. Y. 585, Reversing 5 Lans. 67; Dyer v. Erie R. Co. 71 N. Y. 228; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Becker, 76 Ill. 25; Shockley v. Shepherd, 9 Houst. (Del.) 270; Luedtke v. Jeffery, 89 Wis. 136.

Mr. W. W. Turner for appellee.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the evening of August 20, 1895, the plaintiff was riding a bicycle from Grand Junction westward towards Jefferson, on a public highway, and when midway between the two towns met the defendant, who was in a buggy, drawn by one horse, and was driving from Jefferson to Grand Junction. At the moment of meeting, a collision occurred between the plaintiff and the horse of the defendant and a shaft of his buggy, which caused the damages for which the plaintiff seeks to recover. The plaintiff claims that he called to the defendant as they were about to meet, and finally dismounted from his wheel, and stood with it by the roadside; but that, in consequence of the negligent and careless driving of the defendant, his horse jumped to the side of the road, and into the wheel, destroying it, and causing a buggy shaft to strike the plaintiff in the breast, thereby knocking him down, and bruising him, and tearing his clothes. The defendant admits the collision, but denies all negligence on his part, and alleges that he exercised due care; that the accident occurred in the night-time, when it was so dark that a man approaching on a bicycle without a light or signal of any kind could not be readily seen; and that the defendant did not see or know of the plaintiff's approach until the collision occurred. The defendant further avers that the plaintiff traveled without a signal light, and was negligent in not carrying a light or in some manner warning the defendant of his approach, or in not turning out of the highway to avoid the horse and buggy.

1. The appellant contends that chapter 70 of the Acts of the 25th General Assembly, under which the jury was drawn, is unconstitutional because it is provided in § 4 thereof that in preparing the lists and ballots containing the names of persons who are to constitute the jury list "the name of each alternate juror on the list from cities and towns where the courts are held shall be deposited in a box to be known as the talesman box and not in the first box." It is said this provision violates both the Constitution of the United States and of this state, but the part violated is not pointed out. In the absence of a more satisfactory argument on this point, we deem it sufficient to say that the appellant has failed to satisfy us that the act in question is unconstitutional. The appellant also complains of the manner in which the jury was drawn, as in violation of the act specified. When this case was called for trial, ten men were drawn from the regular panel, and, no others being present, the plaintiff asked that the jury be completed by calling talesmen, but the court refused the request, and continued the cause until the next day, when the jury was completed from the regular panel. We do not think any violation of law or abuse of discretion in what was done is shown.

2. The evidence authorized the jury to find the facts to be substantially as follows: At the time of the accident it was so dark that a man on a wheel could not have been seen readily further than a short distance. The defendant states that he ought to have seen a man dressed in light-colored clothing a distance of 80 yards or more, and the plaintiff states that he wore such clothing at the time of the accident. But he was not seen by the defendant until the collision had occurred. The plaintiff saw the defendant and his horse, which was gray or white in color, 150 yards before meeting them, and began to slacken his speed. He says he hallooted to the defendant and a companion who was riding with him when they were 50 feet distant, and again a moment later. The defendant did not heed nor hear the warning, but continued to drive his horse in the traveled road, although the sides were level, and he could have turned out easily. The plaintiff turned to the north side of the road, and, a moment before he was struck, threw himself from his wheel, but not in time to avoid the collision. Section 1000 of the Code of 1878 is as follows: "Persons meeting each other on the public highways, shall give one half of the same by turning to the right. All persons failing to observe the provisions of this section shall be liable to pay all damages resulting therefrom. . . ." The plaintiff was entitled to use the public highway with his wheel, and was entitled to one half of it when he met persons going in an opposite direction. He turned to the right as he approached the defendant, as the law provides, and the fact that the latter did not is prima facie evidence of negligence on his part. Riepe v. Elting, 89 Iowa, 88, 26 L. R. A. 769. The appellant contends that the presumption authorized by law has not been overcome, and that the testimony of the defendant shows conclusively that, if he had been giving proper attention to his horse and the road, the accident would not have occurred. But we think the jury was authorized to find that the presumption of negligence on the part of the defendant was overcome. The fact that it would have been possible for him to discover the approach of the plaintiff in time to turn to the right does not show that he was negligent in not doing so. The defendant states that at the time of the accident he was watching his horse and the road in advance for the purpose of seeing anyone who might be on the road, but that he was not expecting to meet anyone, and did not see or hear the plaintiff until the accident occurred. The defendant's companion also states that he was watching the road in advance of the horse, but did not see the plaintiff until the moment of the accident. In view of this evidence the jury was justified in finding that the defendant used due care to ascertain the approach of persons on the highway. Until he knew, or with reasonable care could have known, that the plaintiff was approaching, it was not his duty to turn out for him, and he was not negligent in keeping in the traveled way.

3. The plaintiff would not necessarily have been entitled to recover had the defendant failed to discover him in time to avoid the accident through inattention to his duties as driver. Contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff would prevent a recovery. He contends that there was no evidence whatever that he was guilty of such negligence; but, if the testimony for the defendant was entitled to credit, we think the plaintiff must have been negligent. He says he saw the defendant when he was distant 150 yards. The defendant was driving at a rate of 5 or 6 miles an hour, and the plaintiff was going as fast, and probably faster. If that rate of speed had been continued, they would have met in about thirty seconds from the time the plaintiff saw the defendant. The plaintiff says he slackened his speed, and, if he did so, the collision may not have occurred until nearly a minute after the plaintiff was first made aware of the defendant's approach. The plaintiff must have known that he was making little, if any, noise; that he did not carry a light or other means of attracting attention at a distance; and that his approach might not be discovered. True, the law of this state did not make it his duty to carry a light, to sound a bell, or to give other signal of his movements; and the same was true of the defendant. But a horse and buggy traveling 5 miles an hour are apt to make some noise, and, with the occupants of the buggy, are more readily seen, even in the night-time, than is a single pedestrian or bicycle rider. These are matters of common knowledge; and a person who rides a bicycle without a light or other signal of warning, in a public thoroughfare, when he is liable to meet moving vehicles or pedestrians, at a time when objects can be discerned readily at a distance of but a few feet, is guilty of negligence. That appears to be what the plaintiff did. He does not claim to have called to the defendant until within 50 feet of him, or but two or three seconds at most before the collision occurred, and probably too late for the defendant to avoid it if he had heard the warning. The plaintiff had no reason to think that he was seen. In fact, he states that the occupants of the buggy did not seem to hear him. We do not think the jury could well have found that the plaintiff was not negligent.

4. The appellant complains of the refusal of the court to permit him to testify that he expected the defendant to turn out of the road when they met. We do not think prejudice could have resulted from that ruling. The court charged the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to give the plaintiff a share of the road if the approach of the latter was seen, or should have been known; and the plaintiff states that he did not know that the defendant would not turn out. Moreover, we think that the testimony of the plaintiff shows that for some moments before the accident occurred he must have known that he was not seen, and that the defendant would not turn out for him.

5. The eighteenth paragraph of the charge is as follows: "In the matter of carrying a light or the failure to carry a light, the matter of ringing a bell or not ringing a bell, you are instructed that the failure to carry a light or failure to ring a bell is not conclusive proof that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; but these facts, like the other evidence in the case, should be taken into consideration by you in reaching your conclusion regarding the circumstances and surroundings of the accident." The appellant complains of this as instructing the jury, in effect, that the plaintiff would be guilty of negligence in not carrying a light or ringing a bell, and would be excusable for failing to do so only under unusual circumstances. It was evidently designed to meet the claim made by the defendant in his answer and in the evidence, and no doubt in argument, that the plaintiff should not recover because of his negligence in not carrying a light or sounding a bell, and to that extent the paragraph was in the interest of the plaintiff. A light and a bell are well-known means by which wheelmen give notice of their presence. We think that the plaintiff was negligent in not giving a signal of his approach, and that he has no just ground for complaining of the part of the charge quoted.

6. The appellant complains of the refusal of the court to charge the jury that "plaintiff was not obliged to carry a lamp or bell any more than was the defendant." The court did not charge the jury that the defendant was not under obligation to carry a light, but said that the plaintiff and the defendant possessed equal rights to the highway when they met, and that whether either was negligent should be determined by all the facts of the case. We think the rights and obligations of the plaintiff were fairly presented to the jury, and that there was no occasion to give the instruction under consideration, which was refused.

7. Many other questions are referred to by the appellant, and a few are discussed in argument. What we have said disposes of the most important of them. We need not say more in regard to them than that we do not find any sufficient reason for disturbing the judgment of the district court. A motion was submitted with the case to strike an additional abstract from the files, and to tax the cost thereof to the appellee. We do not find that the motion is well founded, and it is overruled.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

WEST VIRGINIA SUPREME COURT OF APPEALS.

D. M. MILLER

v.

John A. HARE, Appt.

(.....W. Va.....)

*1. A general demurrer to a bill in equity is properly overruled if the bill as a whole states facts which entitle the plaintiff to relief.

2. H., after acquiescing and even assisting M. in maintaining a boom for the catching and preserving of ties, timber, etc., and receiving the benefits thereof in the saving of large numbers of his ties at an expense

*Headnote by MCWHORTER, J.

NOTE.—Right to construct log booms.

The custom has very generally prevailed of maintaining booms in streams which are used largely for the floating of logs. So far as these booms have not interfered with the rights of the public in the stream, they have been held to be lawful. Even the public right has been permitted to be encroached upon to an extent which was not regarded as unreasonable under the circumstances.

Each person has an equal right to the reasonable use of navigable water. What constitutes reasonable use depends upon the circumstances of each particular case. Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 288, 81 Am. Dec. 573.

In Harold v. Jones, 86 Ala. 274, 3 L. R. A. 408, it is said that in a stream navigable for the floating of timber temporary obstructions for the purpose of preparing and securing timber for future transportation and necessary for the useful navigation of the stream at suitable seasons do not violate the rights of others if they are in the customary and contemplated mode and are not unnecessarily and unduly continued. If a boom is indispensable to a reasonable enjoyment of the stream as a public highway, and it is discontinued or removed in a reasonable time after the necessity for it ceases, its erection during a low stage of the water when the stream cannot be used for floating or rafting, is not unlawful.

The owner of land to low-water mark, who operates a sawmill upon his land, may, to facilitate his business, construct a boom into the river to receive his logs if he does not interfere with the right of the public to navigate the river. Williamsburg Boom Co. v. Smith, 84 Ky. 372.

In an action for damages for the filling up of a channel so as to prevent the floating of logs through it, it appeared that plaintiff hung a guide boom across it for the purpose of driving logs into his pond; and the court says that for that purpose it would not be unreasonable for him to use temporary guide booms which should not obstruct the passage through the channel, but he was not authorized to permanently obstruct the channel for such purpose. Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 479.

As incident to the reasonable use of a river for running and securing logs the owner may use temporary sheer or guide booms to direct the logs into proper places in which to detain them for use. But they are not authorized by the construction of booms to convert navigable streams into permanent places of deposit for logs or other materials so as thereby to obstruct the navigation of the stream. Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256, 81 Am. Dec. 569.

The fact that a boom in a river embraced a portion of the water capable of being navigated by large vessels does not necessarily constitute it a nuisance which may be abated by force. The court far less than it must have cost him if they had passed beyond the boom, cannot, in a court of equity, be heard to say that the boom was constructed and maintained in violation of law, and was a public nuisance, interfering with steamboat navigation, and therefore that he should not be required to pay a just and reasonable compensation for the catching and preserving of his said ties in said boom.

3. If a boom is erected and maintained on a navigable stream in violation of law, and is therefore a public nuisance, an individual has no cause of complaint aside from that of the common public, unless he suffer a special and peculiar damage therefrom, distinct and apart from the common injury.

says the need of boom facilities to make the floatage of the river of value should be considered in any rules laid down as to the public use of the stream. To take away the boom privilege would be to strike a fatal blow to the principal commerce of the stream. The City of Erie v. Canfield, 27 Mich. 479, affirming Canfield v. The City of Erie, 1 Mich. N. P. 105.

Rafts of logs may be moored to the shore for a reasonable time and in a reasonable place and manner. Hayward v. Knapp, 28 Minn. 480.

But in New York it has been held that logs cannot be stored in a public stream. Moore v. Jackson, 2 Abb. N. C. 211.

Those desiring to have the benefit of the boom law, which depends upon usage, must comply with its conditions by providing an opening in the boom and assorting and passing through the logs of other persons descending the river, as fast as can reasonably be done. Lowber v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. 454.

Until prohibited by statute riparian owners may maintain booms in waters which are floatable for logs so long as they do not violate any public law or obstruct the navigation of the river by any method in which it may be used, or infringe upon the rights of other riparian owners. Stevens Point Boom Co. v. Reilly, 44 Wis. 285, 46 Wis. 237.

Boom must not block up stream.

The boom must not be allowed to prevent the use of the stream by other persons.

In the absence of statutory authority there is no right to blockade a navigable stream by booms. Enos v. Hamilton, 24 Wis. 658.

If a river is a public highway all impediments to its use, such as booms, are nuisances. But if it can be used only for certain purposes the riparian owner is bound only to abstain from obstructing its use for such purpose. Morgan v. King, 18 Barb. 277.

Usage can give loggers no right to block a navigable stream by putting a boom across it so that vessels cannot pass through. Gifford v. McArthur, 55 Mich. 535.

A log-driving company has no right to throw a boom across the river and use it for the storing of logs for a season in such a way as to prevent the use of the river by other persons wishing to drive logs therein. McPheters v. Moose River Log Driving Co. 78 Me. 329.

A boom cannot be maintained which completely closes the stream. Stevens Point Boom Co. v. Reilly, 46 Wis. 237.

A boom across a stream is a nuisance if at times it interferes with the use of the stream by those who have a right to navigate it, although the principal use of the stream may be for floating logs and the

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Wood County in favor of plaintiff in a proceeding brought to enforce payment for services rendered by plaintiff in catching in his boom certain logs belonging to defendant and for materials furnished by plaintiff to defendant. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. G. McCluer, for appellant:

If Miller obstructed this stream by this boom in violation of the law of the state of West Virginia, then surely he cannot compel Hare, or anyone else, to pay him for some service that he pretends to have rendered them when he is in the very act of the violation of the laws of the state of West Virginia.

Rogers v. Cole River Boom & D. Co. 89 W. Va. 278; Page v. Mille Lacs Lumber Co. 58 Minn. 492.

As to the violation of law by this obstruction boom may greatly facilitate the logging business. Cincinnati Cooperage Co. v. Com. 11 Ky. L. Rep. 629.

And some judges have refused to recognize any private right to maintain booms.

Owners of property on the banks of a navigable river have no right to construct booms or piers in it without authority of the legislature. Leigh v. Holt, 5 Biss. 338.

Liability for injury caused by boom.

The owner of the boom will be liable for injuries caused by his negligent or wrongful use of it.

The owner of a boom has no right to use it in such a way that by reason of the logs kept there, and their jamming, the water is raised in the stream so as to flood riparian lands higher up the stream. Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 308.

A booming company is not liable for injuries to riparian owners by a proper and reasonable use of the river for floating logs, but it is liable if by wilful or negligent management it creates or enlarges jams in the stream and thereby overflows its banks to their injury. White River Log & B. Co. v. Nelson, 45 Mich. 578.

But the mere fact of the existence of a boom in the river will not justify the finding that it was the cause of an ice jam which caused injury to abutting owners, but evidence of that fact must be presented. Shaw v. Susquehanna Boom Co. 125 Pa. 324.

A boom company will be liable for needlessly or wilfully obstructing a navigable stream to the hindrance and consequent injury of persons driving their own logs. Watts v. Titabawassee Boom Co. 52 Mich. 208.

A pier erected in the Mississippi river as part of a boom for logs without authority except such as may arise from his ownership of the adjacent shore, is an unlawful structure, and the owner will be liable for the sinking of a boat which runs against it in the dark. Atlee v. Northwestern Union Packet Co. 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 889, 23 L. ed. 619.

Compensation must be made to the abutting owner before a boom can be maintained the effect of which is to raise the water and cast it, together with dirt and sticks, upon his land. Weaver v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 28 Minn. 584; McKenzie v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 29 Minn. 288.

A person who has properly constructed a boom is not liable for the flowage of land by an extraordinary freshet which he could not reasonably have provided against, although the injury is to some extent aggravated by the presence of the boom. Borchardt v. Wausau Boom Co. 54 Wis. 107, 41 Am. Rep. 12.

of this stream and liability for prosecution by the United States government or under the laws of the state of West Virginia, see

United States v. Burns, 54 Fed. Rep. 851.

Mr. V. B. Archer, for appellee:

The boom law has been, by this court, held constitutional.

State v. Elk Island Boom Co. 41 W. Va. 796.

Every presumption is made in favor of the correctness of the decision of the commissioner in chancery. If the testimony is conflicting, the court rarely interferes with his finding on the facts, provided he makes no error at law affecting the result.

Hartman v. Evans, 38 W. Va. 670.

McWhorter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

D. M. Miller filed in the clerk's office of the circuit court of Wood county, on the 24th day

And it has been held that if to catch logs coming down a river the owner throws a boom across the stream, he will be liable for the injury thereby caused to the owner of a steamboat which is prevented by the boom from reaching its destination. Grandell v. Mooney, 28 U. C. C. P. 212.

Boom on property of third person.

The right of rafting logs down a stream does not include the right of booming them for safe keeping on private property. Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 18, 77 Am. Dec. 435.

It will be a trespass by a person running logs in a river to attach a boom to the land of a riparian owner if there is no necessity for so doing, but if the act is necessary in order to enable him to exercise his right of navigation no action will lie against him for doing so. Welse v. Smith, 3 Or. 445.

A boom cannot be maintained in the public waters of a bay in such a way as to cut off access to a wharf. Union Mill Co. v. Shores, 66 Wis. 176.

But the legislature may give a boom company an absolute right to construct booms for a certain distance along the river which will exclude the right of riparian owners. Cohn v. Wausau Boom Co. 47 Wis. 314.

See, however, note on right of riparian owner to access to navigable water, post, —.

Right to recover for injury to boom.

The right to maintain the boom includes the right of recovery against a third person who injures it.

A person who has boomed his logs along the side of a stream in such a way as not to interfere with the navigation of the stream may recover in case a third person runs his logs down the stream in an unreasonable manner and by so doing breaks the boom and causes the loss of the logs. Auger v. Cook, 32 U. C. Q. B. 537.

The owner of a storage boom may recover from the owner of a tug which through negligent management strikes and breaks the boom and permits the logs to escape. John Spry Lumber Co. v. The C. H. Green, 76 Mich. 320.

The owner of logs is not guilty of a nuisance in booming them in a slough leading off from a navigable river which at times is dry, although at times of high water there is water enough there to admit of the passage of steamboats and the owner can recover for the negligence of a steamboat owner in running against the boom and releasing the logs. Castner v. The Dr. Franklin, 1 Minn. 73.

But one who uses a government boom for the purpose of running logs into a private boom in such a way as to interfere with the passage of a steamboat will not be entitled to recover for the of June, 1893, his affidavit for an attachment against the estate of John A. Hare, on the ground of nonresidence of the defendant, claiming that he was justly entitled to receive from the defendant in the suit which was about to be instituted in the said court the sum of $800, as set out in said affidavit; and at the same time filed his bond, with security, in the penalty of $1,600, and caused orders of attachment to be issued from said clerk's office to the sheriffs of the counties of Wood and Wirt, respectively. The former was levied by the sheriff of Wood county, June 26, 1893, on one barge of ties, containing 2,000 ties. The latter was on the same day levied by a constable of Wirt county on one boat load of ties. Defendant afterwards, on the 8th of July, gave bond and took possession of the property so levied upon.

At the July rules plaintiff filed his bill, alleging that he was the owner of a certain boom near the mouth of Hughes river, in Wirt county, West Virginia, and used for the purpose of catching timber and railroad ties which might be drifting in said river; that said river is one of the large tributaries of the Little Kanawha, and as such a part of the Little Kanawha river; that there was no boom in use for the catching of timber drifting in said Hughes river below the point where plaintiff's boom was located in said river, and no means, by boom or otherwise, below his boom for the preservation of logs, trees, railroad ties, etc.; that in the fall of 1892 and the spring of 1893 he caught in the said boom railroad ties which were drifting in said Hughes river belonging to the defendant, John A. Hare, to the number of 9,500 ties; that he preserved said ties in said boom and notified the defendant, John A. Hare, that his ties had been caught, and demanded from injury in case the steamer fouls and breaks the boom, causing the logs to escape and be lost. Brace v. Union Forwarding Co. 32 U. C. Q. B. 43.

Private right of action against boom owner.

One who seeks to abate as a nuisance a boom across a navigable river to intercept saw logs floated down in time of high water must prove that the obstruction is unreasonable. Brown v. Kentfield, 50 Cal. 129.

When booms have been acquiesced in by the public the owner of one cannot maintain an action against the owner of another to have it removed and to recover damages for injuries caused by its maintenance. Leigh v. Holt, 5 Biss. 333.

A person cannot maintain an action for the obstruction of a river by a boom and logs if he was engaged in the operations by which the logs were placed there. McGinnis v. Carrier, 39 Mich. 111.

After long acquiescence in an addition to a boom the shore owner cannot be heard to say that the company building it had no authority to do so. Powers's Appeal, 125 Pa. 175.

The mere fact that a boom prevents a riparian owner from shipping fuel from above the boom to his brickyard below it does not give him a private right of action for the obstruction. Swanson v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 42 Minn. 532, 7 L. R. A. 673.

But that case was overruled in a later one where it was held that the maintenance of a boom in such a way as to interfere with the floating of logs by other persons down the river is a nuisance which will give the person injured a right of action. Page v. Millie Lacs Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 499.

A mill owner cannot recover for injuries to his dam from logs coming down the river because of a sudden rise, on the ground that a boom which had been opened to pass logs through during the day was not closed at night, if he saw that it had not been closed and knew of the probability of the rise of water, but took no precautions to see that the boom was closed. Lilley v. Fletcher, 81 Ala. 234.

One who knowing of obstructions in a stream drives his logs upon them without allowing time for their removal cannot recover for loss occasioned in attempting to pass the obstructions. Harold v. Jones, 36 Ala. 274, 3 L. R. A. 406.

But in Sullivan v. Jernigan, 21 Fla. 284, it was held that the knowledge of a person about to start his logs that there was a boom across the river did not show him to be guilty of contributory negligence in not waiting for the obstruction to be removed, since his right to navigate was superior to that of the other person to obstruct the stream.

Charter power.

In Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Prince, 34 Minn. 79, it appeared that the boom company was created for the purpose of maintaining booms to assist the passage of logs down the river.

In a number of cases corporations have been authorized or required by charter to construct booms. Underwood Lumber Co. v. Pelican Boom Co. 76 Wis. 76; Black River Flooding-Dam Assn. v. Ketchum, 54 Wis. 312; Black River Improv. Co. v. La Crosse Boom & Transp. Co. 54 Wis. 659, 41 Am. Rep. 66; Nelson v. St. Croix Boom Corp. 52 Wis. 647; Brown v. Susquehanna Boom Co. 109 Pa. 57, 58 Am. Rep. 706; Rollins v. Clay, 33 Me. 132; Weld v. Proprietors of Side-Booms, 6 Me. 36; Proprietors of Side-Booms v. Weld, 6 Me. 105.

In West Branch Boom Co. v. Pennsylvania Joint Lumber & L. Co. 121 Pa. 143, the boom was to extend only one-half way across the river, and to admit the safe passage of the commerce carried on upon it.

A proviso in the charter that the boom shall not extend more than half across the stream, and that the navigation of the stream shall not be impeded, will not prevent the maintenance of a sheer boom which, when necessary to stop the running of the logs and guide them into the boom, may be extended all the way across the stream. Susquehanna Boom Co. v. West Branch Boom Co. cited in 121 Pa. 141.

But in West Branch Boom Co. v. Dodge, 81 Pa. 255, it was said that the boom company could not stop the lumber which was destined to go below its boom, even though thereby it would be prevented from stopping its own lumber.

Where the charter of a boom company requires payment for damages caused by the exercise of powers granted, payment must be made in case the boom causes the flooding of lands lying on the bank of the stream above it. Bald Eagle Boom Co. v. Sanderson, 81* Pa. 402.

Charter power to make, lay, and maintain side booms in suitable and convenient places in a certain river will not authorize the grantee to enter the close of another person without his consent, or to place logs there for their safe keeping. Perry v. Wilson, 7 Mass. 363.

A franchise to construct a boom and detain only logs of those who wish them to be detained will confer no right if it is impossible to construct such a boom so as not to interfere with logs which the owner does not wish detained. Mason v. West Branch Boom Co. 3 Wall. Jr. 252.

A general statute imposing a penalty for obstructing a navigable river does not apply to a boom company whose charter gives it the right to maintain a boom in a river navigable only for the

him payment of the compensation prescribed by statute in relation to drift property, and that defendant wholly refused to pay plaintiff the amount which he was entitled to for catching and preserving them; that he is entitled to receive from the said Hare the sum of 6 cents for each and every tie caught and preserved by him; that the defendant had recently taken possession of his said ties without plaintiff's consent, and proceeded to load the same in barges; and that, at the time of the institution of this suit, he was shipping the same to market, without paying plaintiff the amount due him for catching the same, and without settling with plaintiff, although he had often been requested so to do; and alleging the non-residence of the defendant, and that he had no property within the knowledge of the plaintiff save and except the property attached in this case, unless it was some cross-ties which are still on the waters of the Little Kanawha, but of the quantity or location thereof plaintiff was not advised and could not charge. Further alleging that the said ties were branded by the brand belonging to the said John A. Hare,—that is, the letters "J. H.;" that had it not been for his catching said ties, the same would have drifted out into the Little Kanawha, and ultimately into the Ohio river, and would have been lost or scattered along said river, by which defendant would have been damaged to a much greater running of logs. Edwards v. Wausau Boom Co. 67 Wis. 453.

In some instances the general statutes of the state have authorized the construction of booms.

Under the Minnesota law of 1872 a corporation was authorized to maintain booms in the St. Louis river. Osborne v. Knife Falls Boom Corp. 32 Minn. 412, 50 Am. Rep. 590.

In Duluth Lumber Co. v. St. Louis Boom & Improv. Co. 17 Fed. Rep. 419, it appeared that the boom company was by statute required to construct such booms as were necessary to care for logs coming down the stream.

In Lawler v. Baring Boom Co. 56 Me. 443, a boom was erected and maintained under authority of the legislature, the property to be acquired by the right of eminent domain.

Under the Maine act of 1832, a boom company was given authority to erect and maintain a boom across the Stillwater branch of the Penobscot river. Plummer v. Penobscot Lumbering Asso. 67 Me. 393.

The public right to complain of the placing of booms in the streams of the state so far as the same are not unreasonable must be held to have been waived by the passing of laws for the formation of boom companies. Atty. Gen. v. Ewart Boom Co. 84 Mich. 462.

The Michigan statutes provide that boom companies may construct, use, and maintain all necessary booms for their business. Hall v. Tittabawassee Boom Co. 51 Mich. 377.

Under the Michigan statute for the organization of booming companies the company has the right, in the streams where it can lawfully do business, of constructing and maintaining all necessary booms for that purpose, but they must be constructed and used in such manner as to allow the free passage of commerce along the stream. Coburn v. Muskegon Boom Co. 72 Mich. 134.

Under the Ontario statutes log owners have a right to throw booms across streams for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of logs to market, and therefore, in the absence of negligence, the owner of a boom will not be liable to the owner of adjoining land from the fact that the boom breaks because of high water and the logs become jammed against a bridge, causing an overflow of water upon the land to its injury. Langstaff v. McRae, 22 Ont. Rep. 78.

The Nevada statutes authorize persons complying with their requirements to make and construct all proper and necessary booms along the stream of water for the driving of logs, provided they shall not interrupt the free navigation of the stream. Mandlebaum v. Russell, 4 Nev. 551.

The legislature may by general law confer on individuals rights in waterways which are not navigable except for small boats and for floating logs in opposition and paramount to the public right. State v. Elk Island Boom Co. 41 W. Va. 796.

Boom companies organized under the Washington act of 1896 have no right to interfere with the navigation or use of the stream upon which they have constructed booms. Carl v. West Aberdeen Land & I. Co. 13 Wash. 616.

Acquisition of property by right of eminent domain.

Property of a private person may be taken under the power of eminent domain for the purpose of constructing a boom by an incorporated company for public use under the control of the legislature. Patterson v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 3 Dill. 466.

The Fairfield boom company was given authority to take land under eminent domain, erect a boom, and maintain it perpetually. Hall v. Benton, 69 Me. 346.

By the act of 1899, the Bangor boom company was given power to acquire land and construct a boom. Barrett v. Bangor, 70 Me. 386.

Land for a boom may be taken under the right of eminent domain. Cotton v. Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. 22 Minn. 572.

Governmental control.

The question has arisen in some cases as to whether the general or local government has the authority to permit or abolish booms.

In Queddy River Driving Boom Co. v. Davidson, 10 Can. Sup. Ct. 222, it was held that the New Brunswick legislature could not authorize the obstruction of a tidal navigable river by the erection of booms therein. The power over the subject-matter was held to be in the dominion of Parliament.

In the absence of any action by Congress a state may authorize the construction of a boom in a small navigable river of the state where its presence would do more good than harm. Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 459, 24 L. ed. 525; Heerman v. Beef Slough Mfg. Boom L. D. & Transp. Co. 8 Biss. 334; United States v. Beef Slough Mfg. Co. 8 Biss. 421.

Where a river forms a boundary between two states each may, in the absence of legislation by Congress, authorize the construction of booms within its own territory. J. S. Keator Lumber Co. v. St. Croix Boom Corp. 73 Wis. 62.

Under the United States act of 1890, providing for the removal of obstructions to navigable rivers, there is no authority for the removal of a boom from a small river which at the time of its construction prior to the passage of the act was fully authorized by the state, and which is necessary to the use of the river for the floating of logs, the value of the logs being much greater than that of other products likely to be transported on the river, and the obstruction to navigation caused by the boom not being complete. United States v. Beilingham Bay Boom Co. 72 Fed. Rep. 583. Affirmed 48 U. S. App. 443, 81 Fed. Rep. 658.

H. P. F.

extent than the value fixed by the statute for catching and preserving the ties; that he had preserved said ties in his boom at his own cost and expense; that the said ties filled plaintiff's boom, and, by reason of the plaintiff's preserving the ties of defendant, he was totally unable to take care of his own ties, which were too numerous to preserve after said boom was filled with the ties of said defendant, and plaintiff was put to great cost and expense in securing his own ties, which drifted out into the Little Kanawha and Ohio rivers, which would not have been the case had plaintiff not caught and preserved the ties of said defendant,—all of which the said defendant well knew at the time he took possession of the ties from plaintiff's boom, and refused to pay plaintiff the compensation fixed by statute; that he filed an affidavit, and caused an order of attachment to be issued from the clerk's office of the said court of Wood county, and by virtue of said attachment the sheriff of Wood county had levied upon and attached a barge of ties, containing about 200, as the property of said Hare, which was then in possession of the sheriff; and that a copy of said order of attachment was also sent to the sheriff or any constable of Wirt county, which was levied also upon a lot of ties in Wirt county, and the same were in the possession of the officer levying it; and he filed as exhibits the affidavit and order for the attachment. And further charging that the defendant was indebted to him in the sum of $230 for a lot of rope which plaintiff furnished to said defendant to be used by him in securing the timber, ties, and logs, in Hughes river, one coil of which rope said defendant used, and one coil was delivered by plaintiff at the barn of Col. Enoch, near Greenville, and defendant notified that said rope was there subject to his orders upon payment of the cost thereof, and that said defendant had failed to pay for said rope, and that the plaintiff was justly entitled to recover the value thereof; and charging that he was justly entitled to recover from the defendant, for catching and securing the railroad ties, the sum of $570, and for the rope furnished to the said defendant the sum of $280, making in all the sum of $800; that he was remediless in the premises, save in a court of equity, where matters of the kind are properly cognizable; and prayed that he might have a decree against the defendant for the sum of $800, and for the sale of said cross-ties attached in the counties of Wood and Wirt, and out of the proceeds that the costs might be paid, and expenses of levying upon and attaching said cross-ties, and preserving the same in the hands of the sheriff, and for the payment of his claim and interest, and for general relief.

Defendant filed a general demurrer to the bill, and, without waiving his demurrer, filed his answer, denying that the Hughes river is any part of the Little Kanawha river, and averring that it is a separate and distinct river, and so recognized in the history and geographical surveys and delineations on the maps of the state of West Virginia, etc.; and admitting the truth of the allegation that in the fall of 1892 and spring of 1893 there was no boom in use for the catching of timber drifting in said Hughes river below the point where the plaintiff retained the respondent's railroad ties in said Hughes river; and charging that no boom could be maintained in said Hughes river during the year 1892 and 1893, at any point in said Hughes river, or in said Little Kanawha river, because the same was not allowed by the laws of the state of West Virginia; and denying that the plaintiff was or could be the owner of any boom near the mouth of Hughes river, in Wirt county, West Virginia, for catching timber and railroad ties which might be drifting in said Hughes river; and denying that plaintiff caught in any boom any railroad cross-ties belonging to respondent and drifting in said Hughes river near the mouth of the Little Kanawha or elsewhere; and denying that the plaintiff had any right to catch, in any boom in said Hughes river, any cross-ties or timber or property, belonging to respondent, drifting in said Hughes river, at any point, in any boom; and denying that plaintiff was entitled to receive from him anything for illegally obstructing the floating and passage of any of his railroad cross-ties or timber down said Hughes river; and especially denying that the plaintiff was entitled to receive or recover from respondent 6 cents for each and every tie caught and preserved by him in any such boom that may have been so attempted to have been maintained by plaintiff in Hughes river illegally; and charging that plaintiff did not preserve respondent's ties, but threw the same out of the boom when found by the plaintiff, and denying that he was indebted to the plaintiff in any such sum as $230 for rope furnished to respondent by plaintiff, but that it is true that respondent did receive and use one coil of rope, worth, including freight, $77; and denying that there was any coil, delivered by plaintiff at the barn of Col. Enoch, near Greenville," or, at least, if it was placed there, it was not delivered to respondent; and denying that respondent was notified that said rope was there subject to his order, upon payment of the costs thereof, and denying any liability to pay for any rope so delivered at Col. Enoch's, or that plaintiff was entitled to recover anything on account of same against him; alleging that, in the spring of 1893, respondent and Miller were running and drifting cross-ties in said Hughes river, and plaintiff proposed to respondent that he (plaintiff) would get a lot of rope, and put some rafts across the Little Kanawha below the mouth of Hughes river, to catch plaintiff's and respondent's property jointly, as it should come out of Hughes river; that at the time said river had been lately frozen over and the ice had broken up, and the object was to hold the ice and the stuff that was in it; that in addition to plaintiff and respondent, the Parkersburg Mill Company and William Richardson, all of whom had property, or were interested in property, that floated in said Hughes river, or bound up in said ice, were to bear their share of the expense of putting in three rafts; that to such proposition respondent acceded, but that plaintiff failed to and did not put in such rafts, and did not stop any such property of respondent, and then afterwards set up a claim that respondent should pay for the coil of rope which plaintiff had gotten, but not used, but respondent had nothing to do with getting such rope, and denying that he was in any way liable to pay anything therefor; and averring that, by reason of the failure of the plaintiff to place and secure such rafts across said Little Kanawha river, respondent lost railroad ties that floated out with the ice into the Little Kanawha and Ohio rivers to a large amount, at least the sum of $5,000, which sum of $5,000 respondent had a right to and claims, and also seeks and asks to recoup and have set off against the plaintiff's claim set up in said bill for said rope as well as for catching said cross-ties; and averring that the $77 had been settled and adjusted and by accord satisfied prior to the institution of this suit; denying that plaintiff was justly entitled to recover from defendant for catching and securing said railroad ties the sum of $570, and for the rope furnished the sum of $230, making in all the sum of $800, as charged in said bill, or that he was indebted to the plaintiff in any sum whatever, but charging that, upon a just and fair settlement, plaintiff was indebted to respondent, because that about the 29th of April, 1893, respondent caught 2,500 railroad cross-ties drifting in Hughes river belonging to plaintiff, and secured same, and cared for and preserved them, and delivered them to plaintiff, for which respondent was entitled to recover a fair and reasonable compensation, as provided by law; that he preserved and cared for same from about April 29 to about July 1, 1893, and that a reasonable compensation therefor should be fixed and ascertained by the court; and further charging that, during the fall of 1892 and spring of 1893, the plaintiff undertook to establish a boom in said Hughes river, as he calls it, and went on and placed obstructions in said river, and kept the same there during the fall of 1892, and up to the time of the bringing of this suit and the filing of the answer; that said Hughes river, at the point where the plaintiff was attempting to maintain said boom and obstruction, was and is a navigable river and was and is used a great deal then and now by the citizens of West Virginia, and people and public doing timber business thereon, for the transportation, floating, driving, drifting of timber, cross-ties, etc., along and upon the waters of said Hughes river, as they had a right then and now to do without hindrance; that at the point where said boom was so established, and for at least a distance of about a mile above that in said Hughes river, the said river is and was then navigable for steamboats and other crafts, rafts, etc., at all times when said Little Kanawha is and was navigable for such crafts, rafts, boats, etc., and at all times except during ordinary low water; that said obstruction so called a "boom" by said plaintiff was then and is now without any legal authority or right whatsoever, and is in violation of law and the rights of this respondent, and of the citizens of the United States, of the public in general, and especially of the citizens of the state of West Virginia, and then and now constituted a nuisance under the law; and said boom was by plaintiff so constructed that there was no provision for timber, cross-ties, or property of respondent or anybody else to pass through or beyond said obstruction or boom so placed there by plaintiff, and in consequence it detained the cross-ties and property of this respondent to a large amount; that respondent, through his agents and employees, went and took possession of his cross-ties so wrongfully detained by plaintiff, and loaded them into barges, and about the month of June, and just prior to the institution of this suit, moved the barges into which respondent's said cross-ties were so loaded; that plaintiff took out an attachment against respondent before H. J. Fought, justice of the peace of Wirt county, claiming and swearing that he was entitled to recover from respondent $800, but, before the same could be tried, plaintiff dismissed that action, and then brought this suit, and swore he was entitled to recover $800, and denying the plaintiff's right to recover anything, or his right to issue any writ of attachment; that respondent has given bond and taken possession of his property, and is entitled to recover from the plaintiff a reasonable compensation for catching, securing, preserving, and delivering to plaintiff said 2,500 ties, and to decree therefor, together with his costs in this suit, and praying for affirmative and for general relief; to which answer plaintiff replied generally.

On the 29th of August, 1895, the cause was heard upon process executed, affidavit and attachment issued and levied upon the bill filed, and proceedings had at rules, the demurrer and answer of defendant, general replication to the answer, the issue on demurrer, and the depositions of all the witnesses, taken both for plaintiff and defendant; whereupon the court overruled the demurrer, and found that the plaintiff was entitled to a reasonable compensation for catching and preserving defendant's ties, and sustained the attachment issued in the cause, but held that, before a final decree could be executed in the cause, it should be referred to one of the commissioners of the court to take, state, and report an account between the plaintiff and defendant. The cause was accordingly referred to W. W. Jackson, commissioner, with directions, after first giving reasonable notice to the parties, to make, state, and report an account between plaintiff and defendant, as follows: "First, as to the amount the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff on account of the lines or ropes mentioned in the bill, alleged to have been purchased by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant, the plaintiff, and the Parkersburg Mill Company, if any, the costs of said ropes, and the amount to be charged to the defendant; second, the number of railroad ties, belonging to the defendant, collected in plaintiff's boom, and received by the defendant, and what would be a just compensation for catching and preserving said railroad ties, and the amount to which the plaintiff would be entitled for such service; third, the amount of payments or offsets to which the defendant may be entitled, under the pleadings in this cause, if any."

On the 19th of November, 1895, Commissioner Jackson filed his report in the cause, in substance as follows: "Your commissioner reports that the evidence submitted to him by plaintiff and defendant was very conflicting, and that a large amount of such evidence was irrelevant, and totally foreign to the matters under consideration. Your commissioner reports that no evidence was produced before him except the depositions already filed in the case." In response to the first inquiry, he says: "Your commissioner finds that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff on account of the lines or ropes mentioned in the bill, alleged to have been purchased by the plaintiff for the use of the defendant, in the sum of $230. Your commissioner has been unable to report exactly the cost of the ropes purchased for the use of the defendant, the plaintiff, and the Parkersburg Mill Company, but, on the testimony of S. L. Gould, fixes the cost price of said ropes at $797.80. Of this rope the mill company took two fifths, leaving the remaining three fifths to be divided equally, as ascertained by the commissioner, between the plaintiff and the defendant, both plaintiff and defendant being liable for the payment of one half of said three-fifths part set aside to them. While this would exceed the amount claimed in the plaintiff's bill, owing to the uncertainty of the evidence, your commissioner has taken the amount as set out in the plaintiff's bill, and fixed the liability of the defendant to the plaintiff on account of said ropes as $230." And to the second inquiry: "As to the number of railroad ties belonging to the defendant collected in plaintiff's boom and received by the defendant, the testimony is extremely conflicting, and the witnesses, all with the exception of the defendant, give estimates in guesses as to the amount, no person seeming to have actually counted the number of ties so collected. The defendant testifies that there were 6,700 ties in the boom, and that prior to that rise he had loaded 3,000 ties out of Miller's boom, making 9,700 in all. Your commissioner finds that the amount of ties claimed in the plaintiff's bill to have been caught for the defendant was 9,500. Your commissioner, therefore, fixes the number of ties collected in the plaintiff's boom, and received by the defendant, at 9,500. Upon the question of a just compensation for catching and preserving said railroad ties, and the amount to which the plaintiff would be entitled for such services, your commissioner reports that the evidence varies from one half a cent to six cents a tie, but that the amount of six cents per tie seems, from the evidence, to have been paid almost if not exclusively upon the Little Kanawha river, the evidence showing that the amount paid upon the Hughes river, when caught in booms, ranged from one half a cent to three cents. Your commissioner, after carefully considering the evidence has reached the conclusion that a just compensation for catching and preserving said railroad ties would be two and a half cents for each tie, making a total of $237 due from the defendant to the plaintiff on account of catching and preserving said railroad ties." And to the third inquiry he says: "Under this head your commissioner reports that, after a careful consideration of the evidence, he is of the opinion that the defendant is entitled to no set-off or payment against the plaintiff's claim. . . . Your commissioner further reports that there is due, as ascertained by him, from the defendant, John A. Hare, to the plaintiff, D. M. Miller, on account of rope, $230; on account of compensation for catching and preserving ties, $237.50,—making a total of $467.50 due from the defendant to the plaintiff."

The defendant, John A. Hare, excepted to the report: "First, because the same is not supported by the evidence before the commissioner and before the court; second, because said report is contrary to the evidence in the cause before said commissioner; third, because the commissioner has erred in allowing the plaintiff, D. M. Miller, $230 for rope, when the evidence shows that no rope was ever delivered to the defendant, nor was any ever delivered at any place agreed upon between the plaintiff and defendant for delivery; fourth, because the commissioner erred in allowing the plaintiff two and a half cents (2½) per tie as just compensation for catching and preserving railroad ties in controversy, making a total of $270.50 due from the defendant to the plaintiff on account of catching and preserving such railroad ties, and because plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything, as set up in the answer filed in this cause, and said finding is contrary to the weight of evidence; and, fifth, because of errors and insufficiencies appearing upon the face of said report."

And on the 2d of December, 1895, the cause was heard upon the papers formerly read, and the orders made therein, upon the order of reference and report of Commissioner Jackson made thereunder, and the exceptions taken by defendant to said report, and the exceptions set down for argument, and was argued by counsel; whereupon the court overruled the several exceptions of the said defendant to said report, and confirmed the report of Commissioner Jackson, and decreed that plaintiff recover from defendant, John A. Hare, $472.27, the amount ascertained by the commissioner to be due from defendant to plaintiff, with interest from September 13, 1895, until paid, and the costs of suit, from which decree this appeal is taken.

The first assignment of error is the overruling of the demurrer to plaintiff's bill. The demurrer filed is a general demurrer to the whole bill, and sets out no grounds other than that "the same is not sufficient in law." The bill alleges indebtedness of the defendant to the plaintiff in the sum of $230 for rope sold by plaintiff to defendant and furnished to him, and also in the sum of $570 for catching and preserving certain ties of and for the defendant. In his brief the counsel for defendant argues that the demurrer should have been sustained by reason of the plain and wilful violation of the statute law of the state of West Virginia in maintaining a boom on a navigable stream by the plaintiff, where no such boom was permitted under the law, in which boom defendant's ties were unlawfully caught, and for which plaintiff has charged defendant, and seeks to recover from him such charges in this suit. The reasons assigned for sustaining the demurrer do not apply to the whole bill. The demurrer is too extensive and was properly overruled.

Second, that the court erred in overruling the exceptions to the report of Commissioner W. W. Jackson in the cause, certified as of September 28, 1895, because the same is not supported by the evidence before the commissioner and before the court, and for other reasons set forth in the exceptions to said report filed by John A. Hare, by his attorney, L. N. Tavenner. A careful examination of the evidence shows that the third exception to Commissioner Jackson's report is well taken, as to the allowance to plaintiff, Miller, of $280 for rope. This allowance should have been $77, and not $280. Defendant admits getting the half coil of rope at $77, and the fact is proved also by other witnesses. It is true, it is shown by the testimony of B. S. Pope that the $77 was credited to plaintiff, Miller, in his account with Pope & Sons, and charged to defendant, Hare; but it is also shown by the testimony of B. S. Pope that it was again credited back to Hare, and charged back to Miller, so that Hare has never paid it. The evidence fails to prove that defendant, Hare, ever purchased, or contracted to purchase, or received, or agreed to receive, any more of the rope than the half coil, for which he says himself he should pay to Miller $77. There was considerable testimony taken concerning the purchase of the rope, and of interviews between plaintiff, Miller, and Hare, and between Miller and Pope, and representatives of the Parkersburg Mill Company, about its purchase. Miller says he and Hare were consulting about the matter of getting the line to hold the gorge, ice, timber, and ties, and save the stuff, when Hare says, "Let's go up and see Pope, and see what he thinks of it, and, if he is in favor of it, we will do so;" that they went to Pope's office, in the city of Parkersburg, "and there consulted about the matter between us three, and the agreement was made there to order ten coils—half coils—of two-inch line, and take them there, and if it was a favorable thaw, and we thought it could be held by erecting a boom below it, and putting them out, why we were to do it, each one paying for one third of the line,—the Parkersburg Mill Co., one third; myself, one third; and John A. Hare, one third." Hare in his testimony says emphatically there was no such contract, and he is corroborated by the testimony of Pope, who was the third party present when the contract was alleged to have been made.

Third assignment: "The court erred in confirming the said commissioner's report, and decreeing against the appellant, John A. Hare, the sum of $472.27, with interest and costs of suit." This is correct to the extent of the difference between $280 allowed in the report for rope, and $77, the amount which should have been allowed.

Fourth assignment: "The court erred in not dismissing the plaintiff's bill after the proofs were in, showing that the plaintiff, D. M. Miller, had in his own wrong erected a boom across Hughes river, which was a navigable stream, and then being navigated by steamboats plying the waters of the Little Kanawha river; thereby not only obstructing navigation, but preventing, by his wrongful and illegal act, the ties and timber of the appellant from passing out of said stream into the Little Kanawha river, and at the same time obstructing and hindering navigation of said river, and preventing its free use by the public." A careful review of all the testimony shows that plaintiff, Miller, maintained a boom in Hughes river from 100 to 200 yards from its mouth, and that defendant, Hare, had a boom about a mile to a mile and a half above Miller's, on the same river. These booms were both constructed and maintained for the purpose of catching ties, timber, etc., to keep it from passing out into the Little Kanawha river, and thence into the Ohio; that there was no boom below that of plaintiff, Miller, to prevent free passage of any ties, timber, etc., which passed his boom, into the Little Kanawha river; that ties, etc., passing into the Little Kanawha were liable to be lost entirely to the owners, and, if caught on the Little Kanawha or Ohio river, the expense of recovering the same was much greater than if caught in the said booms. Defendant, Hare, in his testimony, says that "in January, 1893, the river broke up, and the ice destroyed Mr. Miller's sheer boom, and a portion of my side boom, and I took my sheer boom and what side boom I had and coupled it onto his [Miller's], and we used the boom jointly for a short time for catching our ties;" that Mr. Miller rebuilt his sheer boom, and witness Hare then moved his back to the place where he formerly had it; as he expressed it, "That is, what I had left of it," "about a mile, or a mile and a half, or something like that, above Mr. Miller's." The "wild rise," as witness Hare designated it, came in April, 1893, when plaintiff caught most of the ties of defendant, Hare, for which he has charged him in this suit. From Hare's testimony it appears that several thousand ties on this rise passed out into the Little Kanawha river, and Hare himself says that his recollection is that it cost 11 cents per tie to have such ties gathered up and delivered in boat. Several witnesses were examined as to the cost and proper amount to be paid for catching the ties, and it ranges all the way from one half cent per tie to six cents. William Richardson testifies very intelligently, and from large experience in the business, and he fixes a reasonable compensation at 3 cents per tie for catching and preserving defendant's ties as was done by plaintiff. So I conclude that the amount arrived at by the commissioner, to wit, 2½ cents per tie, was not unreasonable. And Hare admits that plaintiff caught and saved to him about 9,700 ties. The evidence further shows that the catching of plaintiff's ties by defendant in his boom above plaintiff's boom was of no advantage to plaintiff, but a disadvantage, and that defendant, as well as his agents and employees, was notified by plaintiff not to catch his ties. After acquiescing, and even assisting, as defendant did, in the maintenance of plaintiff's boom, and receiving the benefits thereof in the saving of large numbers of his ties, at an expense far less than it must have cost to save them if they had been permitted to pass out of Hughes river into the Little Kanawha, he cannot, in a court of equity, be heard to say that the boom was constructed and maintained in violation of law, and that the same was a public nuisance, interfering with steamboat navigation, and therefore he should not be required to pay a just and reasonable compensation for a valuable service rendered him. It is shown by the evidence that the boom of plaintiff was not a private nuisance, but of great value and benefit to individuals engaged in driving and running ties, timber, etc., in Hughes river, and that it was especially so to defendant, Hare. In Page v. Mills Lumber Co. 53 Minn. 499, 501, cited by appellant, the court says "that a nuisance, such as an unreasonable or wanton obstruction of a navigable stream, a public highway, may be public in its general effect upon the public, and at the same time private as to those individuals who suffer a special and particular damage therefrom, distinct and apart from the common injury. . . . The public wrong inflicted upon all persons must be redressed by a public prosecution." If appellee's boom was erected and maintained, as claimed by appellant, in violation of law, and was therefore a public nuisance, the way to get rid of it was by a public prosecution, and appellant, Hare, had no cause of complaint as an individual, aside from that of the common public, unless he "suffered a special and peculiar damage therefrom distinct and apart from the common injury." Aldrich v. Wetmore, 52 Minn. 164; Williams's Case, 5 Coke, 72a; Brakken v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 29 Minn. 41. Not only is this not appellant's case, but it is shown that the boom was of peculiar benefit to him, not only saving him large expense, but from considerable probable loss. The appellant's ties were drifting on the Hughes river, and were secured by appellee, and taken from his possession by appellant without having paid the just compensation for catching and preserving the same, as provided in § 7, chap. 61, Code, to the person taking them up. Appellee is entitled to recover the same in this suit.

The decree is affirmed as to the amount allowed for catching and preserving the ties, and is reversed as to amount found for rope, which should be $77; and, this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court should have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that plaintiff recover against the defendant the sum of $317.30, with legal interest thereon from December 2, 1895, until paid, and his costs by him expended about his suit in the circuit court, including $15, as allowed by law, and that he have execution therefor.

3. There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But where a thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Ohio County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. P. Hubbard, for plaintiff in error:

The declaration seems insufficient. It must set forth the duty which has been neglected, and aver the neglect.

Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. 88 W. Va. 645, 24 L. R. A. 215; Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co. 89 W. Va. 732.

It was error to permit the plaintiff to give in evidence a supposed act of negligence which had not been averred in the declaration, to permit the jury to consider it, and, worst of all, to tell the jury that a recovery might be had on such a matter.

Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 628, 36 Am. Rep. 825.

In this case, as in Fisher v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. 89 W. Va. 367, 23 L. R. A. 758, and (on second writ of error) 42 W. Va. 188, 33 L. R. A. 69, the proximate cause of the injury was plaintiff's "own obstinate and perverse conduct in refusing to obey the reasonable" warnings of bystanders; "in voluntarily subjecting himself to the influence of liquor, and in needlessly and negligently assuming the dangerous position."

Harris v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 87 Minn. 47; Gerity v. Haley, 29 W. Va. 98; Butcher v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. 87 W. Va. 180, 18 L. R. A. 519.

The fact that the defendant has been guilty of negligence followed by an accident does not make him liable for the resulting injury, unless that was occasioned by the negligence. The connection of cause and effect must be established. And the defendant's breach of duty, and not merely his act, must be the cause of the plaintiff's damage.

Messrs. John A. Howard and Melville D. Post, for defendant in error:

Where the plaintiff has shown a situation where one in the proper exercise of a right is injured by the action of another, the maxim Res ipsa loquitur applies and the presumption arises that the injurer was guilty of negligence.

Evidence that defendant electric-light company had its line constructed along a street; that a guy wire from one of its poles stretched across the sidewalk, and charged with electricity from another guy wire crossing the feed wire of a street-railway company, had become detached from a tree to which it had been fastened, and was hanging to the ground; and that plaintiff's son was killed by coming in contact with it while walking along the sidewalk, makes a prima facie case, and puts on defendant the burden of showing that it was not negligent.

court in overruling a demurrer to the declaration. The specification of its defect is that it ought to, but does not, set forth the duty and aver the neglect; and citation is made of the language in the opinion in Clarke v. Ohio River R. Co. 39 W. Va. 732, that a declaration in tort "must have the requisite definiteness to inform the defendant of the nature of the cause of action and the particular act or omission constituting the tort," and reference is made to Poling v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 645, 24 L. R. A. 215, holding that a declaration for negligence "is good if it contains the substantial elements of a cause of action, the duty violated, the breach thereof properly averred with such matters as are necessary to render the cause of action intelligible, so that judgment according to law and the very right of the case can be given." I think these statements are good law. Hogg, Pleading & Forms, § 140, says that it is settled as a general rule that it is not necessary to state the particular acts which constitute negligence. This is so, but we must take care not to misapply this statement. The West Virginia cases cited to sustain the rule are cases against railroads for killing stock. If a declaration alleges that a railroad killed stock by negligently running a train over it, as in those cases, that would be sufficient, without more details of the circumstances of running over it; but I take it that it would not be enough simply to say that the company negligently killed a horse. You must aver the duty, and aver the existence or presence of negligence in its performance, and specify the act working damage, but need not detail all the evidential facts of negligence. You must tell the defendant, even under this general rule, that he negligently did a specific act doing harm. In other words, you may say that the defendant negligently did or did not do so and so, without detail as to the mere negligence, but you must state the acts that are the basis of liability. If the negligence cannot be otherwise charged, they must be given. As said in Berna v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. 27 W. Va. 285, 55 Am. Rep. 304, the object of a declaration is to give the facts constituting the cause of action, so they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, and by the jury and court who are to give verdict and judgment on them; and though, in an action for negligence, it is not necessary to state with particularity the acts of omission or commission, yet, lest too loose a practice shall grow under this rule, it may be well to state the warning given in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Whittington, 30 Gratt. 810, that "this rule does not justify a general and indefinite mode of declaring, admitting of almost any proof." In that case it was held not enough to state that the railroad company was working its road with cars and conducted itself so negligently in its business that it inflicted severe bodily injuries, by reason of which the person died, without stating where the deceased was, or how injured. To avoid misunderstanding, it is important to add that the declaration need not state the particular facts that are not primary or main facts, but only are evidence of primary facts. When the necessary primary facts are given, then all other facts merely incidental that go to prove the primary facts may be proved without specification in the declaration. Davis v. Guarnieri, 45 Ohio St. 470; Ware v. Gay, 11 Pick. 106; McCaulley v. Davidson, 10 Minn. 418 (Gil. 885) 422.

The declaration in this case states that the defendant operated an electric plant for the manufacture and sale of electricity, and had its wires over the streets of the city of Wheeling for the conveyance of electricity in dangerous currents, and that it was the duty of the defendant to exercise all possible care in putting up and operating its plant and wires, and constantly inspecting the wires and other appurtenances and appliances, and in seeing that they were strong, suitable, and safe, and that the wires and appurtenances were at all times safely secured, and to immediately attend to and repair broken or defective wires and appliances, and, when any of the wires were down upon the street, to cut off from them the current of electricity, that the lives and limbs of persons on the streets might not be endangered; yet the defendant carelessly and negligently suffered one of its wires at the corner of Market and Sixteenth streets to be so insufficiently secured that it came down, and lay on the street, and Snyder stepped upon it, received the electric current, fell prostrated by it, and continued to lie there, and receive the current into his body, and therefrom died. This declaration surely says that it was the duty of the defendant to safely secure the wires, and that, from being insufficiently secured, they came down into the street, and there wrought the injury. This one duty, breach, and injury save the declaration from demurrer. I think, too, the declaration may, by implication, be construed to say, what it should have positively averred, that the defendant failed to cut off the current from the wire when down, as it avers that the current entered Snyder's body, and he fell, and continued to receive it, which could not be so had the current been cut off. "A declaration will be treated as alleging by implication every fact which can be implied from its averments by the most liberal intendment." Hogg, Pleading & Forms, § 140. Those were the only two omissions of duty specified. None other could be proved, for, even where there may be allowable a general charge of negligence, yet, if the declaration does give certain specifications of negligence as sources of the injury, others cannot be proved. Hawker v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 15 W. Va. 629, 36 Am. Rep. 825. Therefore evidence was not admissible to prove want of or bad insulation of wires at the place of accident and elsewhere, and that wires came in contact with wet posts and that nobody was kept on duty to repair broken wires; that on a certain other occasion, when a wire was out of fix, someone telephoned from the plant that there was no one to fix the wires; that no instruments were kept to discover breaks; and at other places the wires were bare. It might seem that some of this evidence might come in under the allegation of insecure fastening, but it relates more to the condition of the wires, not to their fastening, and there is no allegation of defective wires. The declaration does assign certain duties as imposed on the company, among them the duty to attend to broken wires, and to inspect wires and apparatus, and to see that all wires were strong, suitable, and safe; and, if this recital of duties had been followed up with averment that the insulation of the wires was defective, and in places the wires bare, coming in contact with wet poles, thus injuring and rendering them unsafe and liable to break, or even the general allegation that the wires were unsuitable, weak, and unsafe, in negation of the duty assigned in the recital, and that servants were not kept for inspection, and that careful repair was not made, and that no appliances were kept to announce at the plant fall of wires, and no means existed for discovery of their fall, this evidence would have been admissible. But what, in this declaration, gave the defendant warning of all this evidence? I think evidence of failure to inspect was admissible as evidence of insecurity of fastening and on principles above stated. It may be said that the evidence that no instrument was kept to tell of a fallen wire ought to come in under the allegation that it was the duty to cut off the current, and that the current continued to flow after the fall of the wire; but that would be going very far. None of this evidence could get in under this declaration but by a liberality too loose,—one ignoring the defendant's rights,—some of it not at all. I here allow the evidence that with certain means of ascertaining an accident the current could be shut off at once, under the charge that it was the duty to shut it off, and the allegation made by implication that it continued after the fall of the wire; and that is going pretty far. All this evidence, as a court can readily see, was calculated to and did wield a potent effect in the case, and the error of its admission cannot be looked over as harmless. It was an important factor in the trial.

From these considerations it comes that plaintiff's instruction No. 2 was bad as presenting a theory for recovery which, though made relevant by some evidence, yet there was no warrant for under the declaration. It said that if the defendant failed to have the most reliable and best appliances to discover broken wires, the company, in the absence of contributory negligence, was liable. I think No. 3 good under the charge of insecure fastening. I think No. 2 should have said "good, reliable, and efficient" means and appliances, instead of "best and most reliable." Berns v. Gaston Gas Coal Co. 27 W. Va. 286, 55 Am. Rep. 304, points 9, 10. An instruction for defendants (No. 4) told the jury that the only negligence charged in the declaration was in suffering wires to be so insufficiently secured as to fall, and therefore all evidence and argument as to other suggestions of negligence must be disregarded; yet plaintiff's instructions held the company liable for not only that, but for failure to have the best appliances for discovery of broken wires, and for failure to exercise the highest degree of care in the construction, inspection, and repair of wires and poles; and so the instructions were inconsistent,—one saying to the jury that the case involved only one basis of recovery, others giving several. Which would the jury follow? Likely those giving several. A good instruction does not cure a bad one, but it must be withdrawn. McKelvey v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 35 W. Va.

500. Inconsistency in instructions is error. Parkersburg Industrial Co. v. Schulte, 43 W. Va. —, 27 S. E. 255. I think, as Dr. Walden had examined the dead body of Snyder in his effort to resuscitate life, he could give his opinion as to the cause of his death. His opinion, however, should be confined to his knowledge based on that examination; but the court allowed him to state his opinion, not only on that, but also from what he could learn,—that is, hearsay. I think it is inadmissible to ask him whether there was any indication of death from any other cause than electricity, so as to negative any other death-producing cause.

I come next to an important question. Suppose there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant, does the mere fact that the wire fell create a prima facie presumption of negligence, sufficient, in the absence of something appearing in the case to repel the presumption, to support the action? This involves the rule or principle of res ipsa loquitur,—the thing itself speaks. A wire charged with a deadly current of electricity falls from its proper place of elevation above the street to the surface of the street, and there, by contact with a man lawfully passing along the highway, kills him with its current. Are we to presume that its fall came from some negligence of the owner, unless the circumstances of the case or facts shown by him shall show that its fall is not attributable to his negligence, but from some defect which that reasonable care and prudence proper in the case of such deadly wire was unable to discover, or some accident beyond his control; in other words, from inevitable accident? I answer that the law raises a prima facie case of negligence. As stated in that great work, 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Laws, p. 448: "As a rule negligence is not presumed. But there are cases where the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur is directly applicable, and from the thing done or omitted negligence or care is presumed." The rule cannot be better stated, in its generality, than as given in Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 596: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care." In those words it is approved in 1895 in Shafer v. Lacock, 168 Pa. 497, 29 L. R. A. 254, a case where two workmen were repairing a roof, having a fire pot, and from it a fire resulted, destroying the house. "When the physical facts of an accident themselves create a reasonable probability that it resulted from negligence, the physical facts themselves are evidential, and furnish what the law terms evidence of negligence, in conformity with the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur," is the apt language in which the principle is stated in Seybolt v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75. One man is hurt from the works or property of another, when, from the nature of the case, he would not likely have been hurt without negligence of that other. May he not ask of that other an explanation, or, on his failure to give it, then damages for his injury? Take the case where one, in passing along a street, is hurt by a barrel falling from a door above, or by a brick falling from a wall or scaffold, or by a falling shutter or wall, or the like. The mere occurrences in themselves import negligence. Especially take the cases where things of great danger are used in public highways, where multitudes constantly and lawfully pass, their very nature requiring the highest degree and constancy of care, and one is killed from it being out of place or defective, why may we not logically and fairly assume negligence, unless other plausible explanation appears? The latest work on Torts (2 Jaggard, Torts, p. 864) says: "A live wire, however, is exceedingly dangerous, so that proof of contact therewith, and consequent damages, makes it a complete case of prima facie negligence, and throws the burden on the defendant to show that such wire was in the street without fault on his part. Generally, companies using electricity on lines along a street are charged with the highest degree of care, having due reference to existing knowledge in the construction, inspection, and repair of their wires and poles, and in the use of devices to guard against harm." This doctrine needs no further discussion from me. It is well sustained by American and English authority. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 449, and notes; 2 Jaggard, Torts, 938; Whart. Neg. § 421; Cooley, Torts, 799; Bigelow, Torts, 596; Shearm & Redf. Neg. § 60; full note Huey v. Gahlenbeck (Pa.) 6 Am. St. Rep. 793, —a building falling into street; Mulcairns v. Janesville, 67 Wis. 24,—wall of a cistern falling; Dixon v. Plums, 98 Cal. 384, 20 L. R. A. 698,—chisel falling from a scaffold; Houston v. Brush, 66 Vt. 331,—injury from being struck by a wheel from a tackle block, attached to a derrick; note in Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Anderson (Md.) 20 Am. St. Rep. 493; Thomas v. Western Union Teleg. Co. 100 Mass. 156,—telegraph wire swinging over a street too low, so as to obstruct travel; Clare v. National City Bank, 1 Sweeny, 539,—injury from plank falling from one's premises; Houser v. Cumberland & P. R. Co. 80 Md. 146, 27 L. R. A. 154,—cross-tie falling from a moving car; Uggle v. West End Street R. Co. 160 Mass. 351; Morris v. Strobel & W. Co. 81 Hun, 1,—sign board falling in street. It is clear that this doctrine applies in cases where a passenger on a railroad, or other conveyance of a common carrier, is injured, there existing in such cases a presumption of negligence against the carrier, because there is an implied contract to safely convey; but it is not confined to such cases. 20 Am. St. Rep. 493; Rose v. Stephens & C. Transp. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 438. There it is said that, though the presumption is more frequently applied in such cases, yet there is no foundation in authority or reason for such limitation, as the presumption originates from the nature of the act, not from the relation of the parties, and is indulged whenever, as a legiti-mate inference, the occurrence is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not take place when the proper care is exercised.

This doctrine has been applied to those using electricity in streets. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. State, Nelson, 82 Md. 293, 31 L. R. A. 572; Haynes v. Raleigh Gas Co. 114 N. C. 208, 26 L. R. A. 810. Public policy, from sheer necessity, must require of a person or corporation using the current of electricity in high tension along highways a very high, if not the highest, degree of care, and this high degree would seem all the more reasonable to justify this rule of presumptive negligence in such cases. The degree of care in the nature of the case being high, and there being little danger if such care be exercised, if accident happen there is afforded a probability of the absence of that care. This high degree of care is exacted of operators of electricity by the cases just cited, and by Denver Consol. Electric Co. v. Simpson, 21 Colo. 371, 31 L. R. A. 566; Giraudi v. Electric Improv. Co. 107 Cal. 120, 28 L. R. A. 596; Ennis v. Gray, 87 Hun. 355. Croswell, Electricity, § 249, says that the mere fact that an electric wire sags or falls, if unexplained, is sufficient proof prima facie of negligence. But juries must understand that this presumption is by no means final or conclusive. Uniformly careful, prudent management commensurate with the dangerous character of the works, adequate to the safety of the public, in the absence of specific neglect connected with the accident, will repel such presumption. We must not forget that misfortunes do occur from inevitable accident. A wire may have some defect which the most astute care will not discern. A wire originally good may come to be defective and break, when no human skill could detect its defect. Time and wear deteriorate man and all the means and instruments he uses to gain a living. Paralysis and failure may come upon him at any moment. Whether there is culpable blame is a question for a fair-minded jury under all the circumstances.

It follows from what I have said that the court properly refused to exclude the plaintiff's evidence, as it tended in an appreciable degree to sustain the case, so as to make it proper to go to a jury. So I may say as to the defense of contributory negligence. Carrico v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 339, point 3; Yeager v. Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484. And the defense waived the motion to exclude by going on with its evidence. Robinson v. Welty, 40 W. Va. 335; Core v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 456. And it follows from the views above given that the court did not err in refusing to give defendant's instruction No. 2, that the mere fact that Snyder was injured raised no presumption of negligence against the defendant. In an instruction in lieu of it the jury was told that the mere fact of injury raised no presumption of negligence, unless the proof establishing the injury showed circumstances from which some negligence or want of care may be attributed to the defendant. This was error against plaintiff, because it negatived the rule that the fall of the wire and injury afforded a prima facie case of negligence, 39 L. R. A.

and was beneficial to the defendant. Defendant asked instruction 9, saying that, if the wire where the accident occurred was defective, and the injury resulted from that defect, that raised no presumption of negligence, and the plaintiff could not recover unless he proved by a preponderance of evidence, in addition to these facts, that the defect occurred through the negligent act or default of the defendant. This instruction is bad. Granting a defect in the wire killing the deceased, a prima facie case for recovery is made. Defendant asked and was refused instruction No. 10: "Where an event takes place, the real cause of which cannot be traced, or is at least not apparent, it ordinarily belongs to that class of occurrences designated as purely accidental, and, there being no presumption of negligence in such cases, the party who asserts negligence cannot recover without showing enough to exclude the case from that class of accidental occurrences." In Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 412, cited to support the instruction, it is admitted, I think, that in cases where a presumption of negligence arises, the principle of this instruction does not apply. The instruction is bad as applied to this case, in view of the rule above stated of a presumption of negligence from this occurrence. Defendant was refused instruction No. 11: "Where the circumstances of an accident indicate that it may have been unavoidable notwithstanding reasonable and proper care, the plaintiff charging negligence cannot recover without showing that the defendant has violated a duty incumbent upon it from which the injury followed in natural sequence." I think this instruction proper, in view of the defendant's evidence as to good management, and evidence by witnesses on both sides that electric wires sometimes break from causes impossible to discover. Of course, though the prima facie presumption of negligence from the broken wire exists, yet it is subject to be met by any and all circumstances, features, and evidence in the case tending to give the misfortune a cause not springing from the company's fault, but purely from an accident, which no reasonable human care could prevent, a hidden defect in the wire, electrolysis rendering it suddenly weak, or whatever cause. This instruction presented the question to the jury on the whole breadth and aspect of the case, whether the misfortune came from unavoidable accident; and it seems to me that, when the circumstances do indicate unavoidable accident as the cause, it ought to be shown or appear that it was not. Why was not the defendant entitled to this instruction? I think instruction No. 12 asked by defendant was improperly refused. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 404. "(12) The defendant, in erecting and maintaining its wires, was only bound to anticipate such combinations of circumstances and accidents and injuries therefrom as it may reasonably forecast as likely to happen, taking into account its own past experience and the experience and practice of others in similar situations, together with what is inherently probable in the condition of the wires as they relate to the conduct of its business." As the case is to be retried, I shall not discuss the merits on the evidence as to the liability or nonliability of the defendant, either with or without reference to contributory negligence, as the evidence may not be the same on a second trial, and, if not, this court ought not to express an opinion on part of the evidence.

We will therefore reverse the judgment, grant a new trial, and remand.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK, Appt.,

v.

Benjamin F. JARBOE et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. One insured under a policy entitling him to a paid-up policy in proportion to the premiums paid, after payment of three annual premiums, provided he surrenders the policy before making default or within six months after default in the payment of premiums, is entitled to a paid-up policy after making three payments, although the original policy is not surrendered or a demand made for the paid-up policy within the six months after default, if such demand is made during the lifetime of the insured.

2. The delivery of a life insurance policy which is void for failure to pay a premium is not a prerequisite to the institution of an action to obtain judgment for a paid-up policy in accordance with a provision of the policy, as such original policy is of no effect and can be of no value to any person.

(October 20, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marion County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to compel the issuance of a paid-up insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Grubbs & Morancy, for appellant:

The court held in Hexter v. United States L. Ins. Co. 91 Ky. 356, that because Mrs. Hexter had not applied to the company within the twelve months after ceasing to pay premiums as provided in the policy she failed to perform the condition precedent stipulated for, and therefore had no claim whatever against the insurance company.

The court held in Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barbour, 92 Ky. 427, 15 L. R. A. 449, that the six-months limit for applying for paid-up insurance was of the essence of the contract, and that because Barbour had not applied within the stipulated time he had no claim against the company.

Mery v. Phœnix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 14 Bush, 51, is radically different from the case at bar.

In Johnson v. Southern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 79 Ky. 404, it was plain that the court was evidently of the opinion that Johnson should have applied for a paid-up insurance within the stipulated time, even though it was only thirty days.

Where the contract of insurance provides that after default in the payment of premiums the assured shall be entitled to paid-up insurance for a proportionate part of the whole sum assured, if he shall surrender the old policy for the new within a certain specified time, time is of the essence of the contract, and the assured can have no claim against the company unless he complies with the condition precedent, and makes his demand within the stipulated time.

It is not so important that the law should be rightly settled, as that it should remain stable after it is settled.

South v. Thomas, 7 T. B. Mon. 62; Tribble v. Taul, 7 T. B. Mon. 456; Deposit Bank v. Daviess County, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 265.

If it is expressly stipulated that the policy must be surrendered and receipted in full within a specified time after default in payment of a premium to entitle the assured to a paid-up policy, such a provision must be complied with, and the option must be exercised within the time designated, otherwise it is lost, for time is of the essence of the contract.

Guffy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was instituted in the Marion circuit court by the appellees against the appellant, seeking to obtain judgment for a paid-up insurance policy. It appears from the petition that a $8,000 policy of life insurance was issued by appellant on the life of said Benjamin F. Jarboe, payable to his wife, appellee herein. Said policy was issued on what is known as the "twenty-year distribution plan," and on which said Jarboe was to pay only twenty annual payments. The annual premiums amounted to $98.80 each. It is alleged that appellee paid the first three annual payments, the last of which was made January 2, 1891. It is alleged in the petition that plaintiff was unable to pay the premium falling due January 2, 1892. It is also alleged in the petition that, after the payment of three annual payments, appellees were entitled to a paid-up policy for the sum of $450, and that before the filing of this suit the appellees demanded of Will R. Ruble, acting agent of appellant, a paid-up policy for said sum. Appellees averred that they were ready to deliver and surrender to appellant the policy aforesaid, and all their right, claim, and interest in the same, on the issuing and delivering to appellees a paid-up policy for the sum of $450, and that appellant and its agents failed and refused to issue to appellees any paid-up policy, and failed and refused to deliver same, or to issue any paid-up policy, on their making the demand as above stated. It is alleged that said policy should be made payable to Hattie Jarboe, at the death of said Benjamin F. Jarboe. It was also claimed in the petition that there should be added to the sum of $450 dividends thereon. The insurance policy was made part of the petition. One of the provisions reads as follows: "After three full annual payments have been paid upon this policy, the company will, upon the legal surrender thereof, before default in payment of any premiums, or within six months thereafter, issue a nonparticipating policy for paid-up insurance, payable as hereinafter provided, for the proportion of the amount of this policy which number of full years' premium paid bears to the total number required." Appellant demurred to the petition, which demurrer was overruled by the court. Thereupon appellant filed its answer, which may be taken as a traverse of all the material averments of the petition, except the fact of the issue of the policy as claimed, and the payment of three payments. Appellees' demurrer to the answer was sustained by the court, and, appellant failing to plead further, judgment was rendered, directing the appellant to issue and deliver to plaintiffs a nonparticipating paid-up policy for the sum of $450, on the life of plaintiff Benjamin F. Jarboe, payable, at the death of said Benjamin F. Jarboe, to his wife, Hattie Jarboe, etc., and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The contention of appellant is that, inasmuch as the policy issued by it to the appellees was not surrendered before default in the payment of premium had occurred, or within six months thereafter, the right to the paid-up policy was forfeited, or the obligation of appellant to issue a paid-up policy had terminated, and cites Hexter v. United States L. Ins. Co. 91 Ky. 357, and Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barbour, 92 Ky. 429, 15 L. R. A. 449, in support of its contention. It will be seen from an examination of the first-named case that the policy was issued in 1887, and that nearly fifteen years thereafter, the assured in the meantime having died, suit was brought to recover upon the policy; hence the facts in the case at bar are essentially different from the case supra. In the case in 92 Ky. it will be seen that several notes were executed by the assured for the payment of premiums, and default made as to the payment of the notes; that no money was ever paid upon the policy either as premiums or interest on the notes given for the premiums after December 8, 1884; and when default was made, December 8, 1886, there was indebtedness for premiums of the prior date, and of interest about $100, and within about three years thereafter the action was brought to recover. That case is unlike the case at bar. The case of Montgomery v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. 14 Bush, 51, is a well-considered case, and in which, it seems to us, the question involved is practically the same involved in the case under consideration. The appellee in that case had issued a policy of insurance to Montgomery on his life, in the sum of $10,000, payable in ten annual payments. Among other conditions the following condition was embraced in the policy: "It being understood and agreed that if, after the receipt by this company of not less than two or more annual premiums, this policy should cease in consequence of the nonpayment of premiums, then upon a surrender of the same, provided such surrender is made to the company within twelve months from the time of such ceasing, a new policy will be issued for the value acquired under the old one, subject to any notes that may have been received on account of premiums; that is to say, if payments for two years shall have been made, it will issue a policy for two tenths of the sum originally insured; if for three years, for three tenths; and in the same proportion for any number of payments, without subjecting the assured to any subsequent charge except the interest annually in advance on all premium notes remaining unpaid on this policy." It seems, after making five payments, assured made default, and failed to surrender the policy, or to demand a new one, within the time prescribed in the policy. The beneficiary in the policy, Mrs. Montgomery, brought suit to recover five tenths of the amount insured. The court below dismissed her petition, and she prosecuted an appeal to this court. The court, in discussing the question, said: "Three questions are presented for decision, which may be stated thus: (1) Did the failure to surrender, or to offer to surrender, the policy within twelve months after default in the payment of premiums, release the company from any further liability on the policy for any part of the sum insured? (2) Was the policy forfeited by the failure to pay the note for $129.40 when due? (3) If the foregoing questions be answered in the negative, how much is the appellant entitled to recover?" The court further said: "Prior to September 5, 1872, the insured had paid four full annual premiums, and on that day had a right to demand a paid-up policy for $4,000, not ex gratia, as appellee's counsel seem to intimate, but because it had been paid for. Each annual premium paid for carrying the policy for the current year, and for $1,000 of paid-up insurance, and at the end of four years a paid-up policy was as certainly paid for, at the contract price, as the four years of current insurance. If, as we assume for the present, the premium for the year commencing September 5, 1872, was not paid, the stipulation is that the company shall not be liable for the payment of the whole sum assured, but only for a part thereof proportionate to the annual payments made as above specified, and this policy shall cease and determine." We quote further from the case supra: "Time is not generally of the essence of contracts." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 776. It may be so when the contract is executory on both sides, or when the nature of the transaction or the stipulation of the parties shows it was so intended by them. But when the defendant has received the entire consideration for performance on his part, and has no other defense except that the plaintiff did not come within the stipulated time to demand performance, we are not acquainted with any authority or legal principle upon which such a defense can be upheld in a court of equity. If, for any reason, the defendant has become unable to perform his agreement, or performance would be more difficult or onerous at the time of the demand than it would have been at the time stipulated, there might be plausibility in such a defense, and a court of equity would no doubt either deny all relief to the plaintiff, or grant relief upon terms that would compensate the defendant for the additional burden resulting from the plaintiff's delay. But nothing of the kind is pretended in this case. The proposition upon which this branch of the company's defense rests in this, and nothing more. It is admitted that the assured paid for a paid-up policy for $4,000, and that if the old policy had been surrendered at any time between September 5, 1872, and September 5, 1873, the company would have been bound to issue a new policy for that sum; and, because the old policy was not surrendered within that time, that the assured has lost the benefit of $4,000 of paid-up insurance."

It will be seen from the policy in the case at bar that it was distinctly provided that, if the assured paid three annual payments, he was then entitled to a paid-up policy in proportion to the premiums paid, provided he surrendered the policy before he made default, or within six months after default in the payment of premiums. It is clear, under the contract, that the three payments not only continued the policy in force for the time being, but also paid, at the election of the assured, for a paid-up policy in proportion to the premiums paid. The contract has none of the elements of an offer to sell, but it is a clear case in which the assured has bought and paid for a certain thing. It has a stipulation, in effect, that he shall demand it within six months after his abandonment of the other benefits acquired under the same contract. The only defense presented in this case is the simple fact that the appellees had not, within six months after the failure to pay the premium due, surrendered the original policy, and demanded the issuing of the other. It is not pretended that it was any more difficult or expensive for the appellant to issue a paid-up policy when demanded than if it had been demanded at the end of the six months, nor can it be of any pecuniary consequence to defendant whether the forfeited policy was delivered up before the institution of this suit. The original policy, being dead and of no effect, could be of no value to any person. It seems clear to us that, under the principles announced in Montgomery v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., the appellees were entitled to recover in this action, and we adhere to the doctrine announced in that decision. To the extent, if any, that the principles announced in the decisions of Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Barbour and Hexter v. United States L. Ins. Co. conflict with the doctrine announced in Montgomery v. Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co., they are overruled. See Johnson v. Southern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 79 Ky. 408, and Southern Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Montague, 84 Ky. 653.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing denied.

W. R. MILWARD

v.

Annie E. SHIELDS.

(.....Ky.....)

A claim for funeral expenses of a mortgagor of land is not entitled to priority over the lien of the mortgage, under Stat. § 3893, providing that if the personal estate of a decedent is not sufficient to pay his liabilities the burial expenses shall be paid in full "before any pro rata distribution shall be made."

(October 20, 1897.)

A PPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fayette County refusing to allow his claim for funeral expenses out of assets of the estate of Fielden Powell, deceased, as against the claim of a mortgagee. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Falconer & Falconer, for appellant:

There is no distinction between real and personal property, and the whole fund produced by the sale of the real property in this action must be distributed as legal assets of the deceased.

Muldoon v. Crawford, 14 Bush, 125.

The claim for funeral expenses has been adjudged prior and superior to any lien debts existing at the death of decedent.

Best v. Spooner, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 602.

"Funeral expenses" says Lord Coke, according to the degree and quality of the deceased, are to be allowed of the goods of the deceased, before any debt or duty whatsoever; if he has no goods then they should be allowed of the proceeds of his real property so to pay his debts and settle his estate.

3 Coke, Inst. p. 202.

NOTE.—As to liability of decedent's estate for funeral expenses in general, see note to Fogg v. Holbrook (Me.) 33 L. R. A. 660.

The law authorizes an executor to defray a certain expense attendant upon the burying of the deceased before he pays the costs of proving the will, and as the expense of proving a will is payable before debts owing by the testator, the law empowers the executor to pay a certain expense for the funeral before he discharges any debt owing by the deceased, even if it be a debt due to the Crown.

Ram, Assets, p. 258; King v. Wade, 5 Price, 621; 2 Bl. Com. 208; Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 585, 17 Am. Rep. 384; Parker v. Lewis, 2 Dev. L. 21; Trueman v. Tilden, 6 N. H. 202; 2 Kent, Com. *416; Schouler, Exrs. & Admsrs. § 421.

Necessary funeral expenses are not a debt because they are not contracted until after the death of the party by his executor or administrator, as the case may be, or by some person interested in the burial of the deceased, and when so created, to the extent that they are reasonable, they become a charge against the estate and should be paid first before taxes or claims in favor of the state and before costs of administration or fees or commissions for settling the estate or any liens or encumbrances that may have been created by contract or by operation of law.

Mr. C. T. Hanson for appellee.

Du Relle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The sole question for decision in this case is whether the lien of the mortgagee of real estate is superior to the claim of an undertaker for funeral expenses of the dead mortgagor. So far as we are informed, the question has never been decided by this court, and we have not been referred to any authority on the question, except the case of Best v. Spooner, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 602, in which the superior court divided, the majority holding that a claim for funeral expenses was superior to the lien of an attachment levied before decedent's death. The reasoning of the majority in that case is difficult to follow, if we concede to the decedent the power to dispose of his property, and give due regard to the obligation of contracts. It is not sought to assert a priority in favor of funeral expenses under the statute (Ky. Stat. § 3868), which provides that "if the personal estate of a decedent be not sufficient to pay his liabilities, then the burial expenses of such decedent, and the cost and charges of the administration of his estate, and the amount of the estate of a dead person, or of a ward, or of a person of unsound mind, committed by a court of record to, and remaining in the hands of, a decedent, shall be paid in full before any pro rata distribution shall be made." Under the statute, funeral expenses and claims against the decedent in a fiduciary capacity are put upon the same footing, and no one has yet claimed that money due to a ward from the estate of a decedent has priority over an antecedent mortgage lien. The statute appears to us to apply entirely to assets for distribution in the hands of the personal representative, and was so conceded in the opinion of Judge Richards in the superior court; and, 39 L. R. A.

while the proceeds of realty—the personal estate being insufficient—are assets for the payment of debts, and subject to the rule of distribution laid down in the statute quoted (Muldoon v. Crawford, 14 Bush, 125), the proceeds of realty covered by prior lien are not assets in the hands of the personal representative for distribution. The statute, moreover, gives priority to funeral expenses over those debts only which come in for a pro rata distribution, and no pro rata distribution can be made to a mortgage creditor except upon the residue of his debt after he has exhausted the mortgaged property. As well said by Judge Reid in the dissenting opinion in the case referred to: "The statute has no reference to, nor any effect upon, bona fide liens secured to creditors of the decedent under the general law, such as liens by mortgage, or liens acquired—like attachment liens—by operation of law, but regulates priorities in reference only to unsecured liabilities, gives certain liabilities and expenses priority, and then puts all other debts and liabilities on equal footing. It leaves valid liens acquired on the decedent's estate where the rules of the general law leave them. Such liens have no validity by virtue of the statute in question, but exist independent of it. They overrule burial expenses, claims due the estate of a dead person, or of a ward, or of a person of unsound mind committed by a court of record to and remaining in the hands of a decedent, and the costs and charges of administration, except so far as the latter may necessarily be incurred in ascertaining the lien, and pursuing it to judgment, with a view to determine whether any assets, personal or real, may be left, after the encumbrance is satisfied, for distribution under the terms of the statute. Every lien may be considered exposed to this peril, but no more. If burial expenses are allowed to overreach a valid lien, acquired in good faith before the death of the decedent, so may what he owes as fiduciary to the estate of a dead person, of a ward, or of a lunatic, and the lien might be totally destroyed, if such claims had priority; and no matter how acquired in the lifetime of the decedent, they might be as worthless as the paper by which they are evidenced. The burial expenses and the other statutory priorities are placed on the same footing, and are of the same dignity, and are superior only to the general unsecured liabilities of the decedent. They cannot prevail against and consume liens created voluntarily by the decedent before he dies, or by the equally binding operation of law, but stand secure in their inherent force, by virtue of the general law governing them." But in this case, as in the case in 4 Ky. L. Rep. 602, it has been sought to justify the claim of priority for funeral expenses under the common law. The authorities quoted in support of the majority opinion do not sustain the doctrine there laid down. Each of the authorities quoted is in reference to the powers and duties of executors or administrators in the distribution of the assets among the general creditors. Ram, Assets, 258; King v. Wade, 5 Price, 621; Lomax, Exrs. 1, 283; 2 Bl. Com. 508; Patterson v. Patterson, 59 N. Y. 585, 17 Am. Rep. 384; Trueman v. Tilden, 6 N. H. 202; Parker v. Lewis, 2 Dev. L. 21; Hancock v.

Podmore, 1 Barn. & Ad. 260. In the case of Parker v. Lewis, 3 Dev. L. 21 (not 8 Dev., as cited), it was held that funeral expenses "form a charge upon the assets, independently of any promise by the executor or administrator, upon the ascertainment of the fact that they are of that description, and proper for the estate and degree of the deceased." In that case the question was not one of lien, but simply of priority in administration between the funeral expenses and a judgment debt in favor of the administrator. In Trueman v. Tilden, 6 N. H. 202, it was stated that "funeral expenses are a charge upon the estate of a deceased person," the word "estate" being used to mean "assets," its technical meaning when employed in reference to a personal representative. The sole question in that case was whether the administrator, by charging the amount of the funeral expenses in his administration account, had made himself personally liable. The citation from Sir Edward Coke (to be found in 3 Inst. 202) goes to the point only that proper funeral expenses are to be allowed of the goods of the deceased, before any debt or duty whatsoever. No case has been referred to, or authority cited,—and we are confident none can be found,—in which it was held, or the doctrine was laid down, that a claim for funeral expenses, which is not a debt against the estate at all, but more properly a credit to the personal representative, is superior to the lien of a mortgage, whereby the decedent devoted so much as might be necessary of certain specified property to the payment of the mortgage debt. The decedent, up to the date of his death, had absolute control of his property. He could dispose of it by deed or mortgage, and, in the latter case, though he did not part with the legal title, he did part with the equity. To the extent that it was necessary, his estate in the property mortgaged was appropriated to the payment of the mortgage. Nor does the argument drawn ex necessitate appear to be meritorious. It is true that when a man dies he must be buried, but it is equally true that while he lives he must be fed and clothed, and when sick he should receive medical attention. It is pro bono publico that these things should be done. And, if a man have assets, these things should be paid for out of such assets; but, if not, the state provides poor houses, hospitals, and pauper burial. There is no reason why a claim for one of these things more than another should be permitted to override the contract rights of a mortgagee.

Wherefore the judgment of the Lower Court is affirmed.

Joseph BANKER.

(.....Mass.....)

1. Unincorporated associations of workmen, although not manufacturers or vendors of goods, are within the protection of Stat. 1895, for the prevention of the use of counterfeit labels and stamps of "any person, association, or union."
2. The illegality of some incident or particular of the purposes of a trade union will not deprive the union of the protection of the law for what would otherwise be its rights in respect to the use of a union label.
3. The fraudulent use of a trade-union label before the passage of a statute giving such an unincorporated union a remedy for such use of its label does not give the wrongdoer any exemption from the statute.
4. The use of real labels in a fraudulent way is as unlawful, under Stat. 1895, chap. 462, as the use of counterfeit labels.

(February 8, 1898.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for opinion of the Supreme Judicial Court of a suit brought to enjoin defendant from using a label alleged to belong to the cigar makers' union. Decree for plaintiff.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—For trademark or label of trade union, see State v. Bishop (Mo.) 29 L. R. A. 200, and note. 9 L. R. A.

Mr. William Schofield, for plaintiff:

The effect of the legislation in this state is like that of the trademark registration acts in England. It provides a new method of acquiring, or at least of proving, the right to a trademark, viz., registration, and it enables persons or associations to acquire and put upon an equality with trademarks things which could not be exclusively appropriated by the common law.

Sebastian, Trademarks, 8d ed. pp. 96, 97; Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101, 8 L. R. A. 640.

Equitable remedies have been extended to this label in several jurisdictions, without the help of statutes.

People v. Fisher, 50 Hun, 552; Bloets v. Simon, 19 Abb. N. C. 88; Strasser v. Moonelis, 108 N. Y. 611; Hetterman Bros. v. Powers, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 1087, 89 L. R. A. 211.

The use of the union label by the defendant upon cigars made by him involves a false representation, against which those members of the union who are manufacturers of cigars have a right in equity to relief. This right rests simply upon the ground of fraud.

Chadwick v. Corvell, 151 Mass. 190, 6 L. R. A. 89; Carson v. Ury, 39 Fed. Rep. 777, 5 L. R. A. 614; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 709; Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199.

The plaintiff brings this suit on behalf of and for the use of the union. This right is given by the statute, § 5, act of 1893. The case being here on report, and no question of pleading having been raised below, it may be treated, if necessary, as a suit by one in behalf of all other members of the union who are manufacturers.

1 Dan. Ch. Pr. 6th Am. ed. 243, and note (a); Schneider v. Williams, 44 N. J. Eq. 391.

The defendant contends that he has a right to use the labels because he buys them and they are his property.

By the common law, even a valid trademark was not property.

Chadwick v. Covell, 151 Mass. 193, 6 L. R. A. 889; Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199.

By the English trademarks acts the person who registers a trademark is proprietor. So, by the act of Congress of 1881 (21 Stat. at L. 502, chap. 188), the person who registers is described as owner. But the ownership is restricted, and not assignable except in special circumstances.

Sebastian, Trademarks, 3d ed. 186, 187; Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769.

This label states that the cigars upon which it is placed are made by members of the cigar makers' international union, and is probably not assignable in any event.

Hoxie v. Chaney, 143 Mass. 592, 58 Am. Rep. 149.

If the label is, in any view of the law, assignable, the defendant bought with full knowledge that the copies sold to him were issued by the owner in trust and confidence. The statements printed upon them are such that he cannot use them honestly, and he will not be permitted to use them to effect a fraud.

Evans v. Von Laer, 32 Fed. Rep. 153; Sawyer Crystal Blue Co. v. Hubbard, 32 Fed. Rep. 388; Wood v. Burgess, L. R. 24 Q. B. Div. 162.

Mere delay, in order to be a defense in equity upon the merits, must amount to abandonment or an implication of a grant.

Sebastian, Trademarks, 3d ed. 224-228.

In this case the defendants' conduct is proved to be fraudulent and delay will have no effect even on the question of accounting and damages, except as to matters prior to suit.

Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. ed. 526.

The objects of the organization, as set forth in its Constitution, disclose nothing unlawful under the rule applied to trades unions.

Com. v. Hunt, 4 Met. 111, 38 Am. Dec. 346; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 179; Stat. 1888, chap. 134; 1890, chap. 380, and 1894, chap. 487; Com. v. Chew, v. Carlisle, Brightly (Pa.) 36; Master Stevedores' Assn. v. Walsh, 2 Daly, 1; Macaulay Bros. v. Tierney, 19 R. I. —, 37 L. R. A. 455.

The words, "an organization opposed to inferior rat-shop, coolie, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship," on the label in its original form, were criticised as indicating a purpose of coercion in McVey v. Brendel, 144 Pa. 285, 13 L. R. A. 377, and were upheld in Cohn v. People, 149 Ill. 486, 23 L. R. A. 821; and State v. Hagen, 6 Ind. App. 167. Those words are not on the label in its present form.

There is nothing to show that the plaintiff union, as a part of its plan or policy, has used unlawful means.

State v. Bishop, 128 Mo. 373, 29 L. R. A. 200; Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 179.

Mr. B. H. Greenwood, for defendant:

The act of 1895 cannot be invoked by any other than an actual merchant or manufacturer. And the plaintiff is neither one nor the other.

Acts of 1895, chap. 462; Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101, 8 L. R. A. 640.

If the plaintiff had any equitable rights, it lost them by lying by "for more than two years," with full knowledge of the facts, and permitting defendant to affix the labels to his cigars.

Phillips v. Rogers, 12 Met. 405; Plymouth v. Russell Mills, 7 Allen, 488; Evans v. Bacon, 99 Mass. 218.

Holmes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity brought under Stat. 1895, chap. 462, § 3, by the officer of a voluntary association, as authorized by that section, to prevent the defendant from fraudulently using the association's trade-union label, and counterfeits of such label. The defenses requiring notice are that the statute protects only merchants or manufacturers, that the association is not of a kind that will be protected by the court, and laches.

The label is part of the well-known machinery of trades unions, and the use of it is found, if a finding be necessary, to be of value to the union and its members. It would not be traveling too far from the record, perhaps, if we should assume that the use of the label is in fact, as certainly it might be, of far more economic importance to the union than are many or most of the trademarks, strictly so called, which are protected by the courts. Nevertheless, technical difficulties, which would have been hard to escape from without some subtlety or a statute, prevented the plaintiff from recovering in a case like this.

Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101, 8 L. R. A. 640. See State v. Bishop, 128 Mo. 373, 381, 29 L. R. A. 200. That was in 1890. Just before the argument of that case there was an attempt at legislation on the subject. Stat. 1890, chap. 104. Three years later a statute was passed which certainly looks as if it had been intended, in part, to meet that decision. Stat. 1893, chap. 443. But this act was still somewhat under the influence of the notion that protection of the label was a protection of manufacture; and after an amendment by Stat. 1894, chap. 285, it was repealed by the act of 1895 which still is in force. It is true that the present statute is entitled "An Act to Protect Manufacturers from the Use of Counterfeit Labels and Stamps." But we can see no sufficient room for doubt that it protects the plaintiff. The 1st section extends to "any person, association, or union." That unincorporated associations or unions were contemplated is shown by § 3, already referred to, which allows suits to be prosecuted by the officers of such associations or unions. It is impossible to believe that, when the statute mentions unincorporated unions, it does not refer to trade unions. It authorizes such unions to adopt, as well as to record, a label.

Therefore it creates a right, if the court is unable to recognize one without its aid. If it applies to trade unions, it must be taken to apply to them as they ordinarily are; that is, as associations of workmen, not as manufacturers or vendors of goods. It contemplates that the labels will be applied to merchandise, as of course they must be, and as these labels are. But it carefully abstains from using a word which implies that the protection or wrongful use of labels is confined to manufacturers or vendors. The policy of the statute is shown by the above-cited amendment of 1894 to the earlier act, which had for its object to extend the liability to others besides the manufacturers.

If, as we think, the statute expressly creates or recognizes the right of trade unions to be protected in the use of labels for trade-union purposes, the suggestion that the association represented by the plaintiff is an unlawful association falls of itself. It is too late to make such a contention as to trade unions generally, even apart from the statute under which this suit is brought. But the general purposes of this union are similar, so far as we know, to the general purposes of other unions. The constitution, as a whole, is not illegal; and the association is not deprived of the protection of the law, for what otherwise would be its rights, if in some incident or particular the purposes which it expresses are unlawful,—which we do not imply. See Cohn v. People, 149 Ill. 486, 23 L. R. A. 821; Carson v. Ury, 89 Fed. Rep. 777, 5 L. R. A. 614; State v. Hagen, 6 Ind. App. 167, 173; State v. Bishop, 128 Mo. 873, 29 L. R. A. 200.

The plaintiff's association had a label registered under the earlier statute of 1893. The defendant has the boldness to urge that because he began his attempt to defraud the union in 1894, before the act of 1895 was passed, after having been permitted on his application to use the label for a time, therefore the plaintiff's union has no rights under the statute. We do not think the suggestion needs more than a statement.

The plaintiff has lost no rights through laches. Nudd v. Powers, 136 Mass. 273, 277, 278; Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 523, 524, 32 L. ed. 526, 528, 529.

Finally, as the plaintiff makes out his right, it is to be protected against one form of swindling as well as another,—against the use of real labels in a fraudulent way, as well as against the use of counterfeits,—if, indeed, the real labels, as used by the defendant after mutilation, are not counterfeits, within the statute.

Decree for plaintiff.

Town of BOURNE.

(.....Mass.....)

1. The joint committee of towns which united under Stat. 1893, chap. 344, to employ a superintendent of schools and obtain a contribution therefor from the commonwealth, has authority to dismiss the superintendent for sufficient cause, and its authority does not cease with obtaining the contribution and employing the superintendent.

2. A contract of employment of a school superintendent is deemed to be for a year unless there is something to show that it is for a less term.

3. There is an implied condition which authorizes the dismissal of a school superintendent if circumstances arise which render him no longer able or fit to perform the duties of his position.

4. The indictment of a school superintendent for adultery, and especially a verdict of guilty, will justify his dismissal, although the verdict is afterwards set aside and the prosecution dismissed, since not only good character, but good reputation, is essential to the greatest usefulness in his position.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Bristol County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover compensation for services rendered by plaintiff as superintendent of schools. Affirmed.

The towns of Sandwich, Bourne, and Mashpee united under the provisions of acts of 1892, chapter 344, for the purpose of employing a superintendent of schools. At a meeting of the school committee, held on August 12, 1893, Delbert G. Donnocker was chosen to serve for an unexpired term. Subsequently he was indicted in the state of Maine for the commission of crime. Thereupon the school committee declared the office vacant and elected plaintiff as superintendent. This action was brought to recover compensation due to him as such.

Further facts appear in the opinion. Messrs. Charles F. Chamberlayne and Hiram P. Harriman, for appellant.

Where a statute is designed to ingraft upon an established system of statutory regulation a minor incident, a mere detail, no ground exists for extending, by implication, the powers conferred by the language. The necessity for such construction no longer exists, and the innovation will be limited in the operation to the meaning of its language, construed in the light of the mischief to be remedied.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 407; Sedgw. Stat. Constr. pp. 198, 202; Brown v. Pendergast, 7 Allen, 427.

The history of this and prior legislation shows that the law of 1888 relating to the election of school superintendents was intended to remedy a slight inadequacy in one particular in the working of the elaborate and long-established school system of the state,—which it in no way seeks further to disturb.

The act of 1888 simply offers financial inducements to small towns to accept previous provisions of law. It is not necessary, therefore, to construe it beyond its language in order to leave a perfectly available, practical, and complete system of school education.

The primary liability to support schools is still upon the towns.

Stat. 1826, chap. 143; Rev. Stat. chap. 28, § 1; Gen. Stat. chap. 38, § 1; Pub. Stat. chap. 44, § 21.

And this duty continues to be intrusted, under the broadest powers, most liberally construed, to the school committees of each town who "shall have the general charge and superintendence of all the public schools in the town."

Pub. Stat. chap. 44, § 21.

The school committee can engage teachers and fix their salaries, even in excess of the city or town appropriation.

They may dismiss teachers with or without cause.

Knowles v. Boston, 12 Gray, 339; Wood v. Medfield, 123 Mass. 545; Pub. Stat. chap. 44, § 30.

When the town so requires them, they are to choose a superintendent of schools, fix his compensation, and he is then to be under their "direction and control."

Pub. Stat. chap. 44, § 43.

And even where the authority to employ is revoked, the contract is still good against the town for the entire period of employment.

Kimball v. Salem, 111 Mass. 87.

The act bears, not only from its history, but upon its face, proof of the obvious limitations imposed upon its operation by the narrowness of its scope. The joint committee meets once a year, in April, a date apparently selected because the employment of the superintendent is "for one year" (Stat. 1888, chap. 431, § 3), under circumstances where the number of schools, the school appropriations, and "the average public school attendance" in each town is of importance (Stat. 1888, chap. 431, §§ 1, 3); the official record of which is computed, like the records of taxation, made important by § 1 of the same act, from May 1 of each year.

Pub. Stat. chap. 46, §§ 3, 5.

So far as appears, there is no reason for the joint committee coming together again for a year.

Messrs. Alfred S. Hayes, Arthur E. Burr, and Benjamin A. Lockhart, for appellee:

The joint committee had the power to discharge Donnocker.

The power to appoint necessarily includes the power to remove.

equity. His influence must of necessity be detrimental to the schools. It would be a perversion of all principle to say that the committee, because it had once elected him, must retain him notwithstanding his unfitness and his manifestly injurious influence. Public policy required his dismissal.

See People, Murphy, v. New York Bd. of Edu. 8 Hun, 181.

The several towns were bound by the vote of a majority of the joint committee, such as appears in this case, and the school committee of the defendant town, and the town itself, had no power to revoke the authority given by the statute to a majority of the joint committee to act as agent for the town.

Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. § 500; Kingsbury v. Centre School Dist. 12 Met. 99.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff's right to recover is denied by the defendant on the following grounds: (1) That, if the power to dismiss a superintendent of schools existed, it was not in the joint committee, but in the municipality; that the joint committee, after the annual convention, had no authority except to do the things which were necessary in order to secure the contribution of money from the commonwealth, and that, after that, the relations of the superintendent were directly with the town. (2) That there is, indeed, no power anywhere to dismiss a superintendent. (3) That the superintendent could only be dismissed for cause, and that no sufficient or legal cause of dismissal is disclosed.

We will consider these objections in their order.

By virtue of Stat. 1892, chap. 344, the towns of Sandwich, Bourne, and Mashpee united for the purpose of the employment of a superintendent of schools, in accordance with the provisions of Stat. 1888, chap. 431, which authorized certain small towns to unite for this purpose, and to obtain a contribution from the commonwealth. Before these statutes were passed, two or more towns were authorized to form a district for this purpose, but without any provision for obtaining money from the commonwealth. Pub. Stat. chap. 44, §§ 44, 45. It is expressly provided by Stat. 1888, chap. 431, § 2, that, "when such a union has been effected, the school committees of the towns comprising the union shall form a joint committee, and for the purposes of this act said joint committee shall be held to be the agents of each town comprising the union." They are to meet annually in joint convention, in the month of April, and choose a superintendent of schools, determine the relative amount of service to be performed by him in each town, fix his salary, and apportion the amount thereof to be paid by the several towns. The scheme necessarily implies that a superintendent can be employed or discharged only by the joint committee. The union is formed for the purpose of securing better service than the towns acting separately could obtain. For the purposes of the statute, the joint committee became the agents of each town, and their acts within the scope of their authority are binding upon each town. Separate action by the school committee of a single town would defeat the purposes of the union. It follows from this that the authority of the joint committee does not cease with obtaining the contribution from the commonwealth. That contribution contemplates the maintaining of a superintendent of schools for an entire year. Suppose the superintendent chosen in April dies shortly afterwards, or resigns, or goes away, or becomes insane, or otherwise totally incapacitated, so that there is no performance or attempt at performance of the duties of the position; someone must be appointed in his place, or else the money of the commonwealth will have been obtained on a consideration which has failed. In such case it is quite clear that the joint committee must act to fill the vacancy. Donnocker himself was chosen in this manner to fill a vacancy. The school committees of the towns cannot act separately. Whatever action is taken in respect to the employment of a superintendent must be by the joint committee, and, if there is any power of dismissal, it rests with the same body. Ex parte Hennen, 88 U. S. 18 Pet. 280, 10 L. ed. 188.

We come, then, to the questions whether there is any power to dismiss a superintendent of schools so chosen, and whether a sufficient and legal cause of dismissal in this case is disclosed. We may assume, at the outset, that the choice was for one year. Chase v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 88; Kimball v. Salem, 111 Mass. 87. Nevertheless, the tenure of an officer so chosen or employed is not like that of an officer whose term of office is fixed by law. His tenure depends upon the terms of his employment, and, by construction, the contract of his employment is deemed to be for a year, unless there is something to show that it is for a less term. But, in the selection and employment of an officer of this character, there is an implied condition which authorizes his dismissal, if circumstances arise which render him no longer able or fit to perform the duties of his position. The case of total incapacity has already been referred to. But there may be reasons, not amounting to total incapacity, which nevertheless furnish a practical disqualification, such, for example, as gross and habitual neglect of duty or habitual intoxication. The power to dismiss officers who are employed for fixed terms, in case of misbehavior or other supervening unfitness, was recognized in Chase v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 88, and it has always been held to exist in the case of clergymen settled for life. Avery v. Tyringham, 8 Mass. 160-177, 3 Am. Dec. 105; Thompson v. Catholic Cong. Soc. 5 Pick. 469; Peckham v. North Parish in Haverhill, 16 Pick. 274-288; Sheldon v. Congregational Parish in Easton, 24 Pick. 281, 286, 288.

In the present case the superintendent, who had been chosen by the joint committee, was afterwards indicted in Maine for adultery. The indictment was returned at a term beginning on the 1st Tuesday of September, 1893, which was on September 5, and on October 3 of the same year a verdict of guilty was returned upon his trial. This verdict was afterwards set aside, for some reason not shown in the agreed statement of facts, and at two subsequent trials the jury disagreed. A nol. pros. was afterwards entered. The votes of the joint committee declaring the office of superintendent vacant, and choosing his successor, were on October 2 and 9, 1893. A subsequent vote of ratification of the above vote was passed October 28 of the same year. The existence of this charge against the superintendent was known to the joint committee, and it is agreed that "there was no other reason for discharging him from the position as superintendent of schools than the fact of the existence of the charges contained in said indictment and the trials thereupon." A comparison of the above dates shows that the first vote of the joint committee was on October 2, and that the verdict in the first trial was on October 8. There can, however, be no doubt that the existence of the indictment alone would, at least, put him under just suspicion of having committed the offense therein charged. The joint committee did not act upon mere rumors more or less current in the community. Schools will suffer if those who conduct them are open to general and well-grounded suspicion of this kind. It needs no extended argument to show that not merely good character, but good reputation, is essential to the greatest usefulness in such a position as that of superintendent of schools. In Chaddock v. Briggs, 18 Mass. 248-254, 7 Am. Dec. 187, it is said in respect to a clergyman: "Even a reputation for immorality, although not supported by full proof, might, in some cases, be a sufficient ground for removal." Where a superintendent of schools is under indictment for adultery, it is competent for the joint committee to declare that he has become unsuitable and unfit to continue in that position, without assuming for themselves to determine the question of his guilt or innocence. They are not bound to form a judgment upon that matter. That question is in the hands of the courts, and the determination of it by a final conviction or acquittal may be long postponed, and, indeed, as in the present case, may never be reached. The pendency of the indictment, and especially the verdict of guilty, before their final votes, were sufficient to warrant them in declaring his office vacant, and in choosing his successor. No question is raised as to the regularity of their proceedings in matter of form.

Judgment for plaintiff affirmed.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Nebraska, ex rel. DOUGLAS COUNTY,

v.

John F. CORNELL.

(.....Neb.....)

- *1. The legislature may authorize taxation for a public purpose, but a tax imposed for an object in its nature essentially or strictly private is invalid.
2. It is for the legislature in the first instance to decide what is and what is not a public purpose, but its determination of the question is not conclusive upon the courts.
3. A tax law will not be declared invalid on the ground that the tax is not for the benefit of the public, unless it was imposed for the furtherance of an object or enterprise in which the public has palpably no interest.
4. Chapter 24, Laws 1897, authorizing counties to participate in interstate expositions, to issue bonds for such purpose, and to provide for the levy of tax for their payment, does not contravene the Constitution, on the ground that the object of the statute is to advance individual interest merely, and not to promote the public welfare.
5. An appropriation of the money arising from the sale of the bonds issued under said act, for the erection of suitable buildings, and maintaining the same, and a county exhibit at the Trans-Mississippi & International Exposition to be held in the city of Omaha in 1898, is for a public purpose or use, and not in violation of the Constitution.
6. It is a well-settled rule of construction that special provisions in a law relating to a particular subject-matter will prevail over general provisions in other statutes, so far as there is a conflict.
7. An affirmative vote of two thirds of all of those cast on the proposition is sufficient to carry bonds issued under chap. 24, Laws 1897, for the purpose of making a county exhibit at an interstate exposition.

(February 2, 1898.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to register certain bonds which had been issued by the relator. Granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Howard H. Baldrige, H. L. Day, and Montgomery & Hall, for relator:

The taxing power vested in the legislature is without limit, except such as may be prescribed by the Constitution itself.

State, Atchison & N. R. Co., v. Lancaster County Comrs. 4 Neb. 540.

What is a public purpose is not always easy of determination, but when determined it constitutes the boundary of the power of taxation, for there is no power to levy a tax for a purpose essentially private.

1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 508; Cooley, Taxn. p. 67.

Unless it is plain that the community taxed has palpably no interest in the matter,—that a burden is imposed for the benefit of others, and that it would be so pronounced at first blush,—then the tax is a valid one and will be upheld.

Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759; Cheaney v. Hooser, 9 B. Mon. 345; Cooley, Taxn. p. 70; Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 625, 83 Am. Dec. 711.

The right to tax depends on the ultimate use, purpose, and object for which the fund is raised, and not on the nature or character of the person or corporation whose intermediate agency is to be used in applying it.

Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759.

The fund raised is to be expended by the regular officers of Douglas county, and it is immaterial that as an incident of such expenditure such private corporation or some private individual will be benefited.

Hallenbeck v. Hahn, 2 Neb. 410.

Whether the county will benefit by such expenditure is not a question to be raised here, because not germane to the issue.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 5th ed. 285.

Even though the county shall not be benefited, but shall suffer a detriment, it does not follow that the tax will be invalid.

Hallenbeck v. Hahn, 2 Neb. 410; 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1242, and cases cited.

The legislature may authorize a town or other municipality to levy taxes therein for public purposes not strictly of a municipal character, but from which the public have received or will receive some direct advantage; or where the tax is to be expended in defraying the expenses of the government or in promoting the peace, good order, and welfare of society.

The legislative body of the state is the one to determine whether or not the enterprise is a public one, and it has determined it affirmatively by the enactment of the act allowing the issuance of the bonds.

Messrs. C. J. Smythe, Attorney General, and Ed. P. Smith for respondent.

Norval, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an original application to this court for a peremptory writ of mandamus, on the relation of Douglas county, to compel the respondent, as auditor of public accounts, to register in his office 100 certain coupon bonds of said county, aggregating $100,000, voted for the purpose of raising money to enable it to participate in the Trans-Mississippi & International Exposition, to be held in the city of Omaha during the year 1898. In 1897 the legislature of this state passed an act entitled "An Act to Authorize Counties to Participate in Interstate Expositions, to Issue Bonds for Such Purpose, and to Provide for a Tax for the Payment of Such Bonds." Sess. Laws 1897, chap. 24, p. 192. The first three sections of said law are here reproduced:

"Sec. 1. Whenever one thousand (1,000) voters of any county in the state of Nebraska having over 100,000 population shall petition the board of county commissioners or the board of supervisors to that end, any such county shall be and hereby is authorized to issue the bonds of such county, to become due twenty (20) years from the date thereof, and to bear interest at the rate not to exceed five (5) per cent per annum, to provide for the expenses of promoting the interests of such county by participating in any interstate exposition held in the state of Nebraska and making at such exposition a county exhibit, improving or beautifying the grounds, and erecting or aiding in the erection of a suitable building or buildings therefor, and maintaining the same during such exposition, to an amount to be determined by the board of county commissioners or board of supervisors, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000): provided, the board of county commissioners or board of supervisors shall first submit the question of the issuing of such bonds to a vote of the legal voters of such county at a general or special election, such question to be submitted entire after notice to such voters published in any newspaper of general circulation in such county for four (4) weeks next prior to such election; and provided, that such interstate exposition shall first have been recognized by the Congress of the United States by an appropriation of a sum not less than one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000).

"Sec. 2. The proposition when submitted shall contain a statement of the amount necessary to be raised each year for the payment of the interest of said bonds, and for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

"Sec. 3. If two thirds (2/3) of the votes cast on such proposition at any such election be in favor thereof, the said bonds shall be authorized and the proper officers of the county shall thereupon issue said bonds and the same shall be and continue a subsisting debt against such county until they are paid."

Section 4 of said act provides for the levying of a sufficient tax by the proper county officers upon all of the taxable property of the county to pay the principal and interest upon said bonds as the same become due and payable.

The relator shows that the proposition to issue the bonds in question was submitted to the electors of the county, and the same was adopted by them in strict conformity to the provisions of the said legislative enactment. The respondent has declined to register the bonds for the reason their legality is questioned; but he has not, by answer or otherwise, advised the court of the particular grounds upon which their validity is assailed, nor has he submitted any authorities in opposition to the issuance of the writ. Counsel for relator, in the briefs and at the bar, have argued two propositions, to which attention will be given, namely: First. Whether the bonds were voted for a lawful object or purpose. Second. Did the proposition to issue them receive the requisite affirmative vote of the electors of the county?

The following principles are too well established by the authorities to require discussion at this time: First. The legislature may authorize taxation for a public purpose, but a tax imposed for an object in its nature essentially private is void. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 508; Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. pp. 55, 108; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 87, and the numerous cases cited in note 2 on said page. Second. It is for the legislature, in the first instance, to decide whether the object for which a tax is to be used or raised is a public purpose, but its determination of the question is not conclusive. Ibid. Third. To justify a court in declaring a tax invalid on the ground that it was not imposed for the benefit of the public, the absence of a public interest in the purpose for which the money is raised by taxation must be so clear and palpable as to be immediately perceptible to every mind. Turner v. Althaus, 6 Neb. 54; Alfalfa Irrig. Dist. Directors v. Collins, 46 Neb. 411; Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 658; Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 150, 59 Am. Dec. 759; People, Board of Water Comrs., v. East Saginaw, 33 Mich. 164; Walker v. Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Stockton & V. R. Co. v. Stockton, 41 Cal. 147; Weisner v. Douglas, 84 N. Y. 91, 21 Am. Rep. 586; Citizens' Sav. & L. Assn. v. Topeka, 87 U. S. 20 Wall. 664, 22 L. ed. 461. In the last case it was said: "It is undoubtedly the duty of the legislature which imposes or authorizes municipalities to impose a tax to see that it is not to be used for purposes of private interest, instead of public use; and the courts can only be justified in interposing when a violation of this principle is clear and the reason for interference cogent. And in deciding whether, in a given case, the object for which the taxes are assessed falls upon the one side or the other of this line, they must be governed mainly by the course and usage of the government, the objects for which taxes have been customarily and by long course of legislation levied, what objects or purposes have been considered necessary to the support and for the proper use of the government, whether state or municipal. Whatever lawfully pertains to this and is sanctioned by time and the acquiescence of the people may well be held to belong to the public use, and proper for the maintenance of good government, though this may not be the only criterion of rightful taxation." The language of Folger, J., in his opinion in Weisner v. Douglas, 84 N. Y. 99, 21 Am. Rep. 586, deserves to be reproduced here: "It is a general rule that the legitimate object of raising money by taxation is for public purposes and the proper needs of government, general and local, state and municipal. When we come to ask, in any case, what is a public purpose, the answer is not always ready, not easily to be found. It is to be conceded that no pinched or meager sense may be put upon the words, and that if the purpose designated by the legislature lies so near the border line that it may be doubtful on which side of it it is domiciled, the courts may not set their judgment against that of the lawmakers." In Alfalfa Irrig. Dist. Directors v. Collins, 46 Neb. 420, occurs this language: "While all agree that the legislature cannot, without the consent of the owner, appropriate private property to purposes which in no way subserve public interests, the rule is quite as firmly settled that the courts will not interfere by declaring acts invalid simply because they may differ with the lawmaking power respecting the wisdom or necessity thereof. For if, by any reasonable construction, a designated use may be held to be public in a constitutional sense, the 89 L. R. A.

will of the legislature should prevail over any mere doubt of the court."

In the light of the principles already stated, is the legislation under which the bonds in question were voted illegal, on the ground that it authorized the imposing of burdens upon the public, by way of taxation, in aid of a private enterprise, and not in furtherance of an object which is public in its character? The answer must be in the negative. The statute under review does not attempt or purport to authorize the issuance or donation of the bonds to private individuals, or the corporation under whose auspices the exposition is to be held; nor does the act contemplate that the money derived from the sale of the bonds shall be devoted to promote the interest of a few; but the intention of the law was to enable any county availing itself of its provisions to raise the means with which to meet the expenses of erecting a suitable building or buildings, and maintaining the same, and an exhibit of the resources of the county at the Trans-Mississippi & International Exposition, to be held in the city of Omaha in 1898. The proceeds of the bonds are to be disbursed for the purpose mentioned in the law by Douglas county, through its officers and agents. We cannot determine judicially that such an object is purely private, and not public in its character, especially in view of the legislation and adjudication in this state now to be mentioned. The legislature in 1891 appropriated $50,000 "to provide for a presentation of the products, resources, and possibilities of the state of Nebraska at the World's Columbian Exposition." Laws 1891, chap. 57. An additional appropriation of $35,000 was subsequently made for the same purpose. Laws 1893, chap. 41. Both of those amounts were paid by the state treasurer, and the money was expended without anyone challenging the legality of the appropriations on the ground that they were not made for the public good. Our legislature appropriated $100,000 at the last session for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the state in making a proper exhibit of its resources and products at the said Trans-Mississippi & International Exposition. Laws 1897, chap. 88, p. 869. Section 8, art. 1, chap. 2, Comp. Stat. provides that $2,000 shall be paid annually out of the state treasury to the state board of agriculture to be used in payment of premiums awarded by said board at the state fair. And § 10 of the same article and chapter authorizes the payment to the state horticultural society of $1,000 annually for the use and benefit of said society. The legislature has each session made the appropriations required by said sections for the purposes therein indicated, and the same have been paid without a suggestion from any source that the money was not devoted to a public use. Section 16 of the same article and chapter authorizes a county, under certain restrictions, to appropriate and pay to the county agricultural society not exceeding $100 for every 1,000 inhabitants in the county, "to be expended by such society in fitting up such fair grounds, but for no other purpose." This section has never been assailed as being invalid, although it has remained upon the statute books for nearly twenty years. Section 12 of article 1 of said chapter 2 authorizes the payment by county boards, to agricultural societies complying with the provisions thereof, of a sum equal to 8 cents for each inhabitant in the county from the county general fund. In State, Custer County Agri. Soc. & Live Stock Exchange, v. Robinson, 35 Neb. 401, it was ruled that this section authorized the appropriation of money for a public purpose, and the expenditure was permissible under the Constitution. That case is not distinguishable in principle from the one at bar.

The adjudication of other courts fully sustains the same doctrine. The city of Philadelphia appropriated $50,000 to meet the official contingent expenses incidental to the Centennial Exposition. It was held that this appropriation was valid. Tutham v. Philadelphia, 11 Phila. 276. An appropriation by a town, made in pursuance of a statute to celebrate the centennial anniversary of its incorporation, has been upheld. Hill v. Easthampton, 140 Mass. 881. Likewise an appropriation of money by a city for the celebration of holidays is held to be for a public purpose. Hubbard v. Taunton, 140 Mass. 467. The legislature of California made an appropriation of $300,000 for the purpose of making a state exhibit at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition. The supreme court of that state, in Daggett v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 53, 14 L. R. A. 474, held the appropriation was for public use, and was constitutional. In Norman v. Kentucky Bd. of Managers of World's Columbian Exposition, 93 Ky. 537, 18 L. R. A. 556, it was decided that an appropriation of $100,000 to enable the state to participate in the World's Fair at Chicago was a valid exercise of legislative power, under a Constitution which provided, "Taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only." The legislature of the state of Tennessee, in 1895, passed an act authorizing the several counties of the state to appropriate money to provide for an exhibit of the resources at the Tennessee Centennial Exposition to be held at Nashville. The county of Shelby, in that state, appropriated $25,000 in pursuance of said act; but the proper county officer refused to issue a warrant against said appropriation, claiming that the act was invalid. On an application for a writ of mandamus, the supreme court, in Shelby County v. Tennessee Centennial Exposition Co. 96 Tenn. 653, 33 L. R. A. 717, overruled the contention, saying: "To our minds it is entirely clear that an exhibition of the resources of Shelby county at the approaching State Centennial Exposition is a county purpose. In view of the fact that the event to be celebrated is one of no less note and importance than the birth of a great state into the American Union, and of the further fact that the exposition is reasonably expected to attract great and favorable attention throughout the country, and be participated in and largely attended by intelligent and enterprising citizens of numerous other states, at least, it is beyond plausible debate that such an exhibition is well calculated to advance the material interests and promote the general welfare of the people of the county making it. It will incite industry, thrift, development, and worthy emulation in different avenues of commerce, agriculture, manufacture, art, and education within the county," 39 L. R. A.

thereby tending to the permanent betterment and prosperity of her whole people. In short it will encourage progress, and progress will insure increased intelligence, wealth, and happiness for her people individually and collectively. Undenially, that which promotes such an object and facilitates such a result in any county is, to that county, a county purpose in the truest sense."

No case in conflict with the foregoing has come under the observation of the writer. Decisions, however, are to be found in the books, holding the appropriation of moneys for celebrations of public events to be invalid; but such decisions turn on the question of statutory authority, rather than on the right of the legislature to confer such power. See Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 103; Tash v. Adams, 10 Cush. 252; New London v. Brainard, 22 Conn. 552. In Hayes v. Douglas County, 92 Wis. 429, 81 L. R. A. 213, it was ruled that a county tax levied for the purpose of defraying the expenses of placing blocks of stone from the county in the Wisconsin State Building at the Columbian World's Fair was unauthorized and void. The ground for this holding does not appear in the report of the case, as the only reference to the subject in the body of the opinion is in the language following: "The Columbian Fair stone tax was altogether unauthorized and void." We presume that the power to impose the tax in that case was not conferred by statute. Upon principle and authority, we are constrained to hold that the bonds were voted for a public purpose, one for which the money of the county may be lawfully devoted.

Attention will now be given to the question whether the proposition to issue these bonds received the requisite number of affirmative votes. Sections 27 to 30, inclusive, art. 1, chap. 18, Comp. Stat., relates generally to the submission of questions to a vote of the electors of the county. Said § 30 declares that "if it appears that two thirds of the votes cast are in favor of the proposition, and the requirements of the law have been fully complied with, the same shall be entered at large by the county board upon the book containing the record of their proceedings, and they shall then have power to levy and collect the special tax in the same manner that the other county taxes are collected." This section has been construed as requiring, to adopt a proposition involving the issuance of bonds, an affirmative vote of two thirds of the electors participating at the election at which the same is submitted. Stale, Mann, v. Anderson, 28 Neb. 517; Stenberg v. State, Keller, 50 Neb. 127. So that, if the provisions of said § 30 apply to the bonds in question, they failed to carry, since they did not receive two thirds of the votes cast at the election, although more than two thirds of those voting on the proposition were in favor of the bond. It is very evident that said § 30 cannot be invoked here, because it is embraced in the statute which provides generally for the submission of questions to a vote of the county, and must give way to any special act upon the same subject. The law under which the bonds in controversy were voted relates specifically to the subject of issuing bonds to enable counties to participate in interstate expositions, and the provision therein as to the vote necessary to carry that class of bonds governs and controls, for the obvious reason that it is a special law in relation to a particular subject. This principle has been recognized by a long line of decisions in this state. McCann v. McLennan, 2 Neb. 286; People, Gers, v. Gosper, 8 Neb. 810; Albertson v. State, 9 Neb. 439; Richardson County v. Miles, 14 Neb. 811; Fenton v. Yule, 27 Neb. 758; State, Seward County, v. Benton, 83 Neb.

828; State, Gage County, v. Benton, 83 Neb. 884; Richard v. Clayton County Comrs. 40 Neb. 51; Merrick v. Kennedy, 46 Neb. 264; Van Horn v. State, Abbott, 46 Neb. 62; State, Farmers' Mut. Ins. Co., v. Moore, 48 Neb. 870.

It follows that these bonds were carried by the requisite vote, and, no valid objection having been urged against their registration, a peremptory writ of mandamus is ordered, as prayed.

Anna FINSETH, Respt.,

CITY & SUBURBAN RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.

(.....Or.....)

1. A street-railway company which, to facilitate its own business, constructs a platform along a street temporarily submerged during a freshet, for the accommodation of its passengers, is required to make such walk reasonably safe, but not to make it "as reasonably safe as possible."
2. A street-railway company which constructs a walk over a street temporarily submerged by a freshet, for the use of passengers in going from one car to another, is not, as matter of law, required to provide a light for such walk at night.

(December 7, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Moore, Ch. J.:

This is an action by Anna Finseth against the City & Suburban Railway Company to recover damages sustained in consequence of an injury received while crossing over a roadway alleged to have been negligently constructed by defendant. The facts are: That in June, 1894, defendant was the owner of and operated an electric street railway in the city of Portland, the line of its road extending across the Willamette river upon Morrison street bridge, the east approach to which, for a distance of about 500 feet, in consequence of an unprecedented rise in the river, was covered with water to the depth of about 4 feet, thereby obstructing travel on electric cars, but, to accommodate its passengers, defendant erected upon the north side of East Morrison street a temporary sidewalk, consisting of two lines of planks each 12 inches wide, laid about 12 inches apart, and resting upon railroad ties placed one upon another at right angles with the planks, in such manner as to form pliers, situated about 8 feet apart, and of sufficient height to be above the water; the whole structure being weighted down and held in place by iron rails. That on the 11th of said month plaintiff purchased from defendant a ticket, and at about 10 o'clock at night entered one of its cars at the west end of Morrison street Bridge, in crossing which she surrendered her ticket, and received from the conductor in lieu thereof a transfer check, which entitled her to ride on another car of the company from the east side of said submerged district to the intersection of East Twenty-First and Clinton streets, and having arrived at the east end of said bridge she alighted from the car, and attempted to pass over the structure in question, which was used by defendant's passengers and the public, but, the night being dark, and the passageway poorly lighted, and having no guard or railing, her foot slipped between the planks, and, falling thereon, she sustained the injury of which she complains. The issues having been joined, a trial was had, resulting in plaintiff's obtaining a judgment for the sum of $500, from which defendant appeals.

Messrs. Dolph, Mallory, & Simon, for appellant:

While carriers of passengers are bound to exercise a high degree of care for the protection of those coming under their care, they are not so bound in respect to the public in general, and when the relation of passenger and carrier ceases, the carrier is only bound to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury, such as is required of any individual.

Upon stepping from defendant's car at the west side of the submerged portion of East Morrison street, plaintiff ceased to be a passenger.

Creamer v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 320, 16 L. R. A. 490; Bigelow v. West End Street R. Co. 161 Mass. 398; 2 Wood, Railway Law, p. 1038; Thomp. Carr. § 9, p. 446; Booth, Street Railways, p. 445.

The bridge was erected on the site of the sidewalk, and was used by the public in general, it being the only means of passage over the flooded portion of the street to and from the Morrison street bridge. There were no restrictions as to its use; all persons passing that way used it; hundreds of people passed over it daily. This general use by the public made it a public highway. No formal acceptance by the city was necessary; it was enough that the public traveled over it.

Messrs. Flegel & Stanislawsky and McGinn, Sears, & Simon, for respondent:

Defendant constructed the walk as an approach or means by which its passengers could get from one of its cars to another, and invited its passengers to use it for that purpose, and it was bound to construct a walk and keep it reasonably safe for that purpose at the different times of day when it was used by the defendant's passengers.

Skottowe v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Or. 430, 16 L. R. A. 598.

Moore, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The important question for consideration is the duty, if any, which the defendant owed to the plaintiff at the time of the accident. The measure of care demanded of a common carrier must always be in proportion to the degree of danger to which passengers are subjected by the means adopted for their transportation or accommodation; and, notwithstanding a person, for some purposes, may be deemed a passenger before he enters or after he leaves a car, the carrier does not owe him, under such circumstances, that degree of care which it is incumbent upon the company to exercise when he is seated within its car, and has surrendered himself to an observance of its rules. The negligent operation of an electric car may cause the death of, or inflict great bodily injury upon, a passenger, and for this reason the law of humanity wisely demands that a carrier while not an insurer, must exercise, in the management of such dangerous agencies, the highest degree of care, in protecting its passengers from harm which could be prevented by reasonable foresight. Moreland v. Boston & P. R. Co. 141 Mass. 31. A street-car company lays its tracks chiefly upon, and operates its cars in, the public streets of a town or city, and, unless prohibited by municipal ordinance may stop at any place along its line to permit passengers to enter its cars or depart therefrom. In the very nature of things, such a carrier can have no stations, for to permit it to erect and maintain them would amount to a needless obstruction of the public highway; and hence, when operating its cars within the limits of a city or town, it must receive its passengers from, and discharge them in, a public street; and, as was said in Creamer v. West End Street R. Co. 156 Mass. 320, 16 L. R. A. 490: "The street is in no sense a passenger station, for the safety of which a street-railway company is responsible. When a passenger steps from a car upon the street, he becomes a traveler upon the highway, and terminates his relations and rights as a passenger; and the railway company is not responsible to him as a carrier for the condition of the street, or for his safe passage from the car to the sidewalk." A street-car company, having no stations, owes no duty to the public or to its passengers to erect or maintain a passageway from its stopping places in the street to the sidewalk; and when it discharges its passengers in the highway its contract has been fully performed, and the relation of carrier and passenger thereupon ceases. Smith v. City R. Co. 29 Or. 539. The tickets it issues do not prescribe at what point on its line the passenger may enter or leave its cars, but a person having obtained a ticket or paid his fare to the conductor could probably commence a journey at any stopping place, and ride in its car to any point within the terminal of its line; but if he leaves the car, for any purpose, without having obtained a transfer check, the contract for transportation would be fully performed by the carrier. If, however, the passenger obtains such evidence of his right to resume the journey, there must be, of necessity, an interruption of the relation of carrier and passenger from the moment he leaves one car until he enters another; but would this interruption relieve the carrier from liability to a person injured while going from one car to another over a passageway erected by it for the accommodation of such persons, and to facilitate its business? The answer to this question must depend upon the duty, if any, which a carrier owes to those persons whom it invites to use such portage, for negligence in all cases must be predicated upon a breach of duty. The defendant was not obliged to construct a passageway across the submerged street, but, having done so, it thereby invited its passengers to travel over the same, and tacitly represented to them that it was reasonably safe for that purpose; and, such being the case, did it owe to them any duty to maintain or light the way because it was laid upon a public street? The walk having been erected to serve a temporary purpose only, we think it cannot be said that, because it had been used by the public for a short time, the municipality thereby adopted and accepted it as a part of its system of highways; for when the water receded the sidewalk constructed by the city would be used, and the passageway so erected by defendant, which theretofore had been used as a part of the highway, must necessarily become a nuisance. If plaintiff, without any fault upon her part, had sustained the injury complained of in the manner indicated, after the water had fallen, there is but little doubt that defendant would have been liable therefor, if, in consequence of its neglect, the passageway became unsafe; for no person has the right to do an act which renders the use of the street hazardous, or less secure than it was left by the municipal authorities. Whoever does so by placing unauthorized obstructions thereon becomes a nuisance, and is liable to any person who, using due care, sustains any special injury therefrom. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1082. But while the freshet continued the walk in question could not be considered a nuisance, or even an obstruction, for it was the only means by which the public was enabled to use the street, and without it travel would have been suspended. Defendant having constructed the way to facilitate its business, and to accommodate persons who might be induced to patronize its cars, owed to such persons at least the duty of keeping it, as long as it might be used for that purpose, in a reasonably safe condition, and having invited plaintiff to pass over the same, it is liable for any neglect in that respect; but it owed no greater duty, and is not chargeable with a higher degree of care and diligence, by being a common carrier, than is expected of a private individual under similar conditions. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Warlick (Ind. Ter.) 35 S. W. 285.

With this understanding of the rule, it becomes necessary to examine that portion of the judge's charge to which defendant excepts. The jury were instructed as follows: "(1) If the defendant in this case undertook to transport passengers for hire over its road from the west side to points on the east side of the Willamette river, in this city, and for that purpose undertook to provide and construct a walk or elevated passageway over that part of East Morrison street where its tracks and the street where obstructed by the flood, so that such passengers could use the same for the purpose of passing from one car of the defendant to another over such obstruction, it was its duty to construct such walk or passageway in a manner as reasonably safe as possible, taking into consideration the condition of this part of the flooded district, and to keep it in such reasonably safe condition as long as it was under its control, and continued to be used for passage of passengers from one car of the defendant to another; and if you believe from the testimony that the defendant undertook to and did construct this walk for such purpose, but failed and neglected to construct it in a reasonably safe condition, taking all the circumstances into consideration, or failed and neglected to keep it in such reasonably safe condition during the time it was being used for defendant's passengers, and under its control, and that, by reason of such failure and negligence and unsafe condition of such walk, the plaintiff while passing over said walk from a car of the defendant on the west, in which she had been riding as a passenger, to a car on the east of such walk, upon which she was to continue her passage to her place of destination, fell, and was injured thereby, without any fault or negligence on her part, then it is your duty to find in favor of the plaintiff." It will be observed that the jury were told that it was incumbent upon defendant to construct the passageway in a manner as reasonably safe as possible, etc. This, in our judgment, carries the liability too far. Defendant was required to make the walk reasonably safe, it must be admitted; but when this degree of care is so qualified as to render the walk as reasonably safe as possible, it thrusts upon a carrier a duty never hitherto demanded, and, if it were to prevail, would tend to render a carrier liable in all cases, for, after an accident occurs, and the cause of it is ascertained, it would not be difficult to procure witnesses to say that, in their opinion, it was possible to have guarded against its occurrence and thus have prevented the injury.

The court also gave the following instruction: "(3) In this case, if the walk was so constructed that it would be dangerous for defendant's passengers to use it in passing over the same from one car of the defendant to another in the darkness, or during the night-time without a light, then it was the duty of the defendant to have provided a light during such darkness; and if it failed and neglected to do this, and for this reason the plaintiff, while attempting to cross over said walk as such passenger fell and was injured thereby without any negligence or fault on her part, then your verdict should be in her favor." If the walk was so constructed that it was dangerous for defendant's passengers to use the same after night it could doubtless have rendered the way safe by other means than by lighting it. In Vicksburg & M. R. Co. v. Howe, 52 Miss. 202, the track being obstructed by a wrecked freight train, a passenger, on a dark and rainy night, was obliged to walk around the obstruction to another train, and in doing so fell from some planks laid over a ditch, and sustained the injury complained of. There was no light there nor was any person stationed at that point to warn the passengers of danger, and it was held that the failure to place a light at the crossing of the ditch, or to give any warning of the danger, or to take some means to guard passengers against injury from the extra hazard to which they were exposed in crossing, was such negligence as rendered the company liable for any injury sustained by passengers in crossing. In that case the crossing was temporary, and other means than a light were considered adequate protection against the danger incident to the transfer. The defendant having undertaken to provide a passageway for the convenience of its passengers and those intending to patronize its cars, it was required to select substantial materials, and construct the way with a view to safety, considering the nature of the temporary use for which it was designed; and, so long as defendant continued to use the passageway to facilitate its business, it was in duty bound to maintain it in like condition, and for any neglect in this respect it would be liable to a person sustaining injury thereby whom it invited to pass over the same. The passenger, however, is charged with notice of the temporary character of the structure, in view of which necessity compels him to use common prudence in its use, falling in which it would constitute such contributory negligence as would preclude a recovery. It was the duty of the defendant to render the passageway reasonably safe for the accommodation of its passengers, but what constitutes due and reasonable care cannot ordinarily be defined as a matter of law, but it must depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. Gaynor v. Old Colony & N. R. Co. 100 Mass. 208, 97 Am. Dec. 96. It is for the jury to say, from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, whether the passageway was reasonably safe, in view of the temporary purpose it was designed to serve, and whether the carrier had supplied such means for its use after night as an ordinarily prudent person would have furnished to render it reasonably safe in the darkness under like conditions.

In the case at bar we think the means indicated by the court as a protection against the danger are too limited, and that it was for the jury, and not the court, to say what means should have been adopted for that purpose.

These instructions being erroneous, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

The general principles of the law relating to the power of municipal corporations to define, prevent, and abate nuisances are treated of in note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 36 L. R. A. 593.

The question of the power of municipalities over nuisances affecting buildings and other structures will be found in note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) 38 L. R. A. 161.

The subject of municipal power over nuisances affecting highways and water comprises the note to the cases of Hagerstown v. Witmer (Md.) — L. R. A. —, and State v. Clarke (Conn.) — L. R. A. —.

The note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) 38 L. R. A. 640, forms the subject of the power of such authorities over nuisances affecting safety, health, and personal comfort arising from a particular trade or business.

The question of prescription in cases of nuisances will form the subject of a later note, as will also the question of the power of municipal authorities to ask relief in equity.

The question of the power of such authorities over nuisances relating to public safety and health in general will be found in note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

Nuisances arising from smoke and smoking will be found treated of in note to St. Louis v. Heltzberg Pkg. & Provision Co. (Mo.) post, 551, wherein the question of municipal power over them as public nuisances is discussed.

government and the good order of the city, and for the suppression of vice and intemperance and the prevention of crime, and to prevent and restrain the keeping of houses of ill fame and other disorderly places, but such ordinances have not expressly declared the keeping of such places to be nuisances, and they have been dealt with under the general provisions contained in the charters for public welfare, peace, and good order of the citizens, and so, in many cases, they have been expressly dealt with by state statute; but inasmuch as the question of municipal control over them as nuisances has not arisen in this class of cases, they are not treated of in the present note, which is exclusively confined to the consideration of such places and the question of municipal control over them as nuisances.

I. Nuisances affecting public morals and decency.

a. In general.

Generally it may be stated that the power of a municipality to pass a by-law or an ordinance which establishes a rule interfering with the rights of individuals or the public must emanate from the creating body, and clear authority must be found for it in the legislative enactment out of which the corporation exercises its functions of government. State, Breninger, v. Belvidere, 44 N. J. L. 350, 351. In which case an ordinance forbidding the keeping of a billiard table for hire was held unconstitutional as not being within the powers conferred by the charter, although it was not shown to have been specifically declared a nuisance, the charter giving the council power to make and enforce ordinances and by-laws suppressing gambling houses, and such other by-laws and ordinances for the peace and good order of the town as are deemed expedient, so long as not repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the state or of the United States.

Any place of public resort in which illegal practices are habitually carried on is a public nuisance. McClellan v. State, 49 N. J. L. 471, 472; State v. Williams, 30 N. J. L. 102.

The keeping of a disorderly house is a nuisance at common law. State v. Bailey, 21 N. H. 343; Rex v. Higginson, 2 Burr. 1232.

6. Whether the defendants were culpable vel non is not a question of itself reviewable on appeal.

(December 13, 1897.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Recorder's Court of the City of New

In Rathbone's Case, 1 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 26, the keeping of a disorderly house was looked upon as a nuisance.

In Willis v. Warren, 1 Hilt. 590, the public exhibition of obscene pictures was regarded as a common nuisance, and they were ordered to be destroyed upon publication being proved by the public authorities.

In People v. Baldwin, 1 Wheel. Crim. Cas. 279, it was held that a theater was a disorderly house on account of the manner in which it was conducted by indecent exposures.

Any place of public resort, whether an inn, a dwelling house, a storehouse, or any other building or garden, is a public nuisance in which illegal practices are habitually carried on, or when it becomes an habitual resort for thieves, drunkards, prostitutes, or other idle, vicious, and disorderly persons who may gather together there for the purpose of gratifying their own depraved appetites, or to make it a rendezvous where plans may be concocted for depredation upon society and disturbing either its peace or its rights of property. State v. Williams, 30 N. J. L. 102, 103.

Such collections of persons can have no other effect than to debauch and deprave the public morals, although they may be quiet and orderly places so far as mere noise and confusion are concerned; and, though the most scrupulous cleanliness may be observed, and they may be magnificent in ornament and luxurious in provisions for mere sensual gratification, they are indelible nuisances at common law because they are nocturni, nuisances,—that is, injurious to the public health, public quiet, and public morals. State v. Williams, 30 N. J. L. 102, 104.

It is both the right and duty of municipal corporations to make and enforce regulations for the observance of public decency, as well as for the preservation of good order, peace, and health, and such powers are necessarily incident to the objects of their being, and are involved in the very idea of police regulations. Braddy v. Milledgeville, 74 Ga. 516, 519, 58 Am. Rep. 443, in which case a city ordinance against street walking was upheld, such practice being inhibited by the common law as tending to lewdness, and therefore a nuisance.

An ordinance making it unlawful for any person to commit any indecent, immodest, lewd, and filthy act, or utter any lewd, lascivious, or filthy words, or use any scandalous, obscene, indecent, or profane language in the presence of any other person or persons, or the making of any immodest, obscene, or insulting motions or gestures to or about any other person publicly in a hamlet, and providing for the punishment thereof, passed under § 1653, Ohio Rev. Stat., subd. 2, 3, was upheld in Billington v. Hoverman, 7 Ohio Dec. 358, in which case the defendant was guilty of lewd and lascivious behavior in the streets.

In Mantle v. Jordan [1897] 1 Q. B. 243, 66 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 224, 75 L. T. N. S. 552, defendant was charged with violating a by-law of the county council made pursuant to the English local government act of 1888, § 16, which enacted that no person should, in any house, building, garden, land, or other place, abutting on, or near to, a street or public place, make use of any violent, abusive, profane, indecent, or obscene language, gesture, or conduct, to the annoyance of any person in such street or public place. The court held that such by-law was Orleans imposing a penalty for the violation of a city ordinance against cruelty to animals. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George J. Untereiner, for appellants:

Act 19 of 1888 contains more than one object, made for "good rule and government," and "for prevention and suppression of nuisances" within the meaning of § 23 of the English municipal corporations act of 1882, and therefore was valid under § 16 of the above act of 1888, and that therefore the defendant ought to have been convicted.

Under the charter and ordinances of the city of Augusta the mayor of that city has power summarily to punish persons of bad character found within the city limits, and such authority is the exercise of police power to prevent the disturbing of the public peace and the maintenance of a nuisance and the obstruction of the public highways. Shafer v. Mumma, 17 Md. 331, 336, 79 Am. Dec. 656.

So, under a charter giving power to prevent and remove nuisances, the city has power to declare the showing or exhibiting certain horses in a town to be a nuisance, and to inflict a penalty for the violation of such ordinance. Nolin v. Franklin, 4 Yerg. 163.

In Grand Rapids v. Williams (Mich.) 36 L. R. A. 137, an ordinance relative to disorderly persons, providing that all persons who should be engaged in any illegal or improper diversion, or should use any insulting, indecent, or immoral language, or should be guilty of any indecent, insulting, or immoral conduct or behavior in any public street or elsewhere in the city, should be deemed a disorderly person, was applied to one in the habit of peering into the windows of an occupied lighted residence at the hours of night when the inmates were retiring, such a party being guilty of indecent or insulting conduct or behavior within the meaning of such ordinance.

And a city ordinance which provides, inter alia, that the keeping or controlling of any house or building within the corporate limits of the city, where loud or unusual noises are permitted, or where persons are permitted to congregate and engage in the use of profane or vulgar language to the disturbance of others, is a common nuisance, is valid under § 456 of the Iowa Code. Centerville v. Miller, 57 Iowa, 56 and 225.

A pantomime exhibiting a bridal couple in their chamber on the night of the marriage, followed by the departure of the groom, in whose absence the bride undresses, being careful, however, not to expose much of her person, and retires to bed, after which the groom returns and knocks at the door, and, on being bidden to enter, the curtain falls,—is a public nuisance, and within the statute against offenses against common decency. People v. Doris, 14 App. Div. 117.

b. House of ill fame, etc.

Generally it may be stated that houses of ill fame are nuisances at common law, and punishable thereby, as well as under the statutes of the different states relating thereto, and therefore there is no doubt but that they are proper subjects of municipal control under the general police power vested in municipal corporations for the protection of the public morals, decency, peace, and good order, and the general welfare of the inhabitants. In many cases, however, the city authorities, in passing ordinances relating thereto, have not expressly declared them to be public nuisances neither have they ordered their abatement or suppression specifically as such; and as this note is strictly confined to the question of municipal control over them as nuisances, cases not so dealing with them will not be found discussed herein.

and is therefore violative of art. 29 of the Constitution of Louisiana.

State v. Baum, 33 La. Ann. 981; Moore v. Police Jury, 32 La. Ann. 1013.

Act 19 of 1888, which pretends to authorize the passage of ordinance 3384, is a permissive statute, and violative of art. 235 of the Constitution of Louisiana, because it permits a corporation to conduct its business in such a manner as to infringe the equal rights of all citizens of this state.

State v. Kuntz, 47 La. Ann. 107; State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496; State v. Dulaney, 43 La. Ann. 500; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S.

In Childress v. Nashville, 3 Sneed, 347, 357, it is said that a bawdy house is a common nuisance because it not only tends to corrupt the morals of an open profession of prostitution, but it likewise endangers the public peace and good order by drawing together profligate and disorderly persons, and therefore an ordinance forbidding the keeping, within the corporate limits, of such houses, or the wilfully permitting any such house to be kept, was a valid exercise of the power given to the corporations under the charter to regulate or prohibit and suppress all such houses, and also under the general power of such corporations relating to police regulations.

A house of ill fame is a constant menace to the public peace and good order of the community in which it exists, and is a nuisance and its keeping a misdemeanor at common law, and therefore its suppression and punishment are proper subjects of police regulations. Rogers v. People, 9 Colo. 450, 50 Am. Rep. 143, 147.

It would be contrary to the act to assert that houses of ill fame in the midst of a city are not dangerous and revolting nuisances which may be suppressed by the local authorities. People v. Hanrahan, 75 Mich. 621, 4 L. R. A. 751.

A city has power, under the provisions of its charter which gave it power to abate nuisances and to pass ordinances relating thereto, to pass a by-law making a bawdy house a public nuisance, and punishing the owner, where the same is used with his knowledge as a house of ill fame, or where the same is, to his knowledge, reputed to be such, by fine, such places being nuisances at common law. McAlister v. Clark, 33 Conn. 91.

In Owensboro v. Simms, 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1898, a city ordinance suppressing houses of ill fame was upheld, the incorporating act conferring upon the authorities full power, not only for the general health, comfort, and convenience of the inhabitants, but also for the morals and safety of the public.

An ordinance to prevent nuisances, and to provide for the security of public decency, was upheld in Municipality No. 1 v. Wilson, 5 La. Ann. 747, wherein the defendant was charged, and condemned to pay, a fine for keeping a disorderly house contrary to the provisions of such ordinance.

An ordinance making it illegal, and prohibiting persons from entering houses of ill fame, or being found there, was upheld under § 456 of the Iowa Code, under which the city was clothed with authority to repress and restrain disorderly houses, although the act was not declared to be a nuisance. State v. Botkin, 71 Iowa, 87, 60 Am. Rep. 780.

And in the case of Centerville v. Miller, 57 Iowa, 225, the court upheld a city ordinance providing for the punishment by fine of the keeper of a disorderly house, the same being within the powers conferred upon such corporations under the general corporation law of the state.

And under the general powers given to such corporations, a city ordinance for the suppression and prohibition of the keeping of houses of ill fame will be upheld, the maintenance of sanitary regulations and good order being the main inducement for the incorporation of towns and cities, such offenses directly affecting the welfare of the city, even though such act be of a criminal nature under the general laws of the state. Wong v. Astoria, 13 Or. 538, 542.

So, a city ordinance passed for the prevention of houses of ill fame falls within the powers conferred upon the city authorities by their charter, under which they have power to make by-laws, rules, and regulations for preserving the peace, order, and good government of the city. State, Burton, v. Williams, 118 U. S. 288, 290.

And under a state statute giving power to restrain, prohibit, and suppress houses of ill fame, and other like places, and all kinds of public indecencies, city authorities have power to prohibit by ordinance persons from becoming inmates of such places. Perry v. State, 37 Neb. 623.

Section 4914 of the Tennessee Code declares that houses of ill fame kept for the purpose of prostitution and lewdness, gambling houses, or houses where drunkenness, quarreling, fighting, or breaches of the peace are carried on, or permitted to the disturbance of others, are nuisances, and, under § 4915, upon conviction the court may order the nuisance to be abated by the sheriff at the expense of the defendant.

Again, where the power to suppress disorderly houses and houses of ill fame is expressly granted by statute, it carries with it by a necessary implication the right and power to adopt all such lawful means or methods as may be found necessary to effect the end in view, such house being a common nuisance, as not only tending to corrupt the public morals, but endangering the public peace and the good order. Childress v. Nashville, 3 Sneed, 347, 356.

So, an ordinance prohibiting the letting of property for such purposes is declared valid upon the same grounds. Childress v. Nashville, 3 Sneed, 347, 356.

And a city ordinance declaring houses of ill fame conducted in an indecent manner to be nuisances, and providing for the abatement of the same by compelling the party to abandon the premises, is valid, such ordinance being for the good order of the community. Shreveport v. Roos, 35 La. Ann. 1010.

In Chariton v. Barber, 54 Iowa, 860, 37 Am. Rep. 209, § 452 of the Iowa Code, empowering municipal corporations to pass ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the state, for carrying into effect, or discharging, the powers and duties conferred by that chapter, and such as should be deemed necessary and proper to provide for the safety, preserve the health, promote the prosperity, improve the morals, order, comfort, and convenience of such corporation and the inhabitants thereof, and to enforce the same by fine or imprisonment, it was held that the city had no authority to pass an ordinance making the keeping a house of ill fame a misdemeanor, and punishing the same with fine or imprisonment; neither was such power conferred by § 456 of the Code, which gives the city power to suppress such houses and to authorize the destruction of all instruments or devices used and found in nine or ten pin alleys and billiard tables.

In this case, however, the above sections of the Code did not specifically give the city power to suppress or abate nuisances, neither were such resorts declared nuisances thereby.

In the subsequent case, however, of Centerville v. Miller, 57 Iowa, 56, it was held that § 456 of the Iowa Code, giving the city power to prevent riots, noise, disturbance, or disorderly assemblages, to suppress and restrain disorderly houses, houses 356, 30 L. ed. 220, and authorities therein cited; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636.

Act 19 of 1888 is violative of art. 1 of the Constitution, because it does not protect liberty or property, but is oppressive and a usurpation of power.

of ill fame, billiard tables, nine or ten pin alleys or tables and bowling alleys, and to authorize the destruction of all instruments and devices used for the purpose of gaming, authorized the city to declare by ordinance the keeping or controlling of any house or building within the corporate limits, where lewd or unusual noises were permitted, or where persons were permitted to congregate and use profane or vulgar language to the disturbance of others, to be a common nuisance.

Under a power given to the city authorities "to abate or prevent nuisances," or to pass "such ordinances by laws, rules, and regulations for the better government of the city as they deem necessary," such authorities having no power to enact a law declaring that, not only suffering or allowing prostitution, but permitting single acts in a house or room, should constitute the owner or occupant of the house or room the keeper of a house of ill fame, neither have they a right to define that to be a house of ill fame which is not so. State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 964.

And even if the power to suppress houses of ill fame is given to municipal authorities in express terms, such authorities cannot even then usurp the authority to enact that persons not guilty of the nuisance under the established principles of law shall be deemed guilty of keeping such houses. State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 966.

Yet, under a general power to suppress nuisances, such as houses of ill fame, an ordinance which forbids owners from renting their houses to others for such purposes, or with a knowledge that they are to be so used, is valid, but such general rule does not empower a city to declare that a given house is kept for such purposes, or to define and declare what is a house of ill fame. State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 966.

But the power to prevent nuisances does not directly or by implication carry with it the authority to hold the owner of a building, who never himself visits it, responsible for the nuisance of keeping a house of ill fame, committed by his tenant without his knowledge or consent; and such a by-law is not only unauthorized, but unreasonable. State v. Webber, 107 N. C. 962, 966.

So, where under an act conferring upon the common council of a city full power and authority to make all such by-laws and ordinances as they deem expedient for preventing and suppressing disorderly houses and houses of ill fame, the common council adopt an ordinance directing that any person keeping such a house shall, on conviction, be punished by fine and imprisonment; and further, that any such house or building so occupied shall be deemed a common nuisance which the common council shall abate by ordering such house or building to be pulled down and removed at the expense of the owner, proprietor, or occupant thereof at the discretion of such council,—such ordinance, in so far as it relates to the pulling down and destruction of such house, is not within the provisions of the charter, the power of the city being limited to the suppression of the nuisance itself, the law of necessity alone justifying the common council in resorting to the destruction of the property in order to abate the nuisance. Welch v. Stowell, 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 332.

And under the provisions of a city charter providing for the removal and abatement of nuisances, carrying out and enforcing sanitary regu-

Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496; State v. Dulaney, 43 La. Ann. 500; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 11, 27 L. ed. 639; State, Walker v. Judge of Session "A," 39 La. Ann. 139; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, p. 4; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, and citations in the above cases.

Because they are not sanitary or police regulations for the apprehension of disorderly persons, vagrants, or prostitutes and their associates, and for the regulation of the liquor traffic, and giving the city council jurisdiction 2 miles beyond the city limits, an ordinance providing that any person visiting a house of ill fame within the city or within 1 mile thereof shall be guilty of a violation of the provisions of such act, exceeds the powers given to the common council of the city by the provisions of the charter, such power being conferred upon the council with respect to the visiting of such houses outside of the city limits. Robb v. Indianapolis, 38 Ind. 49, 52.

c. Gambling.

In Hill v. Pierson, 45 Neb. 503, it was held that a place kept for gambling purposes was a public nuisance.

So, an ordinance passed for the suppression of gaming houses is valid, it being highly proper that this aggravated nuisance should be subject to the control of and restraints imposed by the ordinances of these local governments peculiarly afflicted by the evil. Greenwood v. State, 6 Baxt. 507, 574, 32 Am. Rep. 539.

Under an amended charter giving the common council power to make all such laws as they conceive requisite for the regulation of the morals and police of the town, and for the prevention and removal of nuisances, the observance of such laws to be enforced by penalties and forfeitures to be levied upon the goods and chattels of the offender, such council have power to prohibit the keeping of a faro table. McLaughlin v. Stephens, 2 Cranch, C. C. 145.

In Burnett v. Berry [1896] 1 Q. B. 641, under § 23 of the English municipal corporations act of 1882, which empowers the city council of a borough to make by-laws "for the good rule and government of the borough, and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable by virtue of any act in force throughout the borough," a by-law prohibiting any person from frequenting and using any street or any other public place within the borough for the purpose of bookmaking or betting is valid.

In State v. Populus, 49 La. Ann. 1006, an ordinance relating to the keeping of lotteries by directing a search warrant to issue against the persons continuing or keeping the same was upheld as being within the power delegated to municipalities by the Louisiana Statutes of 1894, which declared the same to be public nuisances, and was not affected by the Laws of 1896, act No. 45, the brevity of delegated power contained in the latter act being amplified sufficiently to sustain the ordinance by prior legislation relating to lotteries.

But a statute giving the police power to seize and destroy gaming tables without notice to the owner or a judicial investigation or determination of the case is not constitutional, even though it is contended that such table constituted a nuisance at common law, and therefore may be destroyed without notice. Lowry v. Rainwater, 70 Mo. 152, 35 Am. Rep. 420.

Under § 14 of the Iowa Laws of 1856, chap. 15, providing the city council with authority to make ordinances to secure the inhabitants against fire, against violations of law and the public peace, to suppress riots, gambling, and drunkenness, indecent and disorderly conduct, to punish lewd behavlations, and is therefore ultra vires null and void, and of no legal effect.

People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 889; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 11, 27 L. ed. 839; Mugler v. Kansas, 128 U. S. 661, 31 L. ed. 210; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79, and authorities there cited.

for in public places, to suppress disorderly houses, and generally to provide for the safety, prosperity, and good order of the city,—the city has no power to pass an ordinance declaring the setting up and keeping of any gambling device a misdemeanor, and punishing the same as such. Mount Pleasant v. Breeze, 11 Iowa, 399.

d. Bowling alleys.

A bowling alley is not of itself a nuisance, since it may either remain unused, or it may be used only as a place of innocent amusement; its injurious character depends upon the improper use alone. But the legislature may determine that an instrument which tends to facilitate vicious practices is of itself an evil which ought to be prohibited. State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279.

An ordinance which prohibits noisy amusements, and prevents immorality, will be upheld. Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 702.

If the town authorities adopt a statute making bowling alleys a nuisance such statute has a binding effect upon such town, and therefore such alleys, when situated within a certain distance from a dwelling house, become a nuisance, within the meaning of such statute, which may be abated by the public authorities. State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279.

So, if, by the general terms of a village charter, the trustees are authorized to make by-laws relative to slaughterhouses and nuisances generally, and, pursuant to such authority, they pass a by-law declaring the keeping of a ten-pin alley for gain to be a nuisance, such ordinance is valid, even though the owner thereof has printed rules posted therein relative to the game, and forbidding, abating, and prohibiting the use of the alley by minors or boys, such an enterprise having no useful end. Tanner v. Albion, 5 Hill, 121, 40 Am. Dec. 387.

e. Drunkenness.

In Missouri drunkenness is not, per se, the subject of legislative prohibition. St. Joseph v. Harris, 50 Mo. App. 122, 127.

Drunkenness cannot be made the subject of municipal regulation, except where its existence in the individual is at a place, or under circumstances or conditions, when it annoys or disturbs others; and therefore any sweeping regulation interdicting under penalty drunkenness generally, or any case other than those specified in the exception above mentioned, would be an invasion of the "inalienable rights of the citizen." St. Joseph v. Harris, 50 Mo. App. 122, 127. To the same effect, St. Louis v. Fitz, 53 Mo. 532.

In Grand Rapids v. Newton (Mich.) 35 L. R. A. 223, an ordinance which prohibited "drunkards, intoxicated persons, tipplers, gamblers, persons having the reputation or name of being prostitutes, or other disorderly persons, from congregating, assembling, visiting, or remaining," and forbidding the keeper of any tavern or house, or any saloon, cellar, shop, office, or other residence or place of business, to allow such act, was held unreasonable and beyond the power of the council to enact, as it was not limited in its application to places of business which required police regulation, nor to assemblages of immoral persons, and did not make knowledge of the reputation of the person so visiting such place an ingredient of the offense. In this case, however, the act was not declared a nuisance. 39 L. R. A.

Because they violate art. 6 of the Constitution of this state, in this, that they deprive persons of liberty and property without due process of law.

Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L. R. A. 79; Frorer v. People, 141 Ill. 171, 16 L. R. A. 492; State v. Loomis, 115 Mo. 307, 21 L. R. A. 789;

II. Nuisances affecting public peace and good order.

a. In general.

Under a city charter which gives the common council power and authority "to define and prevent disorderly conduct, to prevent all disorderly assemblages, all disturbing noise, all drunkenness in public places, and to punish vagrants, beggars, and disorderly persons as defined by law," the common council have power to define what disorderly conduct is, and also who shall be considered disorderly persons. People v. Miller, 38 Hun, 32.

A house of ill fame, or a disorderly house, is a nuisance affecting the public peace and good order of the community, and as such may be abated by such lawful means or methods as may be necessary to accomplish the end in view. Childress v. Nashville, 8 Sneed, 347, 356.

Under the police power persons disturbing the public peace, persons guilty of a nuisance, or obstructing the public highways, and like offenses, may be summarily arrested and fined, without any infraction of that part of the Constitution which apportions the administration of the judicial power strictly as such. Shafer v. Mumma, 17 Md. 381, 386, 79 Am. Dec. 656.

The English statutes, 16 Vict. chap. 35, which provides for the most stringent provisions respecting licensing, inter alia, of runners and other persons soliciting visitors to resort to taverns or public places and acting as guides to the objects of curiosity in the vicinity thereof, and also gives power to a municipal council of the township to make by-laws to prohibit the same without a license, was held not to authorize the passing of a by-law to prevent a nuisance which was not in itself unlawful, the court stating that the absolute prohibition of any particular occupation not in itself unlawful, and only a nuisance from its abuse, could not be held to come fairly within the general power to make by-laws for the peace, welfare, and good government of a town,—especially when authority was given over particular matters by the same statutes, and some in reference to matters of so nearly a similar character as almost to warrant the application of the maxim Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. Davis v. Clifton, 8 U. C. C. P. 238.

An ordinance prohibiting the utterance of profane language, words, or epithets in the hearing of two or more persons was upheld in Ex parte Delaney, 48 Cal. 478, as being within the authority conferred upon the municipality by the 3d subdivision of §1 of Cal. Stat. 1868, p. 540, which gave power to prohibit and suppress or exclude from certain limits houses of ill fame, prostitution, and gambling, and to prohibit and suppress or exclude from certain limits, or regulate, all occupations, houses, places, pastimes, amusements, exhibitions, and practices which were against good morals, contrary to public order and decency, or dangerous to the public safety. In this case, however, the act was not specifically declared a nuisance.

Public picnics and open-air dances within the limits of the village cannot be declared nuisances by a village ordinance, such not being nuisances in themselves. Des Plaines v. Poyer, 123 Ill. 348, affirming 22 Ill. App. 674.

And a city ordinance which provides that the working of convicts upon the streets of the city is a nuisance, inasmuch as it is calculated to produce riots, endanger the lives of the inhabitants,

Because they are in violation of the law of the land, are without public utility, and they unwarrantably restrict and interfere with defendant in the use and enjoyment of his capital, and the use of his lawful licensed business. See authorities cited above.

Because the state, not having the authority to pass the act in question, could not delegate and disturb the peace and good order of the city, is invalid in so far as it declares such act to be a nuisance. Ward v. Little Rock, 41 Ark. 526, 48 Am. Rep. 46, 47.

b. Intoxicating liquors.

In many cases ordinances restraining or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within the town or city limits have been held valid as passed for the preservation of good order, decorum, and decency within the city limits, and for the public welfare; but as these cases do not pass upon the question of the maintenance of such places, or the restriction or prohibition of them as nuisances, they are omitted from the present note, which is limited to the consideration of intoxicating liquors and their abatement as nuisances by the municipal authorities. So, in many cases the subject has been governed by state statutes, and though such statutes may declare the offense a nuisance, yet, inasmuch as the question of municipal control over such nuisances has not arisen in these cases, which have been prosecutions at the instance of the state for violation of the state laws, they are purposely omitted from the present discussion.

The legislature, in the exercise of its power to regulate the police of the state, may prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the state, or in specified localities, and so may cities and towns by their by-laws made pursuant to their charters, such power being part of the great fundamental principles that enter into and compel the necessity of government for the protection of the people against crime, immorality, vice, and even nuisances. Dingman v. People, 51 Ill. 277, 280.

A state has power to declare that any place kept and maintained for the illegal manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors shall be deemed a common nuisance, and be abated, and at the same time to provide for the indictment and trial of the offender. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 306.

So, a city may, under its charter, declare the sale of intoxicating liquors a nuisance. Block v. Jacksonville, 38 Ill. 301, 303; Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, 60 Am. Dec. 773; Byers v. Olney, 16 Ill. 35; Jacksonville v. Holland, 19 Ill. 271; Pekin v. Smelzel, 21 Ill. 464, 74 Am. Dec. 105; Couterville v. Gillen, 72 Ill. 599, 601; Bennett v. People, 80 Ill. 394.

It is competent for the legislature to declare any practice deemed injurious to the public a nuisance, and to punish it accordingly; and whether the law is politic, or expedient, or necessary, is not a question with which the courts have anything to do, such question being between the people and those to whom they delegate the temporary power of making laws; and therefore a law which makes the selling of intoxicating liquors a nuisance is within these principles. Bepley v. State, 4 Ind. 265, 68 Am. Dec. 628; McLaughlin v. State, 45 Ind. 338, 341.

It is competent for the legislature, as a means of carrying into effect a law to prohibit the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors, to declare the keeping of such liquors for the purposes of sale in any place within any city or town unlawful, and to declare the liquor thus kept liable to seizure and forfeiture as, quasi, a nuisance, under a proper and well-guarded system of regulation. Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1, 23, 61 Am. Dec. 381.

prohibiting the sale of spirituous and other intoxicating liquors, the court, in East St. Louis v. Wehrung, 50 Ill. 23, 31, stated that in creating municipal corporations it was designed to aid the government in the preservation of good order, and to protect more effectually persons in the particular community from injuries and annoyances that could not be so readily guarded against by the general laws of the state; and that in conferring the power upon the corporate body it was with the intention that it should be exercised by the body created and in the mode prescribed, and any departure from such authority, or any attempt by the body to transfer its powers to others, was unwarranted. In that case, however, it did not appear that the ordinance specifically declared intoxicating liquors to be a nuisance.

An ordinance declaring the sale of liquors in the town to be a nuisance, and imposing a fine, will be upheld as valid, upon the ground that, although liquors are property and their sale is as much secured as that of any other property, yet the sale for use as a common beverage and tipping is hurtful and injurious to the public morals, good order, and well being of the society. Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, 60 Am. Dec. 773; Byers v. Olney, 16 Ill. 35.

In Jacksonville v. Holland, 19 Ill. 271, the court upheld an ordinance of the town declaring groceries for the sale of intoxicating drinks nuisances.

In an action to recover the penalty incurred for the violation of an ordinance declaring the sale of spirituous liquors a nuisance, it was held that the same was in the nature of a tort, in which one or more of the attending parties might be sued, for the reason that torts were joint and several, and so, of those who are active in maintaining a nuisance, one or more are liable to the penalty. Jacksonville v. Holland, 19 Ill. 271.

So, in Gardner v. People, 20 Ill. 490, the ordinance declared spirituous and other intoxicating liquors a nuisance, and provided a penalty, but the question in that case turned upon the point as to whether or not the authority given to the town to pass ordinances in relation to such liquors, and declaring the same nuisances, had the effect of repealing the general law of the state, the court holding that it did not.

In Harbaugh v. Monmouth, 74 Ill. 367, 369, the court looked upon the decision in the prior case of Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, which had been followed and affirmed in numerous other decisions, as fully settling the law upon the subject that under a charter giving the city power to make regulations to insure the general health of the inhabitants, and to declare what should be a nuisance, and to prevent and remove the same, and to license, tax, restrain, prohibit, and suppress tipping houses and other disorderly houses, a city had power to declare the sale of intoxicating liquors to be a nuisance.

In Dennehy v. Chicago, 120 Ill. 631, 636, it is said that police regulations prohibiting the sale of liquors are sustained upon the ground that they are established for the prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime, and for the abatement of nuisances.

So, the validity of an ordinance relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors was upheld in Pekin v. Smelzel, 21 Ill. 464, 469, 74 Am. Dec. 105, but the ordinance did not declare it to be a nuisance alto the city of New Orleans any power and authority to pass an ordinance which in itself could not make a misdemeanor.

It is manifest from a perusal of the ordinance and laws on which the affidavit is based, that the legislature and city council never intended that its provisions should apply to cases such as the one at bar.

though the court approved of the decision in the prior case of Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 589, 60 Am. Dec. 773.

In State, Vance, v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182, 186, wherein the state statute declared that saloons were public nuisances and provided for their abatement, the court stated that every place where a public statute is openly, publicly, repeatedly, continuously, persistently, and intentionally violated is a public nuisance.

Under an act incorporating a town and giving the authorities power to make laws "to restrain and prohibit every species of gambling, drunkenness, etc., and to grant licenses to the retailers of spirits and liquors, and to regulate and restrain them when deemed a nuisance, etc., and, in general, to pass such laws not contrary to the Constitution of the state, and the laws thereof, which the corporation shall deem expedient and necessary, it is enough if the retailing of spirits is deemed a nuisance, and that the corporate powers are to determine whether retailing is a nuisance, so as to warrant the exercise of the extraordinary and high power of restraining it. Marion v. Chandler, 6 Ala. 899, 902.

And such act confers upon the corporation the power of prohibiting the retailing of spirits within its limits without first paying a license. Marion v. Chandler, 6 Ala. 899, 902.

Ordinances passed by the public authorities pursuant to the power given them under the act of incorporation and state laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors are regarded as police regulations established by the legislature for the suppression and prevention of intemperance, pauperism, and crime, and for the abatement of nuisances; and license fees recovered therefor are not regarded as an exercise of the taxing power, as pursuits which are pernicious or detrimental to public morals may be prohibited altogether, or licensed for a compensation to the public. State, Troll, v. Hudson, 78 Mo. 302, 304.

So, an ordinance which declares the sale of intoxicating liquors to be a nuisance, and imposes a fine for a violation thereof, will be upheld as valid. Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, 60 Am. Dec. 773.

In the above case the general law under which the town was incorporated empowered it to establish and execute such ordinances in writing, not inconsistent with the laws or the Constitution of the state, as it should deem necessary to prevent and remove nuisances; and a later act further empowered it to declare what should be considered as nuisances within the limits of the corporation, and to provide for the abatement and removal thereof; and both acts were re-enacted in a later state statute. The court stated that the objection that the ordinance was an invasion and infringement of private rights and private property was fully answered by the maxim as applicable in that class of police powers, Sic utere tuo, ut alienum non ledas. Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, 60 Am. Dec. 773.

In Byers v. Olney, 16 Ill. 35, the court approved of the ruling in the above case of Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588, 60 Am. Dec. 773, although in that case the ordinance did not specifically declare the selling of intoxicating liquors to be a nuisance.

So, a city ordinance which prohibits the sale of spirituous and intoxicating liquors within the

Messrs. Howe, Spencer, & Cocke and H. C. Prevost, for appellee:

Act 19 of 1888 is not invalid under article 29 of the Constitution. It has a unity of object, and its details are germane.

State v. Lacombe, 12 La. Ann. 195; Clark v. Board of Health, 30 La. Ann. 1351; State, Southern Bank, v. Pillsbury, 31 La. Ann. 1; corporate limits or within one mile of the city, and adjudges the same a nuisance, is valid and binding, the corporate authorities of a town having authority to declare the sale of intoxicating liquors a nuisance. Harbaugh v. Monmouth, 74 Ill. 367, 369.

And a city ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, and providing that any person violating the same shall be guilty of a nuisance, and upon conviction shall be fined, properly defines the offense, and prescribes the punishment, although such portion of it as calls it a nuisance may be rejected as surplusage. Carthage v. Buckner, 4 Ill. App. 317, 322.

Again, a city ordinance prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors as a nuisance in any refreshment saloon or restaurant within the city, but not prohibiting the use or keeping thereof elsewhere, merely selecting the place of a certain class and prohibiting its use in such places, is not unreasonable, and is a valid exercise of its police power. State v. Clark, 28 N. H. 178, 61 Am. Dec. 611.

Under an ordinance providing that persons keeping notorious, disorderly, and riotous houses for the resort of idle and drunken persons shall, on conviction, be liable to fine, and also the forfeiture of his or their license to keep the same, to be withdrawn by the intendant, and shall be debarred of the privilege of again obtaining a license to keep such a house or bar, until he produces satisfactory assurances and sufficient securities against committing a like offense. The revocation of the license does not preclude the continuance of the business, as it provides that upon certain contingencies it may be continued, and such proviso is not in restraint of trade as it is a mere regulation thereof to keep it in proper bounds, the city council being charged with the police regulations of the city, the preservation of order, and the comfort and happiness of its inhabitants, and such ordinance is enacted to suppress in a summary manner such quasi nuisances; and the court will therefore refuse to interfere with such municipal regulations, it not appearing that the city council have transcended their powers or violated their functions. Towns v. Tallahassee, 11 Fla. 130, 134.

Section 456 of the Iowa Code enumerates certain powers of the incorporation, such as the prevention of riots, noise, disturbances, disorderly assemblages, etc., and provides that such incorporations shall have power "to preserve peace and order therein," and § 482 empowers municipal corporations to make and publish such ordinances, not inconsistent with the laws of the state, as shall seem necessary and proper to provide for the safety, preserve the health, promote prosperity, improve the morals, order, comfort, and convenience of such corporation and the inhabitants thereof.

Under the above sections it has been held that an ordinance declaring any person found in a state of intoxication in the town guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to be taken by the marshal, without warrant, before the mayor if in a fit condition for trial, and if not in such condition to be taken to jail until in such condition, and imposing a penalty, was within the authority conferred by the Code, the council determining that such person, in depriving himself of his reason by intoxication, has done an act derogative to the peace and order of the incorporation, and the comfort and convenience of the inhabitants. Bloomfield v. Trimble, 54 Iowa, 209, 37 Am. Rep. 212. In this case, however, no specific power to abate nuisances was given by the charter, neither was drunkenness specially declared to be a nuisance, although the terms of the charter were broad enough to embrace subjects of municipal control which were not expressly or particularly mentioned in the sections of the Code conferring powers upon cities and towns.

But, although the question of the power of a municipal corporation to abate a public nuisance was not directly involved in the case of McCrowell v. Bristol, 5 Lea, 685, 688 (the direct question being the liability for not abating a saloon as a nuisance), yet the court said that, as the keeping of a saloon was authorized and regulated by law for which a tax was paid to the state and county, and also to the corporate authorities when the business was to be carried on within a town, such business was not a nuisance per se, and that if it was so at all it became so by the manner in which it was kept, and that although the power to abate nuisance of a certain character was conceded, yet the power of a town or city government to abate a nuisance consisting in the disorderly manner in which a drinking saloon was kept, was not so clear.

So, an ordinance regulating the license of dram-shops and the grocery business, and providing that upon any violation of the same the town council shall revoke such license, and the town constable shall immediately close up the premises, such ordinance, in so far that it authorizes the closing up of such saloon or grocery business by force, without in the first place having the same judicially declared a nuisance ordered to be abated, is unconstitutional. Baldwin v. Smith, 32 Ill. 162.

And where by ordinance intoxicating liquors, kept within the town limits for sale or to be given away to be drunk within such limits, are declared a nuisance, and the police officers are directed to abate the same by removing them beyond such limits, such liquors cannot be taken away until it has been judicially determined that the ordinance has been violated. Darst v. People, 51 Ill. 293, 2 Am. Rep. 301.

Again, although the town has power under its charter to declare the sale of spirits or beer within its limits to be a nuisance, and can punish it as such, yet the charter gives it no extraterritorial power in regard to nuisances, and therefore such ordinance, in so far as it related or applied to 3 miles beyond the corporate limits, is void. Strauss v. Pontiac, 40 Ill. 301, 303.

The charter in the above case authorized the town to declare what shall be nuisances, and to prevent and remove the same, and to prohibit tipping houses and dram shops in the town or within 5 miles thereof, and to forbid any person from keeping in the town, or within 3 miles thereof, of spirits or beer for the purposes of traffic under the penalty of a fine, and gave power to make all ordinances necessary to carry into effect the execution of such powers. It was held that the city had no authority to pass an ordinance forbidding the sale of spirits or beer outside the corporate limits and within 3 miles thereof, as the town could not give its ordinance an extraterritorial effect except so far as it might be clearly authorized so to do by 39 L. R. A.

the legislature, the section of the charter, giving the town power to legislate and to prohibit tipping houses and dram shops within 5 miles, not embracing the power to prohibit the sale for exportation or for domestic use of beer, the act not prohibiting the keeping of spirits or beer for the purposes of traffic within 3 miles of the town, although conferring upon the town power to enact an ordinance upon the subject. Strauss v. Pontiac, 40 Ill. 301, 302.

A similar decision was rendered in Ashton v. Ellsworth, 48 Ill. 299, although it did not appear that the act was specifically declared to be a nuisance.

A charter empowering the city council to declare the selling, giving away, or the keeping on hand for sale of any spirituous or intoxicating liquors, ale, beer, or any kind of fermented liquors within the city a nuisance, must be construed so as to mean that the liquors must be kept to sell within the city, and as not intended to prohibit the possession of liquors within the city designed for sale elsewhere; and therefore an ordinance making it an offense for any person within the city to have in his, her, or their possession any intoxicating liquors exceeds the power conferred, no right being given by the charter to make the possession of such liquors within the city, without any intention of selling therein, an offense. Sullivan v. Oneida, 61 Ill. 242, 245.

Under the charter in the above case, it was held that an ordinance authorizing the search and seizure of liquors were kept in the city whether there was an intention to sell them or ship them and sell elsewhere or not, it was held that such ordinance was ultra vires and void as interfering with the commerce between the states, it might be with foreign commerce; and that, even as confining its operation to the ordinary traffic between the city and the neighboring towns and cities, it was also unjust and illegal. Sullivan v. Oneida, 61 Ill. 242, 245.

Under an ordinance which prohibits the retailing of intoxicating liquors, but gives power to the city council to license, regulate, and tax such sales, and to declare the keeping of the same on hand to be a nuisance, and providing for its summary abatement and suppression by means of a search of the premises and the seizure and sale of the liquors there found, the court stated that if the article so found was so great a nuisance as to require such summary proceedings for its suppression, the sale of it by the officer under the seizure should also be considered a nuisance which ought to be suppressed, and that therefore such ordinance was objectionable. Sullivan v. Oneida, 61 Ill. 242, 247.

In Sullivan v. Stephenson, 62 Ill. 230, the court upheld the decision in the above case of Sullivan v. Oneida, 61 Ill. 242, 247, the ordinance passed upon being the same as in the previous case.

So, an ordinance prohibiting the playing or making a noise upon any musical instrument in any drinking saloon or beer cellar after midnight, and also prohibiting any female from being in any public drinking saloon after such hour, was upheld in Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 702, although the city ordinance did not specifically declare such acts to be nuisances nor prohibit them as such.

Spirituous liquors are not of themselves a common nuisance, but the act of keeping them for sale by statute creates a nuisance; but it is not lawfu

The act of 1888 does not violate article 235 of the Constitution.

The ordinance of November 15, 1888, does not violate article 1 of the Constitution.

The ordinance is not ultra vires of the city.

It does not interfere with any right of property in animals. The defendants have been found guilty, as matter of fact, of cruelty to animals in a public street. The facts will not be inquired into on appeal.

Third Municipality v. Blanc, 1 La. Ann. 385.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

One of the defendants appeals from a judgment condemning him to pay a fine of $25, and the other appeals from a judgment condemning him to pay a fine of $2.50. The charge upon which the judgment was rendered was that of cruelty to animals, in violation of an ordinance of the city council. The case comes before us on questions of law and such facts as may be needful to their decision.

The first point urged by the appellants was that the recorder erred in not granting defendants' motion for a bill of particulars. It appears that the affidavit was made in good faith, and that it was reasonable, and that the law had been substantially complied with. It could have been amended at any time during the hearing, in case of insufficiency or defect. It was not amended, and on the trial it did not become apparent that an amendment or a bill of particulars was needful. Substantially the defendants must have known the offense for which they were tried.

After this motion had been overruled, and for any person to destroy them by way of abating the common nuisance. Brown v. Perkins, 12 Gray, 89, 100.

As to the power of a municipality to order the destruction of intoxicating liquors, see Wallace v. Richmond (Va.) 36 L. R. A. 554.

c. Public amusements.

It has been said that a house or place kept by the owner with a view to profit, for the practice of public amusements not in themselves prohibited by law, cannot be held to be a nuisance unless such consequence attaches from the mode in which it is kept. State v. Hall, 32 N. J. L. 158, 164.

Public picnics and open-air dances, within the limits of a village, cannot be declared nuisances by a village ordinance, such not being nuisances in themselves. Des Plaines v. Poyer, 123 Ill. 348, affirming 22 Ill. App. 574.

So, the Ferris Wheel, erected for the purpose of amusement, is not a public nuisance abatable by the city authorities, it not being a nuisance per se. Ferris Wheel Co. v. Chicago, 27 Chicago Legal News, 399.

the defendants had taken their bills of exception, they made the defense that act No. 19 of 1888, and the ordinance under which they were prosecuted, violate article 29 of the Constitution. With reference to the act, it is argued that it contains three objects. Two of these objects, it is asserted, are not necessary or incident to the main object. The act assailed by the defendants as being unconstitutional is entitled "An Act Relative to Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals; Their Organization, Their Officers, Members, and Agents, and the Fines Collected in Prosecutions Instituted by Them and the Duties of Municipal Corporations with Respect Thereto." The plaintiff seeks to support the act on the ground that the object is to prevent cruelty to animals in streets and other places of the municipal corporations; that under the title of the act it was germane to that part of the statute relating to the organization of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals, to add a section making it the duty of municipal corporations to provide by ordinance for the punishment of cruelty to animals. It was contended that these were necessary for "oneness" or unity of object in the act. This position of plaintiff is controverted by the defendants, who urge that the title of the act is clear, and that it could convey no other purpose than to provide for the organization of societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals; and that the other part of the act, as we take it, which provides for the organization of these societies, directs mayors of cities to commission their agents as special officers, foreign to the purpose of the act. From these propositions the conclusion is arrived at by the defendants that the provision of this act contains three different nongermane objects. They are briefly stated: (1) To authorize societies to prevent cruelty to animals; (2) to direct the municipal corporations to issue commissions to designated agents as special officers of the society; (3) to punish offenders.

In our view, the different provisions of the act include a number of details which were deemed necessary in order to accomplish the purpose in view. There is not here the least inconsistency; they all harmonize to one end.

Theatrical performances, legalized by the payment of a tax imposed by the city authorities, are not within the provisions of an act giving such authorities power to make, limit, and impose reasonable fines for all misdemeanors, disorders, neglects, and nuisances committed within the limits of the city, for which the laws of the state have not provided an ample remedy. Waters v. Leech, 3 Ark. 110, 155.

Yet, an ordinance which prohibits noisy amusements, and prevents immorality, will be upheld as tending to prevent nuisances. Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 702.

The establishment of a public show, such as a menagerie, circus, or hippodrome, on a tract of land dedicated to a city or town for the purpose of a graveyard, and actually used as such, constitutes a public nuisance which may be abated by the authorities by means of their police power and as a government agency, and not merely in the discharge of their purely corporate power or duty. Kansas City v. Lemen, 12 U. S. App. 640, 57 Fed. Rep. 907.

R. W.

There is difference in details, but none as to objects. The municipality has been given no power save that needful to accomplish the one statutory object. Two agencies, it has been repeatedly held, may be combined under one authority, with the view of carrying out an end proposed. Power may be given to two corporations, and the statute is not illegal, as containing two objects, from the fact that it also authorizes the forming of a society solely, in matter, for the one object in view. The title, also, is broad enough to cover all the provisions of the act, and the body of the act contains one object,—to prevent cruelty to animals,—and is responsive to the title covering the one object. State v. Taylor, 84 La. Ann. 981; Lucky v. Police Jury, 46 La. Ann. 686.

We take up the next ground of defense,—the act violates article 285 of the Constitution, and permits infringement upon the rights of persons. This objection is founded upon the asserted favoritism of the society. If there is any foundation in fact in the position, it would be evidence of the violation of the statute by the society, and not an indication of permission to commit trespass or to inflict an injustice. The matter of notice to one, and not to the other, that he is exposed to arrest, because of his direct or indirect violation of the ordinance, does not give rise to any question of unconstitutionality of the statute. The complaint is not before us contradictorily with the asserted offending society. Moreover, if it be as asserted, the favoritism could not be justified by any of the terms of the statute. The prosecution was instituted in the name of the state; it cannot be (as defendants would have it) presumed that it was instituted by the society. The society, not being a party, cannot be held responsible for alleged partiality in the matter of the enforcement of the statute relative to cruelty to animals.

The illegality of the ordinance to prevent cruelty to animals is also urged on the ground that it does not come within the scope of the police power of the city; that the police power does not extend to the protection of animals in the manner the ordinance would sanction; that there was no breach of order or disturbance of any kind, and the act of the defendant in question was of a personal character; it concerned only the appellants personally. We take it that the legislature had conferred needful power to the council to pass ordinances to prohibit nuisances. This conferred upon the city government authority to impose penalties upon those who make an unlawful, unreasonable, and offensive use of their property. Cruelty to animals on the public street, it has been held, works annoyance, and, as such, it is in violation of the rights of the public.

The objection of the appellants that the ordinance interferes with private rights of property, and the liberty of using it, and of enjoying the ownership, is equally as unfounded. The rights of the owner of animals cannot be injuriously affected or obstructed under the terms of an ordinance requiring that they be not cruelly treated in the public places of a city. The statute relating to animals is based on "the theory, unknown to the common law, that animals have rights which, like those of human beings, are to be protected. A horse, under its master's hands, stands in a relation to the master analogous to that of a child to a parent." Bishop, Statutory Crimes, §§1101 et seq. Reasoning from that basis, we feel certain that the ordinance and the statute do not interfere with the private right of property, as claimed.

In answer to the contention that we should review the facts, we deem it proper to say: This being an appeal from a fine imposed under a municipal ordinance, this court is not vested with jurisdiction to determine on the facts of the case, save to the extent needful to pass on the law points presented. This court has naught to do with the guilt or innocence of those against whom these proceedings were instituted. This, being exclusively a matter of fact, does not come within the exercise of our appellate power.

It is ordered and adjudged that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

v.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK OF LATROBE, Appt.

(183 Pa. 519.)

1. A bank receiving a check instead of cash, without authority from its principal, on a sale of his stock, and crediting his account with the amount of it, is liable to him therefor notwithstanding the fact that the check proves worthless, and irrespective of the question of its diligence in attempting to collect it.

2. Voluntary payment which cannot be recalled, by a bank to its principal, is made where, after taking a check instead of cash without authority to do so, on the sale of stock, it notifies the principal of the deposit of the check to his credit, and afterwards pays his check for the proceeds.

(Mitchell, Williams, and Fell, JJ., dissent.)

(January 8, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Westmoreland County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount which had been received for the sale by defendant of securities belonging to plaintiff which reached defendant in the shape of a check which it failed to collect. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. G. D. Albert, A. H. Bell, and Gaither & Woods, for appellant:

Plaintiff's right to recover must be predicated upon the negligence of the defendant, and consequent loss to him.

This negligence might be either: (1) Negligence in the selection of a proper broker; (2) negligence in settlement with the broker for proceeds of the sale of stock; (3) negligence in failing to account to plaintiff or hand over to him the evidence of settlement with the broker.

Where the plaintiff complains of an injury resulting from the negligence or unskillful conduct of the defendants, in the performance of some work or duty undertaken by the latter, he must, whether the action be framed in contract, or in tort, prove: (1) The contract or undertaking on the ground of which the defendant acted; (2) the negligence of the defendant; (3) the loss which has resulted from it.

2 Tomlin, Law Dict. p. 680.

The facts disclose no negligence on the part of the defendant in its settlement with the brokers.

The commission of a negligent act, by the omission to perform a legal duty, is not actionable without proof of loss or injury.

Messrs. James S. Moorhead and John B. Head, for appellee:

When the defendant undertook to act as agent for the plaintiff in procuring a sale of his stock, the instructions of the principal were merely to sell the stock and receive the proceeds. It was bound to receive money only, and if it saw fit to accept anything else from the purchaser or any subagent it employed, its principal would not be bound thereby, but could compel it to account as if it had received the cash.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If the plaintiff had been the owner of the check in question, and had deposited it with the defendant bank for collection, it may be conceded that the bank would not have been liable for the nonpayment of the check. While the course and the process of collection were rather slow, it was still within the limits of ordinary bank usage, and we think a charge of negligence could not have been established. But the trouble with the case is that there were no such facts in it. The plaintiff was not the owner of the check, and he did not deposit it for collection. The check was drawn to the order of the defendant, and was, therefore, the property of the defendant. They might do with it as they chose. The liability of the defendant to the plaintiff was not a liability on the check, or for any use the defendant did make or could make of it. The check was the exclusive property of the defendant. The plaintiff had no interest in it whatever. In order that the plaintiff might become its owner, it would have been necessary for the defendant to indorse it, so as to make it payable to the plaintiff's order. Even if the plaintiff had received the physical custody of the check by delivery of its corpus to him, he could not have deposited it in the defendant's bank for collection without the indorsement of it by the defendant to his order or in blank. But there were no facts of that character in the case. The bank never delivered the check to the plaintiff, nor did they deposit the check to the credit of the plaintiff's account. It assumed it itself, and, of course, assumed the collection of it. The plaintiff, as a matter of fact, had nothing whatever to do with the check. He had no right, title, or interest in it, and he was never placed in such a position by the bank that he could possibly have exercised any claim of dominion or ownership or interest of any kind in it. Moreover, the defendant still has the check. It has never delivered or tendered it to the plaintiff, and hence, if it had received the check from the plaintiff in regular course, it would have been liable. In Fifth Nat. Bank v. Ashworth, 128 Pa. 212, 2 L. R. A. 491, Mr. Justice Paxson, delivering the opinion, said: "It is safe to say, as a general rule, that when a bank receives a check from one of its depositors for collection, it must return him the check or the money." The present action is brought by the plaintiff, as a depositor in the defendant's bank, to recover the amount of his deposit, $516.86, standing to his credit on the books of the bank, after the refusal of the bank to pay his check for that amount on December 27, 1895. The defendant company refuses to pay the money, because it says that, owing to a transaction which it had with the plaintiff, it had received from the plaintiff fifty-one shares of the capital stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to be sold for his account, and upon his directions; that they had sent the certificates of stock to a firm of brokers, L. H. Taylor & Co., in Philadelphia, where they remained until, on December 17, 1895, the plaintiff directed the defendant to sell twenty shares of the stock at the best market price on December 18 or 19. This order was communicated to the brokers by the bank, and on December 18 the brokers reported that they had sold the stock. On December 20 the defendant received from the brokers their check on a Philadelphia bank, payable to the order of the defendant bank, for $1,073.75. They then credited the plaintiff's account on their books, and sent the check, with other checks, to Second National Bank of Pittsburgh for collection for the account of the defendant bank. On December 24 they received a telegram, which announced the assignment of Taylor & Co., of Philadelphia, and on December 27 the check came back protested. It charged back on the plaintiff's account the amount of the check and protest, and thus reduced the amount of his credit so that his account was overdrawn. It claims that it was relieved of liability for the loss on the Taylor check, and might lawfully charge the plaintiff's account with this loss. The question at once arises, What was the true legal relation between the plaintiff and defendant as to this particular transaction? It is perfectly clear that it is not a relation of depositor with the bank. The plaintiff, never having had the check, never deposited it with the defendant. It is true, the defendant credited the plaintiff's account with the amount of the check when it received it. It thus made itself debtor to him for the amount credited. This it had a perfect right to do, and the plaintiff had a perfect right to accept the credit and draw against it. When the bank gave the credit to the plaintiff, it, of course, assumed that the check would be paid, as it had a right to do; but does it follow that, when the check was dishonored, several days later, on presentation, the defendant had a lawful right to charge back the loss to the plaintiff's account? As has already been said, if the check had belonged to the plaintiff, and had been deposited by him, the bank would probably not have been chargeable with the commercial negligence which imposes liability on that ground upon such institutions. But it is perfectly clear that such was not the legal relation of the plaintiff and defendant, and hence the rule which would or might have exempted the bank from liability as a consequence of such a relation has no application, and cannot be invoked by the bank. What, then, was their true legal relation? The bank voluntarily undertook to sell the plaintiff's stock at his request. But in so doing it was not exercising any function which pertained to it as a bank. It is no part of the business of a national bank to engage in the selling of stocks for anybody. It was a transaction outside of its regular banking business, and not within its chartered powers. This being so, when the bank received the stock from the plaintiff, and agreed to sell it, it could only be understood to assume the relation of agent for the plaintiff as principal in that particular transaction. When it sold the stock, it was acting as his agent, and became subject to whatever rules of law are applicable to that relation. Of course, acting in that capacity, it could sell as any other agent, and would be responsible for its acts as any other agent.

In the case of Fifth Nat. Bank v. Ashworth, above referred to, the transaction in question was in the line of ordinary banking business, yet the defendant bank was held liable simply because, in collecting its customer's check, it took a cashier's check for the check deposited, instead of taking cash. The action was by a depositor against a bank with which he had deposited a check for $2,622.25 on the Penn Bank. This check was presented next day through the clearing house, but the Penn Bank had then closed its doors, and the check was protested. A few days later the Penn Bank resumed operations, and was open, and doing business, on the day following. On that day the check was again presented, together with some other checks, by the defendant bank, and in exchange for them all a cashier's check of the Penn Bank was given to and received by the defendant bank. The Penn Bank was paying all checks presented. The cashier's check was deposited by the defendant bank with another bank through which it cleared, but on the next business day—which was Monday following the Saturday on which the cashier's check was given—the Penn Bank again closed its doors, and the cashier's check was not paid. On these facts we held the defendant bank responsible to the plaintiff for the loss. Paxson, J., 89 L. R. A.

further said: "It is also equally clear that if the collecting bank surrenders the check to the bank upon which it is drawn, and accepts a cashier's check, or other obligation, in lieu thereof, its liability to its depositor is fixed, as much so as if it had received the cash. It has no right, unless specially authorized to do so, to accept anything in lieu of money,"—citing Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 109 Pa. 422, 58 Am. Rep. 728, and several other cases. "We need not discuss the question whether the defendant failed to exercise due diligence in not sending the dishonored check through the clearing house on Saturday. That it could have been done, and was done by some other parties, distinctly appears by the evidence, and is not disputed. We think the defendant bank fixed its liability by surrendering the check to the Penn Bank, and accepting the cashier's or teller's check of that bank. As between the defendant and its depositor, this amounted to payment. The plaintiff has neither his check nor his money." With how much more force do these remarks apply to the present case. Here the defendant accepted the check of Taylor & Co. in payment for the stock, when it had no legal right to accept anything but money. It credited the plaintiff's account with the amount of the check, and thereby assumed it to be that much cash. It might have notified the plaintiff that it had received the check, and delivered it to him, or might have held it for collection before crediting his account. If he had accepted it as cash, the bank would have been exonerated, or if he had agreed it might hold it for collection before giving him credit, and, had used due diligence in its collection, it probably could not have been held liable. But neither of these things was done; on the contrary, it assumed it as cash, and so treated it in its dealing with the plaintiff. We do not see how it can be relieved from responsibility. In the case of Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Goodman, 109 Pa. 422, 58 Am. Rep. 728, we held that a bank which had received for collection from a depositor a check on another bank, and had sent the check to the bank on which it was drawn, and had received from that bank a draft on some other bank, which was not paid, was liable to its depositor for the check he had deposited. It was claimed that there was no negligence, because the usual course of business was followed. But we held this was not sufficient. The court below said, and we affirmed it: "The defendant assumed the responsibility of sending the evidence of the plaintiff's right to have the money for which it called collected for their benefit, to the bank which was expected to make payment. Not obtaining the money, but a worthless draft, in return, the defendant, treating the check as not paid, charged the amount of it back to the plaintiff's account, and, when they called for the check, as the best evidence of their right to recover against the maker, they are informed: 'The check you call for cannot be returned. It was paid, charged to the drawer's account, and canceled.'" We held the same doctrine in Hazlett v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 132 Pa. 118. That an agent for sale has no power to receive anything but money in payment is too familiar a rule to require the citation of authorities to support it. A single reference to one of our most recent decisions, where the subject is reviewed, will suffice. Paul v. Grimm, 165 Pa. 189.

We cannot see how this case can be decided upon the question whether the bank used due diligence in collecting the check of Taylor & Co. It never was the property of the plaintiff. He did not deposit it, and had nothing to do with it. The defendant received it, owned it, held it, still holds it, and never even tendered it to the plaintiff. The bank treated it as cash on its own responsibility, and credited the plaintiff's account with the amount of it. We know of no principle upon which it can charge back to him a check which he never saw, never owned, never had any interest in, and upon which his name never did, and does not now, appear, either as drawer, payee, indorser, or in any other manner whatever. The assignments of error are dismissed.

It is perfectly manifest that, if the bank had paid to the plaintiff in bank notes the amount of the check, and he had put them in his pocket, and gone about his business, the bank could never have recovered back the money. It could pay him the money if it chose, and he could receive it in good conscience. That being so, he could keep it, and could not be compelled to repay it. The law upon that subject is without question. The payment would be voluntary on the part of the bank, and, being such, the plaintiff could conscientiously receive it, and he could thereafter retain it. Now, it so happens that the actual facts make out just such a case. When the bank received the check and credited the plaintiff's account, it gave him notice to that effect, and thereupon he drew a check for $1,600 against his account, which included the whole amount of the sum credited, and $600 besides; and when the check was presented the bank paid it. It was not until after this that it charged back the credit against the account. This, it is very clear, they could not do without his consent.

Judgment affirmed.

Mitchell, J., dissenting:

As to the stock, the bank was a mere agent for transmission and sale, not responsible for anything but negligence, of which there is no evidence. This is conceded. In the ordinary course of business, the bank received the check for the proceeds of the sale of stock, and, of course, its title to the check was only as agent for the real owner, the plaintiff. Treating the check as money also in the ordinary course of its business, the bank passed the amount to the credit of the plaintiff in his account. It is said in the opinion of the court that it is clear that as to the check the relation of depositor did not exist. But with great respect for my brethren who so hold, I think it perfectly clear that this was the exact relation. The bank treated the check as money of its depositor, credited it in his deposit account, so notified him, and he ratified and assented to its action by drawing against the sum. It is 89 L. R. A.

the basis of the alleged balance of deposit in his favor for which this suit is brought. Without that check as part of his deposit account, he has no such balance, his account is overdrawn. When the check came back unpaid, the bank charged it up against its depositor, to offset the formal credit which had been given him for it. This it had the right to do, just as if it had credited him with a deposit of $1,000 in bank notes or gold coin, which later were found to be counterfeit. It is also said that the bank still has the check, and has not delivered it to plaintiff. He refused it. When he was notified that it had come back, he said peremptorily he had nothing to do with it. In this he was wrong. It was the basis of a credit to which he was not entitled, and on which he should not be permitted to recover.

PHILADELPHIA COMPANY, Appt.

1. An abandonment of a pipe line and the removal of the pipe may be made by a natural gas company which has laid its pipe in the exercise of eminent domain across the lands of other persons, when there is a failure of the supply of gas.
2. A right to enter and remove gas pipe without being liable as a trespasser belongs to a gas company which has condemned a right of way for its pipeline where the supply of gas has failed, but this right must be exercised at the time and in the manner least harmful to the landowner and subject to the payment of compensation for any actual injury to growing grain or grass, and, if the field be a meadow, for any substantial injury to the turf beyond the mere opening and filling of the trench in which the pipe lay.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 2 for Allegheny County assessing the damages for the injuries to plaintiff's land for the removal of gas pipes therefrom. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Dalsell, Scott, & Gordon, for appellant:

A railroad company may "mark and determine such route for a railroad as they may deem expedient, not to exceed 60 feet in width, and thereon" erect the railroad and such structures as may be useful in connection with the same.

Purdon, 1793, pl. 77.

By proceeding under this act the railroad company becomes seised with what has been recently said by the supreme court to be a base fee; but whatever the name applied to it, it is such an estate as entitles the company to its exclusive occupation.

Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Peet, 152 Pa. 488, 19 L. R. A. 467; Pennsylvania S. Valley R. Co. v. Reading Paper Mills, 149 Pa. 18; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 44 Pa. 375; Junction R. Co. v. Philadelphia, 88 Pa. 424.

When we turn to a natural gas company, however, not only is the nature of the occupation of the ground entirely different, but also the wording of the act of assembly and the estate acquired by the company and that retained by the owner.

Act May 29, 1885, § 10 (Purdon, 1595, pl. 15).

The legislature never conferred upon natural gas companies the right to the exclusive possession of any part of the landowner's estate except the few inches actually occupied by the pipe, and the estate appropriated, instead of being a base fee such as a railroad company or canal company takes, or a fee simple such as the commonwealth takes, was simply and purely an easement for the purpose of laying down, maintaining, repairing, renewing, and removing a pipe, and nothing else.

The proprietor of an easement may enter upon the servient estate and do everything in the way of repairs or otherwise that is necessary for the comfortable and convenient enjoyment of the easement.

The appropriation proceeding gives the company a right to enter upon the property, to lay down and maintain its pipes thereon and to remove them when the necessity for the public use has terminated.

Mr. J. P. Hunter, for appellees:

An easement is defined to be "a privilege without profit which the owner of one tenement has a right to enjoy in respect of that tenement in or over the tenement of another person, by reason whereof the latter is obliged to suffer or refrain from doing something on his own tenement, for the advantage of the former."

Goddard, Easem. Bennett's ed. p. 2.

An easement must be connected with a dominant tenement.

Appellant has the right to enter for the purpose of inspection, for repairs, for renewing its line, etc., because such acts are a necessary incident to such transportation and distribution, and are a part of the original appropriation, and to be considered in estimating the damages properly payable for the land taken.

But the reasons which necessitate the implication of the acquirement of such rights are in no sense applicable to the removal of the line; it is not necessary for such transportation and distribution that the line should be removed; such right of removal is not necessary to the enjoyment of the appropriation, it is not necessary to the "transportation and distribution of natural gas."

The bond having been approved the title of the owner was divested and the easement of the company was lawfully acquired and fixed.

Fries v. Southern Pennsylvania R. & Min. Co. 85 Pa. 74.

After such approval, its entry thereon and the construction of its line of pipes was a lawful entry, and no presumptions could arise against it, as in the case of one who entered upon property without lawful right, and made improvements thereon.

Elliott, Railroads, § 1998, p. 1447; Northern C. R. Co. v. Canton Co. 30 Md. 352; Randolph, Em. Dom. § 221; Justice v. Nesquehoning Valley R. Co. 87 Pa. 28; Wagner v. Cleveland & T. R. Co. 22 Ohio St. 563, 10 Am. Rep. 770.

The company has the right to abandon the right thus acquired, and as there is no implication of a dedication of the improvements placed upon the property, it has the right to remove such improvements. It is like trade fixtures, but is, like trade fixtures, to be removed without injury to the freehold.

Elwes v. Maw, 8 East, 38, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 208.

The jurors are to consider the matter just as if they were called on to value the injury at the moment when compensation could first be demanded.

Co.* 88 Pa. 57; Fisher v. Baden Gas Co. 138 Pa. 302; McGregor v. Equitable Gas Co. 139 Pa. 230; Davis v. Jefferson Gas Co. 147 Pa. 137; Denniston v. Philadelphia Gas Co. 161 Pa. 44.

The right to remove the pipe is not one of the things to be contemplated and paid for in the original easement. It is too speculative and remote.

The action of the company in not specifying the width necessary for its purpose in its original appropriation was the more remarkable, as it has been the almost universal practice to specify such width as well as the number and size of the lines to be laid.

Davis v. Jefferson Gas Co. 147 Pa. 146; Wallace v. Jefferson Gas Co. 147 Pa. 206; McGregor v. Equitable Gas Co. 139 Pa. 230.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case presents a somewhat novel question. The defendant company is engaged in the production and transportation of natural gas. In 1888 it acquired, by proceedings under the act of May 29, 1885, the right to lay its line of pipes by means of which its gas was transported to consumers in and upon the lands of the plaintiffs, and damages were duly assessed and paid to them for the injury sustained by reason of the appropriation of the easement to the uses of the company. In 1893 the wells supplying this pipe line ceased to produce natural gas in marketable quantity, and the line became useless. It was abandone as a line of transportation, and the pipe composing it became useless where it was, and was taken up and removed. It had been buried, as "the law required," not less than 2 feet below the surface, and its removal required the opening of the trench in which it had been placed, the lifting of the pipes to the surface, and the hauling of them away upon wagons. This was done in March, 1898, and this action was thereupon brought to recover the damages sustained by the plaintiffs in consequence of the abandonment and removal of the line from their lands. The question thus raised is over the measure of damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled. This must depend on the consideration of two preliminary questions: First, What was the character and extent of the easement acquired by the defendant under the proceedings had under the act of May 29, 1885? This is a question of law. The other is to what extent, if at all, the defendant has exceeded the limits of its right under the easement so acquired. This is a question of fact.

The act of 1885 confers the right of eminent domain "for the laying of pipe lines for the transportation and distribution of natural gas" to be exercised in the manner pointed out. If the line is laid "upon or over lands cleared and used for agricultural purposes, the line of pipe shall be buried at least 24 inches below the surface; and if any line of pipe shall be laid over or through any waste or wood land which shall be changed to farming land, then it shall be the duty of the corporation to immediately bury the said pipe to the depth of at least 24 inches as aforesaid." The easement acquired by the company is for the laying of the gas pipe beneath the surface of cleared land, or, as expressed by the act itself, for "burying" the pipe at least 24 inches below the surface in all such lands. The company does not require, nor is it to the interest of the landowner, that it should appropriate a definite strip of surface of 12 feet in width, as suggested by the learned judge of the court below, or of any other width, to which it shall have an exclusive right of possession as against the landowner. What is needed is the space under the surface in which the pipe may rest, together with the right to deposit or "bury" it out of the landowner's way, and the right of access to it for purposes of maintenance and repairs. Subject to the easement so defined, the landowner continues in the possession and use of the entire surface as freely as before the "burial" of the pipe took place; and, if the burial of the pipe is properly done, and the joints are made secure, the presence of the pipe line under the soil will in no way interfere with its cultivation or use. But the unlooked-for failure of the gas wells compels the abandonment of the line as a means of transporting and distributing gas. It had no value for any other purpose. The material belonged to the company, and it had a clear right to remove the pipe from its bed, and utilize it in whatever manner might seem best. The proceedings under the right of eminent domain had not affected the title to the pipe, or imposed any obligation upon the company to maintain line any longer than its own interests might dictate. The sole object and effect of the appropriation was to secure the right to transport natural gas across the lands of the plaintiffs in the manner provided for by the act of 1885. The damages were assessed with reference to the fact that the company acquired thereby a right to enjoy the easement indefinitely. Yet if it happened that the supply for which the pipe line afforded the means of transportation should cease, it was within the knowledge and contemplation of the parties that the line would become useless, and that its abandonment must follow. In such a contingency the company may surrender the easement for which it has paid, and remove its pipes from the land. This is in case of the owner. A right of entry exists for this purpose, and, if the removal is conducted with a due regard to the interests and rights of the landowner, there is no ground for complaint on his part that the easement has been surrendered by a removal of the material that had been "buried" in his soil. But if the work is not properly done; if the trench is left open, or but partially filled; if the growing crops or grass are broken down or destroyed, or the turf unnecessarily cut into or injured, the owner has a right to complain. The right of entry was incident to the laying and care of the line while the easement was being enjoyed, and when its enjoyment was no longer possible it was an incident to the right to withdraw from the land, and surrender the privilege acquired under the right of eminent domain. But neither while the line was in use, nor after its use had ceased, did the right of entry authorize the doing of any substantial injury to the owners beyond the burying or removal of the pipe in the best way practicable. If it was to the interests of the company to remove its pipes in wet weather, and in doing so to drive over the plaintiffs' fields on the dryest routes it could find, thereby injuring the crops or grass, there is no reason why it should not pay for the injury so done. The measure of the damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled is the extent of the injury done them by the removal of the pipes at an improper time, or in an improper manner. The nature and extent of the easement permitted the cultivation of the surface over the pipe line in subordination to the rights of the company to enter upon it whenever such entry became necessary. If, because of an exercise of the right of entry incident to the easement, growing crops were disturbed, this was damnum absque injuria as to the surface necessarily occupied for the purposes for which the entry was properly made. An entry for the purposes of removal stands, however, upon somewhat different grounds. It is not made because of the necessities of transportation, but because they no longer exist. It is therefore the duty of the company to make the removal at the time and in the manner best adapted to the purpose and least harmful to the landowner. It is the duty of the company, upon a surrender of its easement, to fill the trench it has opened so as substantially to restore the surface of the land, and its failure to do so is just ground of complaint. It should make compensation for any actual injury to growing grain or grass, and, if the field be in meadow, for any substantial injury to the turf beyond the mere opening and filling of the trench in which the pipe lay. Subject, however, to the limitations now indicated, it has the right to enter and remove its pipe without being liable as a trespasser therefor.

The judgment is reversed, that the proper measure of damages may be given to the jury, and a venire facias de novo is awarded.

v.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(188 Pa. 174.)

1. The rule that a carrier must give notice to the consignee of the arrival of goods at destination is subject to exceptions growing out of special circumstances, and out of customs that have grown up for the mutual advantage of shipper and carrier.
2. A contract that goods shall be at the risk of the owners when unloaded on a platform at a station where there is no building or any agent of the carrier is not against public policy.
3. Unloading goods during a storm, on an open platform, and leaving them unprotected from the weather, is not a fault of the carrier where there is no building at that station or any agent of the carrier, and the bill of lading provides that when delivered on the platform they are at the risk of the owner.

(November 8, 1897.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court affirming a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas No. 4 for Philadelphia County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries resulting to goods in defendant's possession for transportation through its negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Hampton Barnes and George Tucker Bigham, for appellant: No obligation rests on railway carriers to give special notice of the arrival of goods to the person to whom they are consigned.

South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Wood, 66 Ala. 167, 41 Am. Rep. 749; Southwestern R. Co. v. Felder, 46 Ga. 433.

If the carrier must give such notice, may not this duty be waived by the mutual understanding of the parties; and may not such understanding be shown by, (1) general custom, (2) course of dealing, and (3) express contract?

Affirmative answers to the above contain propositions sound in law and policy, and well supported by authority.

Hutchinson, Carr. § 376; McMasters v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 374, 8 Am. Rep. 264; South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Wood, 66 Ala. 167, 41 Am. Rep. 749.

The contract is not against any public policy, nor is it a contract attempting to discharge the carrier from any negligence in the performance of its duty.

Messrs. Alfred J. Wilkinson and E. Hunn Hanson for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment appealed from in this case was rendered by the superior court. Four of the learned judges of that court concurred in the judgment. Three of them dissented from it. The questions that came under consideration are of public importance, and that they are by no means free from difficulty is shown by the wide differences of opinion entertained as to them by the members of the superior court. They may be stated thus: First. Is it an invariable rule in this state that a common carrier must give to the consignee of goods notice of their arrival at the point of destination? Second. May not special circumstances, a general custom or usage of business, or a special contract, modify or relieve against this duty? Third. If the second question be answered in the affirmative, is not this case, upon the evidence, one in which such modification should be held to exist? The evidence shows, substantially, that along the lines of the defendant's railroad there are small stations, known as "prepaid stations," at which no depot building has been erected, and no freight agent located. The business at such stations will not ordinarily justify the expense which such conveniences would involve, but the railroad company will accommodate people near such stations by delivering goods consigned to them on a platform, or on the ground, as the case may be. Among such prepaid stations was one called "Strafford." The only convenience at Strafford for the receipt and delivery of goods was a platform by the side of the road. There was no shelter, and no employee of the company to give notice of the arrival of goods at this station, up to the 7th day of October, 1893. It is alleged, and evidence was given upon the trial to show, that a custom exists among the railroads of the country for consignees of goods at such stations to look out for the arrival of their parcels, and take charge of them when they are set down from the train. It is not difficult to see how such a custom should grow out of the necessities of the situation in which both shippers and the carrier find themselves at such stations. Shippers know—for they are bound to know—that at a prepaid station they cannot expect notice from the carrier, nor attention or shelter for their goods, yet their wants are such that they may prefer to accept the risks rather than be compelled to go to some more remote station, where shelter exists and employees are abundant, to receive their goods. When persons so situated elect to have goods shipped to them at a prepaid station, there is no hardship in holding that they thereby assume to do for themselves what they know the railroad company cannot do for them. If we hold that a carrier is bound to give notice to the consignee of the arrival of goods at such stations, and keep them safely for a reasonable time, until they can be taken away, we simply compel the railroad company to abandon all such stations, and deprive the neighborhood of the accommodation which they afford. As there is no shelter there, the company cannot keep the goods for the owner. As there is no employee at the station, notice cannot be given. The carrier must transport the goods in the only way he can, or refuse to transport them to a prepaid station. If, therefore, the general rule as to notice be as contended for by the plaintiff where the ordinary facilities exist, we must nevertheless admit the existence of some exceptions, growing out of the special circumstances under which the carriage is undertaken, and out of the customs that have grown up for the mutual advantage of both shipper and carrier. But in this case we have an express contract, entered into because of the character of the station, and the refusal of the carrier to assume risks against which he cannot protect himself at the place for the delivery of the goods. In the bill of lading of February 22, 1894, there is the following provision: "When merchandise is destined to or from any way stations and platforms where station buildings have not been established by the carrier, or where there are no regularly appointed freight agents, it shall be at the risk of the owner until loaded into the cars, and when unloaded therefrom; and, when received from or delivered on private turnouts, it shall be at the owner's risk until cars are attached to, and after they are detached from, the train." The goods were received and transported under the terms of this agreement, by which the consignors undertook to receive the goods when they were put upon the platform at Strafford, and care for them at their own risk. If this was not done, it was not the fault of the carrier. He was to carry only, and all responsibility for protecting the goods, whether from thieves or from the weather, after reaching their destination, was assumed by the consignors, the owner. This contract the superior court held to be void, because against public policy, and cited as authority for such holding, among other cases, Willock v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 166 Pa. 184, 27 L. R. A. 228. But the cases cited are not exactly in point. In Willock's Case the question was whether the carrier could protect himself by a contract against the consequences of his own negligence or fraud. The headnote of the reporter is in these words: "A common carrier cannot stipulate for a release from the consequences of his own negligence or fraud." The case does not hold that he may not by contract so modify his common-law liability as to enable him to serve small communities, where no station house has been built, and no employee located. Such stipulations have been upheld in many cases where no effort was made to shield the carrier from his own negligence, and they have been held not to violate any rule of public policy. Atwood v. Reliance Transp. Co. 9 Watts, 87, 84 Am. Dec. 508; Bingham v. Rogers, 6 Watts & S. 495, 40 Am. Dec. 581; Laing v. Colder, 8 Pa. 479, 49 Am. Dec. 533; American Exp. Co. v.

—NOTE.—As to liability of carrier at destination, see also East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Kelly (Tenn.) 17 L. R. A. 691, and note; and Missouri P. R. Co. v. Nevils (Ark.) 23 L. R. A. 80.

Sands, 55 Pa. 140; Furnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 Pa. 53; Clyde v. Hubbard, 88 Pa. 358; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Raiordon, 119 Pa. 577. The special contract relied on in this case does not stipulate for relief from the consequences of the negligence or fraud of the carrier. It recognizes the existence of circumstances that make it practically impossible for the carrier to discharge all the common-law duties of a carrier at Strafford, and that induce him to refuse freight to that station, except upon special terms. It agrees, in view of these circumstances, to accept such service as the carrier can render, viz., the simple transportation of the goods, and to supply what the carrier is not prepared to supply,—the care and protection of the goods when they reach the platform. The contract limits the liability of the company to what it undertakes to do, and relieves it of responsibility for all that lies beyond the mere transportation and setting down of the goods.

It is asserted that the goods were unloaded during a storm, and were not protected by the carrier from the weather. By the contract the consignor was to look after the goods on their arrival. It was his business to provide the shelter. He knew the company had none. He had agreed to take the risk of caring for them. When the accommodation train came that morning, at the usual hour for its arrival, the consignee was not at the platform. His foreman was not there, although he was expecting the goods, and had notice from the consignor of their shipment. What should be done? The contract of the carrier had been performed, and he had the right to unload the goods. He could not carry them to some station where he had a safe place for storage, and leave them there, for Strafford was the point of destination; and the carrier can neither deliver goods at a wrong place, nor to a wrong person, without liability to the owner. If the goods had filled the car, the car might have been left with the goods in it, but the goods did not fill the car. It contained other goods, to be delivered to other persons, and at other places. The only other way of preserving the goods from the weather would have been to hold the train until the rain was over before unloading the goods, but this was clearly impracticable. The alternative was to unload the goods, and leave the consignee to attend to them, as the shipper had agreed should be done. This the carrier did, and we see no negligence in his so doing. He did all he agreed to do, all he was employed to do, all he had the power to do. The complaint really is that he delivered the goods at the proper point of destination, in exact compliance with his undertaking. If, after they were put off at the station, they were damaged by being left in the rain, the consignee or his agent, who came a half an hour too late to the platform, must take the consequences of the risk assumed when the carriage of the goods was contracted for.

We sustain the assignments of error, and reverse the judgment appealed from. A venire facias de novo is awarded, as there is another item in plaintiff's claim, as to which negligence in the manner of unloading is alleged.

Jacob BYERS.

(183 Pa. 509.)

1. A parol partition of land may be limited to the surface, and does not, as matter of law, extend to coal in the ground if the intent was to retain this in common.
2. The presumption, from the fact of the partition of the surface of land by parol, is that it includes the coal beneath as well as the surface, and one who denies it has the burden of proof.

(January 3, 1896.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Westmoreland County in favor of defendant in an action brought to obtain partition of certain coal beds. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. James S. Moorhead and John B. Head, for appellant:

Partition is a contract executed, not in part but in whole. It need not, indeed, be of all the lands which the parties hold in common or jointly, but it must be complete so far as relates to the part set out in severalty.

McConnell v. Carey, 48 Pa. 350.

A severance of coal and surface may be effected by parol as well as by an instrument of writing.

Tenants in common may well make partition between them if they will, but they shall not be compelled to make partition by the law; but if they make partition between themselves by their agreement and consent, such partition is good enough.

Co. Litt. § 318; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 863, 3 Lead. Cas. Am. Law of Real Prop. p. 128.

From the very beginning two essential facts must be proved to coexist in every parol partition before the law will recognize or the courts will enforce it. These are, first, an agreement to make partition; second, a withdrawal by the tenants from their previous common possession, and a subsequent exclusive possession by them of the part or parts set out in severalty.

Ebert v. Wood, 1 Binn. 216, 2 Am. Dec. 436; Rider v. Maul, 46 Pa. 376; McKnight v. Bell, 185 Pa. 371; Griswold v. Johnson, 5 Conn. 863, 3 Lead. Cas. Am. Law of Real Prop. p. 128; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 668, and cases there cited.

An agreement to make a parol partition, not followed by a change of possession, is of no effect. A separate possession by two tenants in common, not predicated on an agreement to part and divide, but based on convenience or other reason, will not effect a partition.

Snively v. Luce, 1 Watts, 69; Gratz v. Gratz, 4 Rawle, 438.

Messrs. D. S. Atkinson, John M. Peoples, and W. S. Byers, for appellee:

Partition, if equal at the time it was made, would be good however unequal it might be.

NOTE.—For adverse possession of surface as affecting coal beneath it, see Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Hughes (Pa.) 88 L. R. A. 826.

come afterward by subsequent events. Neither is it essentially requisite that a voluntary partition should be by deed in order to make it binding; as between parceners, at least, it is good if made by parol without deed.

Calhoun v. Hays, 8 Watts & S. 132, 42 Am. Dec. 375.

If it was the fact that a division line had been actually run to divide the land between the plaintiff's ancestor and the defendant, and the latter took and held exclusive possession of the land on one side of it, without regard to what his cotenants did as to the remainder, and continued that exclusive possession, receiving the profits thereof, paying taxes, and otherwise exercising exclusive acts of ownership over it for twenty-one years, the presumption of an ouster of the cotenant would undoubtedly arise and be a bar after that lapse of time to a recovery by the cotenant, or any other person through him of any portion of the land so held.

Rider v. Maul, 46 Pa. 380.

Open, notorious, and uninterrupted possession of the whole by a tenant in common for twenty-one years, claiming the whole land as his own, and taking the whole profits exclusively to himself, is evidence from which the jury may draw the conclusion of an ouster and an adverse possession.

Susquehanna & W. V. R. & Coal Co. v. Quick, 61 Pa. 341.

To complete a title, possession and the right of property must both concur.

Hawk v. Senseman, 6 Serg. & R. 22.

Jacob Byers has held this part of the farm from 1848; and for almost fifty years has exercised every act of ownership possible.

John H. Byers was permitted to go into this coal mine, because of his relationship and because he was to aid in keeping up repairs, and was permitted to dig coal for his own use, and to sell if you please. Was this such possession as would give him title? Was this done for the purpose of asserting title? Clearly not.

Altamas v. Campbell, 9 Watts, 28, 34 Am. Dec. 494; Shroder v. Brenman, 21 Pa. 228; DeHaven v. Landell, 31 Pa. 126.

Mitchell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties derived title in common, under the will of their father, in 1835. In 1895 appellant brought this action for partition of the coal only, thereby admitting that the surface of the land was held in severalty. The appellee defended on a parol partition claimed to have been made in 1848. Both parties therefore agreed that there was a partition, and, as it was admitted that there had never been any deed between them, the partition necessarily rested in parol. Appellant, however, claimed that what was done in 1848 was a temporary division of the surface for convenience of working only, which did not include the coal, and which was incomplete, but ripened into title in severalty as to the surface by the long-continued separate possession of the purpurs taken under it. Appellee, on the other hand, contended that it was a complete and executed partition from its date, and included the coal as well as the surface. The difference as to how the partition of the surface became effective, whether by virtue of the agreement itself, or only by the subsequent several possession, is not material; and the only substantial question in controversy was what the partition included, the whole land or the surface only. The learned judge below charged the jury that there could be no parol severance of the estate in the coal from the estate in the surface, and therefore, if they found there had been a partition at all, it was a partition of the whole; or, to use his very graphic expression, if the jury found that there was a parol partition, "the cleaver of the law severed the ownership from the surface clear down to the center of the earth." This was practically a direction to find for the defendant, and all the assignments of error, though taken to different parts of the charge, and in varied phrase, are based upon this ruling of the court. We are of opinion that it was error.

It was settled as early as Ebert v. Wood, 1 Binn. 216, 2 Am. Dec. 436, that a parol partition between tenants in common is valid and conclusive. Chief Justice Tilghman puts the decision mainly on the ground of part performance, which the English courts of equity had held to take such contracts out of the bar of the statute of frauds. But another and equally weighty reason might be added from the nature of tenancy in common. As each tenant has not only title, but joint and several possession of the whole and of every part, the change to a title in severalty in any specified part is not such a transfer of title to land as is within the mischief contemplated by the statute of frauds. This reason was indicated in Mellon v. Reed, 114 Pa. 647, and again more fully in McKnight v. Bell, 135 Pa. 358, where it is said by our late Brother Clark: "A partition which merely severs the relation existing between tenants in common in the undivided whole, and vests title to a correspondent part in severalty, is not such a sale or transfer of title as will be affected by the statute of frauds." The reason of this rule rests in this: that the partition is not an acquisition or purchase of land, nor is it in any proper sense a transfer of the title to land; it is a mere setting apart in severalty of the same interest held in common, not in other, but in the same, lands." The cases have drawn the line between a mere parol agreement to partition and an agreement followed by acts of the parties on the land itself, indicating several possession taken in execution of the agreement. The former is inoperative, but the latter is valid.

The right of partition by the parties is an incident of ownership, and, like the right of an owner in severalty to a lien, is only limited by such restraints as the law has put upon it in regard to personal capacity and mode of conveyance. The statute of frauds requires ordinary conveyances of land to be in writing, but, as we have already seen, the statute does not apply to executed partitions between tenants in common. They are therefore free, and, as they rest solely on the agreements and intentions of the owners, we see no room for distinctions in regard to the methods of partition, whether by vertical or by horizontal lines. There is no difference in the right nor in any other respect except in facility of proof of the intent, inasmuch as the ordinary mode is by vertical lines; and therefore such partition is more readily presumed, and acts done in pursuance of it on the surface are more easily shown. Horizontal divisions of land, as such, are comparatively rare, but they are well established, and may be made in the same way, and subject to the same rules, as any other mode, if the parties so agree. Their modern development, especially in this state, may well account for the absence of cases in our reports, but the principles on which such questions are to be decided do not admit of doubt. They are illustrated by the case of Caldwell v. Copeland, 37 Pa. 427, 78 Am. Dec. 436, where, although the court is treating of a conveyance by deed, it said: "There is no more reason why mines in another's land, whether opened or unopened, may not be held by a deed, . . . than why land in its most ordinary signification may not be so held. In other words, mines are land, and subject to the same laws of possession and conveyance." And the analogous right of severance of the strata of land horizontally by the individual owner by acts, as well as by deed, is established in Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Hughes, 133 Pa. 66, 38 L. R. A. 826 (opinion filed since this case was argued).

There was no objection to the plaintiff's proving, if he could, that the partition was limited to the service, and that the coal was left in common. The parties might make partition of all their land, or of any part of it, and in any manner they chose to agree upon. In Coleman v. Coleman, 19 Pa. 100, 57 Am. Dec. 641, the parties made partition of their land in 1787, excepting out of it the Cornwall ore banks, which they agreed should remain in common. This court held, not only that the partition was valid, but that the retention of the ore banks in common was part of the consideration for the purparts in severalty, and therefore could not be subject to a new partition."

The ordinary mode of partition being of the whole land by vertical lines, and it being admitted that a partition had been made, the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that it was limited to the surface. In plaintiff's sixth point he asked the court to say that his continuing to take coal after the partition, even if only permissive, showed that there never was a fully executed partition of the coal, and plaintiff therefore must recover on his written title. This point, however, could not have been affirmed. The execution of a parol partition, which is required by the cases, means such acts of the parties upon the land as show a part performance of the agreement, sufficient, as suggested by Chief Justice Tilghman, supra, to bring it within the equity of enforcement. The presumption from the conceded fact of partition was that it included the coal as well as the surface, that being the usual method. On the question whether it did or not, the plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury, but he had the burden of proof. An occasional use, such as was shown here, if the jury should find it to be permissive only, and not in the exercise of a right, would not prevent the partition from being executed in the legal sense, and including the coal as well as the surface. It was evidence of a claim of right, but not conclusive either of such right or of the failure to execute the partition.

The will of John Byers had no bearing on the case, except as showing that he had in his mind the timber, coal, and limestone on the tract as distinct elements to be considered in the equal division which he directed. But his devise was of the fee in common, and his devisees could divide in any way they pleased.

Nor had the statute of limitations any bearing on the case. The plaintiff clearly never had any possession of the coal which was either adverse or exclusive, and the surface, as already said, was admitted by both parties to be held in severalty. There was no dispute as to the parol partition, and the only contested issue was what it included. The jury should have been instructed that the parties had the right to make such partition as they chose, either of the whole land or of the surface only; that the presumption was that they parted the whole, but that presumption would give way to the intention of the parties; and it was for the jury to determine from all the evidence what the parties intended to include in the partition, and to find a verdict that would carry out that intention.

Judgment reversed, and venire de novo awarded.

Re Estate of Richard H. STULL, Deceased.

APPEAL OF Ada MOREHOUSE.

(188 Pa. 625.)

The marriage in another state, where it is lawful, of a divorced man and his paramour, who go there to evade the law of their domicile, which prohibits their marriage during the life of the former wife, is not valid in the latter state.

(McCollum, Mitchell, and Tell, JJ., dissent.)

(January 8, 1898.)

A PPEAL by petitioner from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Washington County dismissing her appeal from a decree of the register of wills refusing to grant her letters of administration upon the estate of Richard H. Stull, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Irwin, for appellant:

While it may be conceded that the state may pass an act which would prohibit citizens of the state from marrying anywhere under certain circumstances, while they were domiciled in this state, yet this is a highly penal statute, and must be strictly construed, and in the absence of an expressed statutory provision that the parties must not marry anywhere, the courts will hold that the legislative intent was that the parties should not marry in Pennsylvania.

It has been held, but on this point there is much conflict of opinion, that although a person divorced from a first wife for adultery is rendered by the law of the place incapable of contracting a second marriage, yet that, if he enters into a contract of marriage in another state where the same disability does not exist, the marriage will be valid. And where the parties resident in one state, to avoid the laws of the place of domicile, go to another state and are married, the marriage is held valid, if so regarded in the country where celebrated, both in America and England.

Contracts of all kinds, generally speaking, are to be determined and controlled in the rights and obligations conferred by the law of the place where they are to be performed.

Archer v. Dunn, 2 Watts & S. 327; Wood v. Kelso, 27 Pa. 241; 2 Parsons, Contr. pp. 582, 583, et seq.

As to contracts generally, in respect of private internal law, there must be capacity to make a contract; and incapacities are exceptional, and are either natural, such as absolute duress, insanity, or imbecility, or artificial because arising by force of local laws, from marriage or slavery, or such other causes as are made grounds of incapacity only by positive laws, which vary in different states.

2 Parsons, Contr. p. 578.

Laws establishing incapacity, status, or condition "have no force, of their own proper vigor, beyond the territory of the state by which they are made. Every state may, by its own laws, bind all its own subjects and citizens, wherever they may be, with all the obligations which home tribunals may enforce."

U. S. Const. art. 4, § 1; 2 Parsons, Contr. pp. 573, 574.

The law of the domicile of a party to a contract must have its effect in the matter of capacity or incapacity in a foreign state which may be the place where the contract is entered into or solemnized, and in giving control, in its rights and obligations, in the place of the domicile or elsewhere that the contract is to be performed.

Whart. Conf. L. § 401.

Marriage is a contract, but it is more. Properly speaking, it begins in a contract assented to with more or less solemnity, by both parties. It differs in many respects from the common run of contracts, which are to be performed and are then ended.

Story, Conf. L. ed. 1857, § 108; Ferguson, Mar. & Div. 397-399.

Marriage cannot be shaped or modified at the will of the parties. It is a conjugal union for life. Grafted conditions which change its character are void.

Whart. Conf. L. § 126.

Personal statutes, which are the statutes of a state that, in the main, have as their subject the person and its attributes, though incidentally touching matters of property, "attach themselves to each person therein domiciled; and, wherever he goes, these laws adhere to him, and are to be applied to him by every foreign tribunal, until such domicile is lost by him, and a new one acquired, which new one then applies itself to him by the same process."

Whart. Conf. L. § 85.

In a strict and legal sense, that is properly the domicile of a person where he has his true, fixed, permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning.

Story, Conf. L. § 41.

If it be the law of the domicile that when a married person commits adultery and a divorce is granted therefor, the guilty party and the corespondent are prohibited from marriage during the lifetime of the complainant, the effect of the decree shall be the same in all other countries.

Story, Conf. L. § 65; Whart. Conf. L. § 21.

This doctrine of the law of the domicile, as imposing a personal status of capacity or incapacity in the state of the domicile, is recognized and applied in other states, whenever not inconsistent with or opposed to their own laws and distinctive policy.

Story, Conf. L. § 29; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 519, 589, 10 L. ed. 274, 308.

Marriages are restrained and regulated, or prohibited, by the law of the domicile of the parties, by restraints or prohibitions which are to be divided into two classes: (1) Those relating to matters of form or ceremony, or peculiar religious faith, etc., or such as enlightened states generally do not feel themselves bound to recognize as of vital importance; (2) those relating to what are held to be, in the place of the domicile, matters of good order and good morals, or such matters as are made of a settled and distinctive policy therein.

By the express exception in favor of the children in our statute cases in our state like the present are to be distinguished from a few cases in our sister states, where marriages between like guilty parties, forbidden by statute, but without any statutory protection to children born, have been sustained for the benefit of innocent children, in order that they might inherit the property and rights of their guilty parents.

Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505; Medway v. Needham, 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131.

Here, the marriage of the parents is forbidden, made unlawful, without any exception as to them or either of them; and of course it follows that that prohibition, to be made effective, must mean that the thing prohibited is unlawful, if done.

Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703.

By the decree in the divorce proceeding, a personal incapacity for marriage was imposed by our statute upon Richard H. Stull and Ada Widdup, to continue during the lifetime of the first wife, who is still living. This incapacity, imposed by the law of their domicile, affected and followed them wherever they went, and so continued while they were temporarily in Maryland, and when they returned to Pennsylvania. Bound by the rules of private international law, and by the provision of the United States Constitution, that "full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state" (art. 4, § 1), this incapacity was of full effect in Maryland. With this known incapacity upon them, and going into Maryland for the purpose of evading the laws of Pennsylvania, the parties were guilty of a fraud upon the laws both of Pennsylvania and Maryland, when they sought to be and were married in the latter state, to return to the state of their home where the marriage was to be consummated and performed. The prohibition in the state of Pennsylvania, not relating to mere form or ceremony, but to the subject of good order, morals, and distinctive policy, it was invalid in Maryland as well as in Pennsylvania where its incidents are now sought to be enjoyed.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question at issue in this case arises upon the application of a woman, claiming to have been the lawful wife of the decedent at the time of his death, to have letters of administration upon his estate granted to her. The letters were refused by the register and orphans' court, on the ground that the petitioner was not the lawful wife of the decedent, and hence was not entitled to them. Briefly, the facts were that the decedent, Richard H. Stull, was married to Hannah M. Lewis, who still survives. In February, 1894, the wife obtained a decree of absolute divorce from him on the ground that he had committed adultery with one Ada Widdup. On April 5, 1894, the decedent and the said Ada Widdup, both being citizens and inhabitants of Pennsylvania went to Cumberland, in the state of Maryland, and were united in marriage. They at once returned to Pennsylvania, and there lived and cohabited as man and wife on the farm of the decedent, in Washington county, until his death, on June 11, 1895. They had no children, but there was one child, a son, Samuel A. Stull, by the first marriage. It was admitted and found in the court below, and is now conceded on the argument in this court, that the decedent and Ada Widdup, his paramour, with whom he had committed adultery, went into Maryland, to be there married, for the express purpose of evading the law of Pennsylvania which prohibits a marriage with a paramour during the life of the injured wife or husband. It is also conceded that by the law of Maryland there is no such prohibition, and that under that law the marriage was lawful. The question arising is, Was the applicant the lawful wife of the decedent at the time of his death? She subsequently married one Morehouse, and now bears his name.

Our act of March 13, 1815 (Purd. Dig. p. 688, pl. 29, § 91), provides as follows: "The wife or husband who shall have been guilty of the crime of adultery shall not marry the person with whom the said crime was committed during the life of the former wife or husband; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to or affect or render illegitimate any of the children born of the body of the wife during coverture." Section 10 disables a guilty wife, who after the divorce cohabits with her paramour, from alienating any of her lands and tenements, and avoids such conveyances if made. By the 9th section it will be perceived there is an absolute prohibition of any subsequent marriage between the guilty person and the paramour during the life of the former wife or husband. It forbids the marriage relation to be contracted in the most general terms. The guilty party "shall not marry the person with whom the said crime was committed." A personal incapacity to marry is imposed. The necessary meaning of this language is that they shall not marry at all, in any circumstances, or at any time, or any place, so long as the injured party is living. So far as the purpose and meaning of this statute are concerned, it is of no consequence where such subsequent prohibited marriage takes place. The relation itself is absolutely prohibited, and hence is within the operative words of the statute, without any reference as to where the marriage occurs.

It is now necessary to notice the other environments which affect the case. Both the parties to the prohibited marriage were citizens of Pennsylvania, domiciled on her territory, both before and after the marriage, and were only absent long enough to have the ceremony performed. They continued to reside together in Pennsylvania until the death of the husband. The woman resides here still. She never acquired any rights as an inhabitant of the state of Maryland, and can and does not now claim any right of that character. She is now claiming, not only the protection of our law, but a special privilege and right, accorded only to lawful wives under the intestate law of Pennsylvania, to wit, the right to have administration of the estate of her alleged husband. In this respect the case is different from many of the cases cited in the paper books, and the difference is against her claim. Here, she, being now and at all times a citizen of Pennsylvania, subject at all times to its laws and its policies, having committed a direct and positive violation of one of those laws, which relates to and immediately affects the very application she now makes, solicits a decree from an orphans' court of Pennsylvania, giving her property rights and a right of administration, on the specific ground that she acquired those rights, if she acquired them at all, in consequence of a violation of the law of Pennsylvania; and she asks this decree, as she only can ask it, by the importation and actual enforcement of the law of a foreign state, within our own territory, and in our own judicature, when that law is contrary to the express terms of our own law, and contrary to the manifest and settled policy of our commonwealth. Moreover, it is expressly conceded that the parties left the territory of Pennsylvania, and entered that of Maryland, for the very purpose of evading the law of Pennsylvania which prohibited their marriage. We do not think that any of the cases cited for the appellant contain so many elements of invalidity as this.

There is no question as to the general rule that a marriage which is valid by the law of the place where it is solemnized is valid everywhere. Of course, even this general rule has its exceptions, where the particular marriage is contrary to good morals or public policy, or to the positive statutes of the country where it is sought to be enforced. But where a man and woman, citizens of the same state, and subject to an absolute statutory prohibition against entering into a marriage contract which is against good morals and contrary to public policy, leave their domicile, and enter another, for the express purpose of violating the law of their domicile in this respect, the case is highly exceptional, and the great weight of authority is against the validity of such a marriage in the place of their domicile. There have been conflicting decisions upon the question, but very few of them sustain the validity of the relation where it has been assumed for an intended evasion of the law of the domicile and is contrary to good morals. The fact of such an intended evasion has been repeatedly recognized as the basis of invalidity when otherwise validity would have been declared. Thus, in a noted case in Tennessee (Pennegar v. State, 87 Tenn. 244, 2 L. R. A. 703), decided in 1889, the same question precisely as in this case was raised, to wit, a marriage in Alabama between a man and woman domiciled in Tennessee, who had been guilty of adultery, and, after a divorce had been obtained in Tennessee on that ground, the guilty husband and his paramour went to Alabama, and were married, and at once returned to Tennessee. They were indicted in Tennessee for lewdness, and were convicted and sentenced, and appealed to the supreme court, claiming that the marriage, being lawful in Alabama, must be held lawful in Tennessee. In the latter state the statute prohibited such marriages in almost the very words of our own act of 1815, to wit: "When a marriage is absolutely annulled, the parties shall be severally at liberty to marry again; but a defendant who has been guilty of adultery shall not marry the person with whom the crime was committed, during the life of the former husband or wife." In an elaborate opinion the supreme court sustained the sentence, and held the Alabama marriage to be void in Tennessee. In view of the close analogy of the case to the one we are considering, some citations from the opinion will be appropriate: "The marriage, being prohibited by statute, is void if solemnized in this state." "Does the rule that a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere make the second marriage in Alabama in this case valid?" 89 L. R. A.

"Marriage is an institution recognized and governed to a large degree by international law prevailing in all countries, and constituting an essential element in all earthly society. The well-being of society, as it concerns the relation of the sexes, the legitimacy of off-spring, and the disposition of property, alike demand that one state or nation shall recognize the validity of marriages had in other states or nations, according to the laws of the latter, unless some positive statute or pronounced public policy of the particular state demands otherwise." The opinion further holds that the rule that a marriage valid where solemnized is valid everywhere has its exceptions, to wit: "(1) Marriages which are deemed contrary to the law of nature, as generally recognized in Christian countries; (2) marriages which the local law-making power has declared shall not be allowed any validity either in express terms or by necessary implication. . . . This [second] class may be subdivided into two classes: (a) Where the statutory prohibition relates to form, ceremony, and qualification, it is held that compliance with the law of the place of marriage is sufficient, and its validity will be recognized, not only in other states generally, but in the state of domicile of the parties, even where they have left their own state to marry elsewhere for the purpose of avoiding the laws of their domicile. (b) Cases which, prohibited by statute, may or may not embody distinctive state policy as affecting the morals or good order of society. . . . Each state or nation has ultimately to determine for itself what statutory inhibitions are by it intended to be imperative, as indicative of the decided policy of the state concerning the morals and good order of society, to that degree which will render it proper to disregard the jus gentium, of 'valid where solemnized, valid everywhere.' . . . If, as we have seen, the statutory inhibition relates to matters of form or ceremony, and in some respects to qualification of the parties, the courts would hold such valid here; but if the statutory prohibition is expressive of a decided state policy, as a matter of morals, the courts must adjudge the marriage void here, as contra bonos mores. . . . Now, believing, as we do, that the statute in question, which we are called upon to construe in the case at bar, is expressive of a decided state policy, not to permit the sensibilities of the injured and innocent husband or wife, who has been driven by the adultery of his or her consort to the necessity of obtaining a divorce, to be wounded, or the public decency to be affronted, by being forced to witness the continued cohabitation of the adulterous pair, even under the guise of a subsequent marriage performed in another state for the purpose of evading our statute, and believing that the moral sense of the community is shocked and outraged by such an exhibition, we will not allow such parties to shield themselves behind a general rule of the law of marriage, the wisdom and perpetuity of which depend as much upon the judicious exceptions thereto as upon the inherent right of the rule itself." .

The foregoing reasoning is satisfactory to us. It invokes practically three distinct ideas, to wit: (1) That the foreign marriage is contrary to the positive statute of the domicile; (2) that it is contrary to the public policy of the government of the domicile, in that it offends against the prevailing sense of good morals among the people there dwelling; and (8) it was contracted for the express purpose of evading the positive law of the domicile and is therefore to be regarded as a fraud upon the government and people of the domiciliary residence. The combination of these three objections seems to be most fatal to the validity of the marriage thus contracted. The writer is disposed to regard each one of them as fatal. Instances of invalidity from each source in other matters than foreign marriages are not at all uncommon, but it is not necessary to pursue them in the books, as it would involve unnecessary labor and space. There is abundant authority for their application in the marriage cases. Perhaps the most conspicuous case of the effect of mere statutory prohibition is the Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 85, which prohibited any marriage of any descendant of King George II. without the previous consent of the King. A marriage having been contracted at Rome between a son of George II. and a lady who was a British subject, without the royal consent, a question arose as to the validity of this marriage, which was submitted to the judges of the House of Lords. Chief Justice Tindal, delivering the opinion, said: "The statute [in question] does not enact an incapacity to contract matrimony within one particular country and district or another, but to contract matrimony generally, and in the abstract. It is an incapacity attaching to the person of A. B., which he carries with him wherever he goes. But as a marriage once duly contracted in any country will be a valid marriage all the world over, the incapacity to contract a marriage at Rome is as clearly within the prohibitory words of the statute as the incapacity to contract in England. . . . The prohibitory words of it [the statute] are general: 'That no one of the persons therein described shall be capable of contracting matrimony.'" "Here, again," said the chief justice, "the words employed are general, or, more properly, universal; and cannot be satisfied in their plain, literal, ordinary meaning, unless they are held to extend to all marriages, in whatever part of the world they may have been contracted or celebrated. . . .

It is . . . certain that an act of the legislature will bind the subjects of this realm, both within the Kingdom and without, if such was its intention." Lord Campbell said: "I have no doubt that it is competent to the British legislature to pass a law making invalid the marriage of particular British subjects all over the world; . . . and I am clearly of opinion that the intention is sufficiently testified by the language which has been employed." While the words used in this British statute related only to particular persons, they were specific in prohibiting any marriage between such persons, and for that reason it was held that the prohibition was general, and applied to any marriage, no matter where it was contracted. The same principle applies, as we have heretofore indicated, to the prohibition in the case at bar. It applies to any marriage, no matter where it may be celebrated, and as the parties were, and continued to be, citizens of Pennsylvania, it applied to them. In Brook v. Brook, 9 H. L. Cas. 212, another celebrated English case, where a man had married his deceased wife's sister, contrary to a British statute, the parties having gone to Denmark for that purpose, where such marriages were lawful, Lord Chancellor Campbell said: "It is quite obvious that no civilized state can allow its domiciled subjects or citizens, by making a temporary visit to a foreign country, to enter into a contract to be performed in the place of domicile if the contract is forbidden by the law of the place of domicile as contrary to the law of religion, or morality, or to any of its fundamental institutions." And, again: "If a marriage is absolutely prohibited in any country as being contrary to public policy, and leading to social evils, I think that the domiciled inhabitants of that country cannot be permitted, by passing the frontier and entering another state in which this marriage is not prohibited, to celebrate a marriage forbidden by their own state, and, immediately returning to their own state, to insist on their marriage being recognized as lawful." Upon the foregoing authorities, there is no doubt as to what the law is in England on this subject. It seems to us that these decisions are founded upon impregnable reasoning, which cannot be answered; and these decisions apply with the greatest possible force to the case in hand, for in those cases the statutes did not prohibit marriages involving immoral considerations, but here where the subsequent marriage is a sort of reward for the prior adulterous intercourse, and the subsequent cohabitation is distinctly offensive to all good citizens, the conclusion of invalidity is immensely strengthened by considerations of the greatest force.

In North Carolina, in the case of Williams v. Oates, 27 N. C. 535, involving the same principle and almost the same facts, a similar decision was reached as in the Tennessee case supra. A husband and wife domiciled in North Carolina were divorced for the wife's adultery. Afterwards the wife and a man (a third person), both also so domiciled, to evade the law of North Carolina, which prohibited her from marrying again, went into South Carolina, and were there married, according to the law of that state, and immediately returned to North Carolina, where they lived together as man and wife until the husband died, intestate. It was held that the second wife was not the lawful widow of the deceased, and was not entitled to an interest in his estate, the law of the domicile controlling the relation. In Marshall v. Marshall, 2 Hun, 288, decided in 1874, the facts were that the plaintiff, Marshall, in 1858, was divorced from his then wife on the ground of his adultery. The parties to the divorce were then domiciled in New York. In 1866 the husband and another woman, both then residing in New York, went to Philadelphia, to be married there, intending to return immediately to New York. They were married in Philadelphia, the first wife still living, and returned to New York, as intended. It was held that the second marriage was absolutely void, on the ground that "if citizens leave their own country and contract a marriage abroad, such marriage being forbidden by the law of the country of their residence, but allowed by the law of the country where it is contracted, and being celebrated with an intent to resume, and followed by an actual resumption of, their old residence, the validity of the contract is to be determined by the law of the domicile." It is true that this case was afterwards overruled in the case of Van Voorhis v. Brintnall, 86 N. Y. 18, 40 Am. Rep. 505, decided in 1881; but, as neither of the decisions is binding upon us, we much prefer the ruling in Marshall v. Marshall. It is also true that in Medway v. Needham (1819) 16 Mass. 157, 8 Am. Dec. 131, a contrary decision was made, in the case of a marriage between a mulatto and a white woman, which was solemnized in Rhode Island, where it was not unlawful. It was held valid in Massachusetts, where such marriages were prohibited although the parties were domiciled in Massachusetts, and immediately returned there. The marriage was not questioned because it was contrary to good morals, but only because it was contrary to the words of the Massachusetts statute. The decision, however, expressly excepted the case of incestuous marriages or others that "would tend to outrage the principles and feelings of all civilized nations," and hence is of scarcely any weight in the present contention. It was followed with reluctance in Putnam v. Putnam, 8 Pick. 433, but it was held to be doubtful of application in West Cambridge v. Lexington, 1 Pick. 506, 11 Am. Dec. 231, if the husband had come into Massachusetts to claim any marital rights, "upon the ground that the marriage on which he founded his claim was contracted in violation of the laws of this state, and that it was contrary to good policy, as well as detrimental to the public manners, that he should be allowed to enforce such claim."

It is proper to observe that the leading writers on the "Conflict of Laws" express the same conclusions as embodying the latest and best considered doctrine upon this subject. Thus, in Story, Conf. L. § 86, it is said: "But we are not, therefore, to conclude that every marriage by and between British subjects in foreign countries will be held valid, because it is celebrated according to the laws of such countries. On the contrary, where the laws of England create a personal incapacity to contract marriage, that incapacity has, in some cases, been held to have a universal operation, so as to make a subsequent marriage in a foreign country a mere nullity when litigated in a British court." Section 87: "Indeed, the general principle adopted in England in regard to cases of this sort appears to be, that the lex loci contractus shall be permitted to prevail, unless when it works some manifest injustice, or is contra bonos mores or is repugnant to the settled principles and policy of its own laws."

In § 112, quoting from Lord Robertson in Ferguson, Mar. & Div. 397-399, it is said: "But a party who is domiciled here cannot be permitted to import into this country a law peculiar to his own case, and which is in opposition to those great and important public laws which our legislature has held to be essentially connected with the best interests of society." In a footnote to § 116a, the author quotes from 1 Burge, Col. Laws, pp. 188-191, as follows: "The law which prohibits persons related to each other in a certain degree from intermarrying, and declares their intermarriage to be null, imposes on them a personal incapacity quoad that act; and that incapacity must continue to affect them so long as they retain their domicile in the country in which that law prevails. The resort to another country where there was no such prohibitory law, for the mere purpose of evading the law of their own country, and with the intention of returning thither when their marriage had taken place, cannot be considered a change of their former domicile or the acquisition of a domicile in the country to which they had resorted. They must therefore be regarded as still subject to the personal incapacity imposed by the law of their real domicile." In Wharton, Conf. L. § 159, the writer says: "But when persons domiciled in a state where these prohibitions are in force are married without domicile, in violation of such prohibitions, in a state where there is no opposing legislation, the parties visiting the latter state for this purpose, will the former state recognize the validity of the marriage? The first point for the court of such a state to determine, on such an issue, is whether the prohibition of such marriages is part of the distinctive policy of the state. If so, the court, acting on the reasoning already given, must hold that persons domiciled in such state cannot evade its law by going to another state and then returning to live in the home state in a union that state condemns. And so it has been ruled on several occasions."—citing Kinney v. Com. 30 Gratt. 858, 32 Am. Rep. 690; Williams v. Oates, 5 Ired. L. 538; State v. Kennedy, 76 N. C. 251, 22 Am. Rep. 680; Scott v. State, 39 Ga. 321; Dupre v. Boulard, 10 La. Ann. 411.

Upon the whole case, we consider that the weight of authority is against the validity of the marriage we are now considering; and, upon well-settled principles, we are convinced that it should not be sustained.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, and the appeal is dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

BRITISH AMERICA ASSURANCE COMPANY, Appl.,

v.

George E. MILLER.

(.....Tex.....)

Insurance on wearing apparel, jewelry, satchels, trunks, books, etc., "while contained in" a specified building, does not cover the property when located at another place where the insured was temporarily staying with his family, although the insurance agent knew of his habit of taking his family periodically to such place for a temporary stay.

QUESTIONS certified by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second Supreme Judicial District arising upon an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on an insurance policy. Answers favorable to defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William Thompson and R. S. Baker for appellant.

Messrs. Carrigan & Montgomery and Theodore Mack, for appellee:

The written portions of an insurance policy will overcome the printed portions of the policy.

Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Jacobs, 56 Tex. 369.

Where there is a general and particular description of the property, the particular description will control.

Words descriptive of location might, as to one class of property, or as to one kind of insurance, be treated as a statement of fact, relating to the risk, and as amounting to a stipulation or condition that the property should remain there; while as to another class of property, or as to other kinds of insurance, it might be construed as mere description for the purpose of identification.

DeGraff v. Queen Ins. Co. 38 Minn. 501.

The language being selected and used by the insurer to express the terms and conditions upon which it issued, the policy will be strictly construed against it and liberally in favor of the insured.

Brown v. Palatine Ins. Co. 89 Tex. 590.

The language used must be construed according to the evident intent of the parties, to be derived from the words used, the subject-matter to which they relate, and the matters naturally or usually incident thereto.

Brown v. Palatine Ins. Co. 89 Tex. 590.

Forfeitures are not favored in law; and if the language used is fairly susceptible of an interpretation which will prevent a forfeiture, it will be so construed.

Brown v. Palatine Ins. Co. 89 Tex. 590.

Every doubt arising from the terms of the instrument (insurance policy) must be resolved against the insurer.

Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 87 Tex. 552, 29 L. R. A. 706.

The court will not imply anything in favor of a forfeiture, but must try the matter by the language used by the parties.

Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 87 Tex. 552, 29 L. R. A. 706.

If the conditions or warranties be repugnant to the portions of the policy describing the subject of insurance, the condition must yield to that portion which expresses the terms of liability.

Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 87 Tex. 552, 29 L. R. A. 706.

A stipulation which is not upon penalty of forfeiture of rights under the policy, in event of failure to perform the same, will not render void the policy for failure to perform the stipulation.

May, Ins. 156, 157; Eakin v. Home Ins. Co. 1 White & Willson Tex. App. Civ. Cas. § 870.

A distinction is taken between property described as contained in a certain locality in the sense of being absolutely maintained or stored in one place, in which case its removal is not contemplated, and property which from its very nature must be constantly removed.

1 Biddle, Ins. § 641.

Insurance on wearing apparel subjects the insurer to liability if destroyed while in its ordinary use elsewhere than in the locus described.

1 Biddle, Ins. § 641.

The stipulation "all while contained in the above-described building," if entitled to be construed as a warranty, and not a representation, should only be considered as warranting the then present condition of the property, and not as a promissory warranty that it will be continued to be devoted to the same use.

East Texas F. Ins. Co. v. Kempner, 87 Tex. 286, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 538.

If the company desired to make its liability contingent upon the goods insured remaining in the dwelling house of appellee, it must have so expressed its desire by apt words.

Burlington Ins. Co. v. Brockway, 188 Ill. 644.

The language of the policy being the language of the underwriters, if susceptible of two interpretations, that must be adopted which will sustain the claim of the assured, and give him the indemnity it was his object to secure.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court of civil appeals for the second supreme judicial district has certified to this court the following statement and question: "We deem it advisable, both parties consenting, to certify to your honors for decision the controlling, if not the sole, question in this case, which, briefly, is whether, upon the agreed statement below, the terms of the fire insurance policy declared on by appellee covered the loss sustained by him during the life of the policy in a fire at Henrietta, Texas, which not only destroyed the residence of one Fraser, where appellee and his family were temporarily boarding during a term of the district court then being held by appellee, who was the then regular judge of said court, and which was known to appellant at the time of the issuance of the policy, but also $840 worth of 'trunks, satchels, . . . family wearing apparel, . . . watches, jewels, and jewelry in use,' belonging to appellee, and then in ordinary use by himself and family; the policy having been issued to him in Wichita Falls, Texas, the place of his residence, covering all loss or damage by fire to his dwelling house, there situated, as described in the policy; which policy, in the printed part, contained these words: 'While located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere;' and the printed slip attached to said policy by the agent, and describing the property insured, expressly mentioned 'trunks, satchels, . . . family wearing apparel, . . . watches, . . . jewels, and jewelry in use,' etc., 'all while contained in the above-described building;' and at the bottom of said slip is written and printed: "This form is attached to and constitutes the written and descriptive portion of policy No. 922,657 of the British America Assurance Company of Toronto." "

The following is a condensed statement of the facts material for the decision of the question certified to us: Appellee, George E. Miller, was, on the 26th day of January, 1896, and still is, judge of the thirtieth judicial district of the state of Texas, which embraces the counties of Wichita, Clay, Archer, and Young. Judge Miller resided at Wichita Falls, in Wichita county, and owned a residence in that city, located as described in the policy of insurance sued on; and in which residence he resided with his family, which consisted of a wife and two children, respectively six and three years old. In the discharge of his official duties, Judge Miller held court twice in each year in the counties above named, at which times he carried his family with him; which facts were known to the agents of the appellant at the time that the policy of insurance sued upon was issued, but the agents did not know the length of time that the family remained with him at each term of the court. Anderson, Moore, & Bean were empowered to make contracts for the appellant, the British America Assurance Company, insuring property situated in Wichita Falls against loss from fire, but were not authorized to insure property situated elsewhere. On the 26th of January, 1896, Anderson, Moore, & Bean, as agents for the British America Assurance Company, made and delivered to George E. Miller a policy of insurance, from which we make the following extracts: "British America Assurance Company, Toronto, Canada. In consideration of the stipulations herein named and of twenty eight and $\frac{1}{2}$ dollars premium, does insure Hon. George E. Miller for the term of one year from the 26th day of January, 1896, at noon, to the 26th day of January, 1897, at noon, against all direct loss or damage by fire, except as hereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding two thousand and ninety and no $\frac{1}{100}$ dollars, to the following described property while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere, to wit: . . . \$850 on his household and kitchen furniture, useful and ornamental, beds, bedding, linen, carpets, plate and plated ware, china, glass, and crockery ware, trunks, satchels, sewing machines, family wearing apparel, fuel and family supplies; also on musical instruments, printed books and music, mirrors, pictures, paintings, engravings, and their frames, statuary, bric-a-brac, watches, jewels, and jewelry in use; in case of loss none to be valued at exceeding cost; all while contained in the above-described building."

On the 7th day of October, 1896, Judge Miller was holding a regular term of the district court at Henrietta, in Clay county, and had with him his wife and children. They were boarding at the house of J. A. Fraser, at which place Judge Miller and his wife had with them for the use of themselves and their children, the property which was burned by fire, and which was a part of the personal property described in the policy of insurance in the clause above quoted and consisted of wearing apparel, jewelry, satchels, trunks, books, etc., which property was usually contained in the residence of Judge Miller at Wichita Falls when he and his family were at home. At 2:30 P. M. on the said day a fire occurred at the house of Fraser, by which the wearing apparel, jewelry, etc., belonging to Judge Miller was damaged and destroyed to the value of $840. There is no dispute of the claim of Judge Miller upon any ground except that which is embraced in the question agreed upon by the parties, which is as follows: "The issue to be determined under the above facts is whether or not defendant is liable to plaintiff under the policy; the loss having occurred in Henrietta, Texas. Defendant claims that its policy under the facts limits its liability to losses which may occur to the property while the same is located and contained in the residence described in the policy. Plaintiff claims that the policy covers the loss at Henrietta under the facts above recited." To the question propounded we answer that the property which was destroyed by fire at the city of Henrietta was not covered by the policy of insurance described in the statement submitted with the question, and the insurance company was not liable for such loss.

While it is true that courts will construe the language of an insurance policy, and especially a clause of forfeiture contained therein, most strongly against the insurer, and in such manner as to protect the insured, if the language used is susceptible of such construction, it is likewise true that, when a party dealing with an insurance company has made a contract which is unambiguous in its terms, courts will construe and enforce it in the same way as if made between natural persons. A number of cases have been cited which construe the language "contained in" as being descriptive of the place at which the property is located at the time the insurance is obtained and others in which courts have held that such language must be construed with reference to the use of the property insured,—that is, if its ordinary use causes it to be absent from such place; and if, being so absent from the place mentioned, it is destroyed by fire, the property is nevertheless protected by the policy, and the insurance companies have been held to be liable therefor. McCluer v. Girard F. & M. Ins. Co. 48 Iowa, 349, 22 Am. Rep. 249; American Cent. Ins. Co. v. Haus (Pa.) 11 Atl. 107; Mills v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 37 Iowa, 400. But in the cases above referred to the terms of the policies were less definite than is the one now before the court. In the policy under consideration the property is insured "while located and contained as described herein, and not elsewhere," and in connection with the clause which describes the property which was destroyed by fire this language is used: "All while contained in the above-described building,"—showing that the property was not insured while out of the house. It is claimed by the appellee that this case comes within the rule laid down in Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. 37 Tex. 547, 29 L. R. A. 706, and that the language used must be construed with reference to the ordinary use of the property insured. In the case of Bills v. Hibernia Ins. Co. the language under construction (a clause of forfeiture) did not, in its terms, embrace some of the articles that were afterwards destroyed, which were embraced in the contract part of the policy; and in discussing the effect of the forfeiture clause this court said: "If the conditions of warranties be repugnant to the portions of the policy describing the subject of insurance, the condition must yield to that portion which expresses the terms of liability; as if, for instance, the body of the policy grants insurance upon a stock, such as is usually carried in a 'country store,' or such as is usually carried in a 'retail store,' and the conditions prescribing that the carrying in the stock certain articles named as extrahazardous will cause a forfeiture of the policy, and it appears from the evidence that the articles expressly named are usually carried in such stock and embraced in the terms of a policy describing the subject, the clause of forfeiture must yield to the language of the body of the policy and the forfeiture will not be enforced." This simply states the rule that, when there is a conflict, the contracting party of the policy will prevail over clauses of forfeiture. In other words, the court will not hold that the insurance company did not intend to insure that which it expressly contracted to insure; on the other hand, courts will not so construe plain language as to make a contract embrace that which it was intended not to include. It is insisted by the appellee that in the ordinary use of wearing apparel, jewelry, trunks, satchels, and the like, they would at times be absent from the residence of the owner, and that the agent of the insurance companies knew that the assured was in the habit of taking his family with him to the different places where he held terms of the district court in his district, and must have known that such things are generally used on such occasions; therefore the policy must be construed with reference to such general and known uses by the assured, and that the case comes within the line of authorities cited by the appellee to the effect that property thus used will be protected when absent from the house by a policy in which it is described as being "contained" in a certain house. However, in this policy, the insurance company so definitely and unequivocally expresses a contract by which it is not bound for the loss of the property when absent from the named place that there is no room for construction. The protection afforded by the policy is expressly limited to the time that the subject of insurance shall be contained in the house described, and whenever it was taken therefrom it was removed beyond the protection of the contract. Green v. Liverpool & L. & G. Ins. Co. 91 Iowa, 615; Mawhinney v. Southern Ins. Co. 98 Cal. 184, 20 L. R. A. 87; Haus v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co. 130 Pa. 118, 2 L. R. A. 52.

The policy was not forfeited by the removal but remained in force, and covered the property when returned to the residence in Wichita Falls; hence the rule that demands a construction which would prevent a forfeiture has no application. The insurance company knowing that the class of property embraced in the policy was liable to be removed to other places provided against liability for it when located at such other points by the express and plalimitations. The appellee likewise knew that in the ordinary use of the property embraced in the contract of insurance it would be carried to other places than his residence in Wichita Falls whereby it would be voluntarily withdrawn from the protection afforded by the contract of insurance, and if he desired to have it protected while using it away from home, he could have made a contract expressing such liability on the part of the insurance company.

1. An order quashing a summons is appealable under a statute permitting appeals from orders terminating the action or proceeding.
2. In the absence of proper exceptions to a finding on a mixed question of law and fact, the only question is whether the findings of fact warrant the conclusions of law.
3. Serving process on an officer of a foreign corporation which had no place of business in the state and had never done any business therein, when he was present only casually and temporarily in the state, is not sufficient to give jurisdiction to render a judgment in personam against the corporation.

(January 10, 1898.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for King County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover a balance alleged to be due for goods sold and delivered. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James Kiefer, for appellant:

If a foreign corporation makes a contract within the state with a resident, and sends some of its officers, upon whom service may lawfully be made, to transact business within the state, and service be made upon such officer, the jurisdiction is complete.

No corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to transact business within the state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state.

Const. art. 12, § 7.

Failure to maintain an office in this state, or to appoint a statutory agent as required by our statute in that respect, is no bar to the right of such foreign corporation to maintain an action in our courts against any of the citizens or residents of the state.

Foreign corporations making contracts within the state are liable to be sued in the courts of the state upon such contracts, and service upon any officer of the corporation in the state which would be good if made upon a domestic corporation, should be held to be good against such foreign corporation.

NOTE.—As to the person on whom process against a foreign corporation may be served, see note to Foster v. Charles Betcher Lumber Co. (S. D.) 23 L. R. A. 490.

Appellant, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Washington, and engaged in dealing in shingles and other lumber products, in the course of its business furnished to the respondent at its office in Kansas City, Missouri, price lists of these articles. Respondent wrote and telegraphed from time to time to appellant at its office in Seattle sundry orders for carloads of shingles. Appellant accepted these orders and deposited letters of acceptance in the postoffice at Seattle, and delivered the goods to carriers at Seattle, consigned to the defendant. This constituted a contract made in the state of Washington.

The contract having been made in the state of Washington, defendant, a foreign corporation, must be held to have submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the courts of the state when properly summoned according to the statute regulating service of process on corporations.

Messrs. Donworth & Howe, for respondent:

An order quashing the service of summons does not fall within the statute. To make an order appealable three things must concur: (1) the order must affect a substantial right; (2) it must in effect determine the action; and (3) it must prevent a final judgment. Certainly the order quashing the service of summons did not determine the action. Neither did it prevent a final judgment therein.

A general exception to all the findings, such as appears in this case, is not sufficient for any purpose.

Ballard v. Keane, 18 Wash. 201; Hannegan v. Roth, 12 Wash. 65; Irwin v. Olympia Waterworks, 12 Wash. 112.

Where appellant claims certain facts to be established by the evidence, he must request the trial court to find such facts; otherwise he cannot urge such alleged facts on appeal.

Davis v. Ford, 15 Wash. 107; Forrest v. Gilchrist, 14 Wash. 4.

The same rule applies where no findings of fact were made other than those incorporated in the decree or order appealed from.

Conclusions of law made by the lower court cannot be reviewed unless duly excepted to.

Laws of 1898, § 3, p. 112; Elliott, App. Proc. § 793, and cases cited.

Service of process upon an officer or agent of a foreign corporation, casually or temporarily found within the jurisdiction, whether upon his own business or otherwise, will not give jurisdiction to render a judgment in personam against the corporation.

S. 98, 34 L. ed. 608.

As there has been no attachment of property in the case at bar, the action is purely one in personam, and therefore a judgment rendered against the defendant in this action would be without force.

The conduct of the plaintiff in inducing Mr. Leidigh to believe that an amicable adjustment of the account between appellant and respondent would be made with him, and then attempting to serve him with process the moment appellant found him within reach, without beginning negotiations for an adjustment, would be an additional reason for quashing the service.

Fitzgerald & M. Constr. Co. v. Fitzgerald, 137 U. S. 98, 34 L. ed. 608.

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought by the plaintiff, a corporation under the laws of the state of Washington, to recover a balance of $910.48 for goods sold and delivered to the defendant, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri. Service was had upon the president of the defendant corporation in King county. The defendant appeared specially, and moved the court to set aside and quash the service of summons, and in support of its motion filed the affidavit of John H. Leidigh, the president of the defendant corporation, showing that he was not a resident of the state of Washington; that on the 29th day of January, 1897, he came to the state of Washington, arriving at Seattle on February 2, and was served with summons by the appellant in this action on the following morning. Affidavits and counter-affidavits were filed, the case was tried upon said affidavits, and a judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, declaring the service of the summons to be void.

It is contended by the respondent in its motion to dismiss that this is not an appealable order; but, whatever might be said concerning an order refusing to quash a summons, we think it is evident that an order quashing a summons in effect determines the action or proceeding, and is therefore appealable, under the statute.

It is objected also by the respondent that no proper exceptions were taken in the lower court to any of the findings of fact or conclusions of law made by the court, and we think this objection well taken. This case was tried as a mixed question of law and fact, and tried exclusively upon the affidavits which were considered by the court, and the court made its findings of fact and its conclusions of law in regular form. The findings of fact not having been excepted to under the rulings of this court in Rice v. Stevens, 9 Wash. 298, Hannegan v. Roth, 12 Wash. 65, and many subsequent cases, the only question for this court to determine is, Do the findings of fact warrant the conclusions of law? The court found that the defendant was a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Missouri; that it had never appointed or had any agent residing in the state of Washington for any purpose whatever; had never done or carried on any business whatever in the state of Washington; had never had any property within the state of Washington; had never had an office for the transaction of business in any county in the state of Washington; and that it did not at any time have any officer or agent residing in any county in the state of Washington upon whom process might be served against said defendant company, or any officer or agent whatever of said defendant company. The appellant has based its argument so entirely upon the matters and things set up in the affidavits that it is of very little value to this court in determining the law governing this case, for, if we were to consider the affidavits, we might conclude that the transaction or sale had been made in the state of Washington; but the finding of the court is that the defendant has never done or carried on any business whatever in the state of Washington, and that John H. Leidigh, to whom a copy of summons and complaint were delivered, was at said time only casually and temporarily in the state of Washington, and has since departed therefrom; so that the argument of appellant made on the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th pages of its brief, in relation to the purpose for which Mr. Leidigh came to this state and the capacity in which he was acting, is not in point in the discussion of this case. We think, from an investigation of the cases cited by the appellant, that it has confused the idea of jurisdiction of states over foreign corporations with the idea of a proper service. It is not questioned by any of the cases that we have seen, that where a summons has been served upon an officer of a corporation for whose acts the corporation is bound, where the statute provided for a legal service on such agents or parties, the jurisdiction of the state court over foreign corporations attached. But in this case it does not appear to us that service was made under the statute or in any other way that has ever been maintained by any court, viz., by serving an officer of the foreign corporation which had no place of business in the state, and which had never done any business in the state, such officer being simply temporarily present in the state. And most of the cases cited by appellant, as we before indicated, are cases simply sustaining jurisdiction under statutes which provided for legal service. It is true that in Hiller v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 70 N. Y. 223, a service upon a director of a foreign corporation in the state of New York, while he was there temporarily on his own business, was a good service and a sufficient commencement of the action, although defendant had no property in that state, but in that case it was determined by the court that the contract was made in the state of New York. There the plaintiff had made a contract to enter defendant's service for a term of years, his business being to procure emigrants to purchase and settle on defendant's lands in Nebraska. Plaintiff was bound, under the contract, to maintain during the whole time an office in the city of New York; and was to go to Europe for two or three months to arrange for emigration, and, in accordance with said contract, opened and kept open in the city of New York the office, until the contract was terminated by the defendant. In that case the court very properly held that in an action for services under the contract, and for damages under the breach, it was to be assumed that the parties understood that plaintiff's principal duties under the contract would be discharged in New York city, and that, therefore, the cause of action arose within that state. Substantially the same doctrine was announced in Pope v. Terre Haute Car & Mfg. Co. 87 N. Y. 137. But the court in those cases was construing a statute vastly different from our statute, and maintained the doctrine that the manner of service depended entirely upon the legislature. These cases, however, stand alone, so far as the announcement of the doctrine is concerned that the service on the officer of a foreign corporation who is temporarily in the state is a good service, with the possible exception of Klopp v. Creston City Guarantee 89 L. R. A.

Waterworks Co. [34 Neb. 808], a Nebraska case; though this case is not in point here, for the reason that the statute of Nebraska was entirely different from our statute, and for the further reason that it was conceded in that case that the debt was contracted in Nebraska, while the finding of the court in this case is to the contrary, and, even if we should consider the complaint, there is nothing there that would indicate that the debt had been contracted in this state. The doctrine announced by the New York cases has not been followed by the Federal courts. See Bentley v. London & C. Finance Corp. 44 Fed. Rep. 667.

The contention of the appellant that § 7 of art. 12 of the Constitution, which provides that "no corporation organized outside the limits of this state shall be allowed to transact business within the state on more favorable conditions than are prescribed by law to similar corporations organized under the laws of this state," will be invaded if this judgment is maintained, has no force, from the fact that it appears from the findings of the court that the defendant corporation here is not transacting business within the state under any condition whatever. Mr. Thompson, in his work on Corporations (vol. 6, § 8030), lays down the rule governing this case as follows: "It is a principle of American law, firmly settled, and one which may be regarded as the law everywhere, except where changed by statute, that service of process upon an officer or agent of a foreign corporation, casually or temporarily found within the jurisdiction, whether upon his own business or otherwise, will not give jurisdiction to render a judgment in personam against the corporation. It can make no difference, in respect of the operation of this principle, whether the officer is casually or temporarily within the jurisdiction for his own private purposes, or for the purposes of the corporation,—always provided that the local statute law has not changed the practice." And the cases cited by the author overwhelmingly support the principle therein announced. In fact, not only the weight of authority, but all the authority that we have been able to find, outside of the New York and Nebraska cases above mentioned, sustains this text. The cases are reviewed in 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1st ed. p. 384.

Under the circumstances of this case, then, as shown by the findings of fact, the judgment of the lower court must be sustained, and it is affirmed.

Scott, Ch. J., and Gordon and Reavis, JJ., concur. Anders, J., concurs in the result.

Rehearing denied.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

City of St. LOUIS, Plff. in Err.,EDWARD HEITZBERG PACKING & PROVISION COMPANY.

(.....Mo.....)

1. General power of a city to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances does not include the power to declare that a nuisance which is not so in fact.
2. An ordinance declaring the emission of dense black or thick gray smoke to be a nuisance, without any limitation as to the length of time it is emitted or as to whether it is in fact a nuisance or not, and without providing for any inquiry as to these matters, is not within the general power of a city to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances.

NOTE.—Municipal control over smoke as a public nuisance.

The general rules governing the question of municipal control over nuisances in general will be found discussed in note to Grossman v. Oakland (Or.) 38 L. R. A. 593.

The power of municipalities over buildings and other structures as nuisances forms the subject of the note to Evansville v. Miller (Ind.) 39 L. R. A. 151.

Upon the question of municipal control over nuisances affecting safety, health, and personal comfort, see note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

The note to Ex parte Lacey (Cal.) 38 L. R. A. 540, discusses the question of municipal power over nuisances in relation to particular trades or businesses.

The subject of municipal control over nuisances affecting highways and waters will be found in note to Hagerstown v. Whitmer, — L. R. A. —.

Upon the question of municipal power over nuisances affecting public morals, decency, peace, and good order, see State v. Karstendiek, ante 520.

The questions of prescription as affecting a public nuisance, and the power of municipal authorities to proceed in equity in abating nuisances, will form separate notes.

The principal case, ST. LOUIS V. EDWARD HEITZBERG PACKING & PROVISION CO., holds that smoke is not a nuisance per se, and is not therefore within the power of the municipal authorities who cannot declare anything a nuisance which is not one.

It may be taken as a settled principle that filling the air around a dwelling house with dense smoke and soot or cinders, or with noxious or offensive vapors or odors or annoying noises, to such a degree as will render living in the house uncomfortable to persons of ordinary sensitiveness on those matters, is a nuisance, and an unlawful injury entitling the person so injured or affected to redress. The question, however, for determination in this note is not as to how and under what circumstances the party injured will be entitled to relief as against such nuisances, but as to the power of a municipal corporation to interfere in such cases, and as to how such nuisances are public in their character so as to call forth the intervention of the municipal authorities, and to the consideration of the latter questions the note is therefore confined.

Coal smoke in large and densely populated cities is productive of much injury to property and annoyance to the inhabitants, while it is not attended with that result in country towns and villages; and it is for this reason that the law treats the subject of an act or ordinance regulating and compelling

3. All valid ordinances must fix the duty and liability of the citizen by certain intelligible, prescribed rules by which he may govern himself without being subject to an unregulated official discretion.

(November 13, 1897.)

ERROR to the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the penalty for violating the ordinance against smoke nuisance. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William C. Marshall and Eugene McQuillin, for plaintiff in error:

The declaration by the ordinance that "the emission into the open air of dense black or thick gray smoke within the corporate limits ling the consumption of smoke emitted by the burning of coal as a nuisance in cities, and confers on them power to regulate and suppress it within their corporate limits. Cincinnati v. Miller, 29 Ohio L. J. 364, 365.

Anything that is detrimental to certain classes of property and business in a densely populated city,—such as dense smoke,—and is a personal annoyance to the public at large within the city, need not be defined by ordinance to be known to the common mind as a public nuisance, as smoke of that character is a nuisance per se when emitted from chimneys and smoke stacks in the midst of such a city, whether it is so declared by ordinance or not. Cincinnati v. Miller, 29 Ohio L. J. 364, 365; Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 693.

In upholding a smoke ordinance of the city of Chicago valid, the court, in Feld v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410, 411, stated that it was matter of common knowledge that smoke becomes soot which falls and blackens where it rests, that it is injurious to vegetation, to many kinds of goods, and annoying to people, and that such common knowledge was so generally diffused in the city that no jury could be without it.

Yet, unless dense smoke is a nuisance in fact the mere act of declaring it to be a public nuisance will not make it such, but the omission so to declare it does not make it the less a public nuisance. Cincinnati v. Miller, 29 Ohio L. J. 364, 365.

In Prescott's Case, 2 N. Y. City Hall Rec. 161, wherein the defendant was charged with erecting and continuing certain coppers, cisterns, boilers, and furnaces for the purpose of distilling, fomenting, and rectifying spirits by which certain noxious and offensive smells, stenches, vapors, and smokes were emitted, which rendered the air impure, unhealthy, and uncomfortable, to the great damage and common nuisance of divers inhabitants of the city, the court stated that the most important question was whether the smoke issuing from the chimney of such distillery might not be prevented from entering the windows of the adjacent buildings by carrying the chimneys higher, and that if the jury should believe that such annoyance might be prevented by that means the omission to do it was a nuisance for which the defendant was answerable. This case, however, was one wherein the defendant was indicted for the nuisance at common law and the question of municipal control did not, therefore, arise. It is, however, here cited as showing that smoke may become a public nuisance, and as supporting authorities holding the same as a public nuisance abatable by municipal authorities.

And in New Orleans v. Lambert, 14 La. Ann. 244, the power of the city authorities to abate or order of the city of St. Louis is a nuisance," and the allegation in the statement and proof that such smoke was emitted from defendant's plant, and the common knowledge of the annoying and detrimental character of such smoke within a populous city, establishes a prima facie case on the part of the city.

The mayor and assembly shall have power within the city, by ordinance not inconsistent with the Constitution or any law of this state, or of this charter, to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances on public or private property, and the causes thereof.

St. Louis City Charter, art. 3, § 26, ¶ 6; Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 2098.

The declaration "that dense black or thick gray smoke" emitted into the open air within a populous city is a nuisance, is a valid exercise of the police power of the city.

Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698; Fieled v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410; People v. Lewis, 86 Mich. 278.

The power of the city to pass the ordinance cannot be questioned. The ordinance is distinctively a police regulation.

Tarkio v. Cook, 120 Mo. 1; Campbell v. Kansas, 102 Mo. 326, 10 L. R. A. 593; St. Louis v. Webber, 44 Mo. 547; St. Louis v. Jackson, 25 Mo. 37; St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 20

L. R. A. 721; St. Louis v. Howard, 119 Mo. 47; Kansas City v. Neal, 49 Mo. App. 72; Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 184; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 661, 31 L. ed. 210; Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 878; Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 1, 61 Am. Dec. 381.

In addition to its general police powers, by virtue of the express provision in its charter, the city of St. Louis had a clear right by ordinance to declare that dense black or thick gray smoke emitted, etc., constituted a nuisance, and such declaration is prima facie evidence that such smoke so emitted is a nuisance.

Kirkwood v. Cairns, 44 Mo. App. 88; St. Louis v. Schnuckelberg, 7 Mo. App. 586; St. Louis v. Stern, 3 Mo. App. 48; Kennedy v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 2 Pa. 366; Green v. Savannah, 6 Ga. 1; Roberts v. Ogle, 30 Ill. 459, 88 Am. Dec. 201; Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 885; Kennedy v. Sowden, 1 McMull. L. 323; Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588; Stuyvesant v. New York, 7 Cow. 604; Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349; Baker v. Boston, 12 Pick. 198, 194, 22 Am. Dec. 421.

Where the particular thing declared against is a nuisance per se, the action of the city authorities is conclusive.

St. Louis v. Stern, 3 Mo. App. 48; St. Louis

the abatement of a blacksmith's shop as a nuisance to the neighborhood by reason of the odor and smoke issuing therefrom was upheld, article 665 of the Civil Code providing that if the works or materials of any manufactory or other operation cause an inconvenience to those in the same or in the neighboring houses by diffusing smoke or nauseous smells, and there is no servitude established by which they are established, their sufferance must be determined by the rules of the police or the customs of the place.

Dense smoke emitted from a steam tugboat which in its effect is detrimental to some classes of property and businesses within a city and is a personal annoyance to the public at large, is such a nuisance as may be prohibited by the penal ordinance of a city, and an ordinance passed for the suppression of the same will be upheld as reasonable. Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698.

And § 1651 of the ordinance of the city of Chicago which declares that the emission of dense smoke from the smokestack of any boat or locomotive, or from any chimney anywhere within the city, shall be deemed and declared to be a public nuisance, provided that the chimneys of buildings used exclusively for private residences shall not be deemed to be within the provisions of the ordinance, is a definition of what the common council regarded as a nuisance. Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698.

An ordinance which prohibits the proprietor, lessee, or occupant of any building within the corporate limits from permitting or allowing dense smoke to issue or be emitted from the chimney, and declares the person so doing to be guilty of a nuisance, seeks only to prevent the emission of dense smoke, and in this particular does not go as far as authorized by the Ohio laws, which provide that all cities of the first class shall have the power to regulate and compel the consumption of smoke emitted by the burning of coal, and to prevent injury and annoyance from the same; neither does it contravene the provisions of the state Constitution. Cincinnati v. Miller, 29 Ohio L. J. 364, 365.

The mere fact that it is impossible to comply with the provisions of an act or ordinance relating 89 L. R. A.

to dense smoke does not of itself render such ordinance invalid, as it must appear that the thing required to be done is not within the power of man to accomplish, otherwise the law valid in other respects must stand and be obeyed; and therefore if the act required to be done is possible of execution, although attended with great hardship to the person affected, or be ever so difficult, the ordinance must be obeyed. Cincinnati v. Miller, 29 Ohio L. J. 364, 365.

So, dense smoke may constitute a nuisance within the definition given by the Minnesota Penal Code, where it is the product of bituminous or soft coal in a thickly populated neighborhood, where it becomes detrimental to certain classes of property, and is offensive, and a source of annoyance, to the public. St. Paul v. Gillsilan, 36 Minn. 206.

And a city ordinance, which makes the emission of dense smoke from any chimney or smokestack, within the city, or smoke containing soot or other substance, in sufficient quantity to permit the deposit of such soot or other substance on any surface within the corporate limits, a public nuisance, will be upheld, although it is contended on behalf of the defendant that it is unreasonable upon the ground that it excepts from its provisions and operation private houses and steamboats. People v. Lewis, 86 Mich. 278.

A business may be abated as a public nuisance, which, located in the midst of a populous community, constantly produces odors, smoke, and soot of such a noxious character, and to such extent, that they produce headache, nausea, and other pains and aches injurious to health among, and taint the food of, the surrounding inhabitants. People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L. R. A. 722.

If smoke, soot, and the emission of noxious odors and gases are so inseparably connected with a business that the conducting of it constitutes a nuisance, the facts that it is carried on in a careful and prudent manner, and that nothing is done by those managing it that is not a reasonable and necessary incident of it, cannot be relied on by its owners to defeat a prosecution for the maintenance of a nuisance. People v. Detroit White Lead Works, 82 Mich. 471, 9 L. R. A. 722.

v. Steele, 12 Mo. App. 570, Appx.; Kansas City v. Neal, 49 Mo. App. 72; Kansas v. McAleer, 31 Mo. App. 436.

Many decisions hold that a mere declaration on the part of the city authorities that a thing is a nuisance is conclusive.

Van Wormer v. Albany, 15 Wend. 262; Kennedy v. Philadelphia Bd. of Health, 2 Pa. 866; Green v. Savannah, 6 Ga. 1; State v. Heidenhain, 43 La. Ann. 483; Roberts v. Ogle, 80 Ill. 459, 83 Am. Dec. 201; Crosby v. Warren, 1 Rich. L. 385; Kennedy v. Sowden, 1 McMull. L. 828; Goddard v. Jacksonville, 15 Ill. 588.

Dense black or thick gray smoke, i. e., heavy volumes of smoke, discharged in any considerable quantities into the atmosphere of a populous city, is per se a public nuisance.

Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698; Field v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410; Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248; Ross v. Butler, 19 N. J. Eq. 302, 97 Am. Dec. 654; Tuebner v. California Street R. Co. 66 Cal. 174; Hurlbut v. McKone, 55 Conn. 81.

Hence legislation to suppress the smoke nuisance is a valid exercise of the police power.

In Field v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410, 411, the defendant complained of the court's refusal to instruct the jury that it is the duty of the city to prove that, among other things, the smoke that issued from the chimneys of the defendants at the time complained of was not only dense, but was, at that particular time, of a nature detrimental to the property which was close enough in proximity to it to be affected by it injuriously, or was of a nature to be personally annoying to the public at large, and unless the jury believed, from the evidence, that the smoke complained of was at the particular time in question dense, and also proved to be detrimental to property within the city, or was of a nature to be personally annoying to the public at large, then the verdict should be for the defendants; but the court stated that the last half of such proposed instruction, as to what the jury should believe in order to convict, was perhaps proper, but that the first half, requiring the city to prove what may be presumed without proof, was not proper.

Under an ordinance declaring the emission of dense smoke from the smokestack of any boat or locomotive, or from any chimney, anywhere within the city, a nuisance, and deeming any person permitting or allowing such smoke to issue from any such smokestack or chimney guilty of creating a nuisance, and providing that no owner of any boat or locomotive engine or the person or persons employed as engineers or others in the working of the engine or engines in any boat or of any locomotive engine, nor the proprietor, lessee, or occupant of any building, should allow such smoke to issue or be emitted from such smokestack or from the chimney of any building within the corporate limits of the city, and inflicting a punishment by way of fine or imprisonment upon every person creating such a nuisance,—it was held that the servant of the owner or occupant could not be held liable for the emission of dense smoke from the chimney of buildings. In this case, however, there was a dissenting opinion by Justice Collins. St. Paul v. Johnson (Minn.) 72 N. W. 64.

In Gaskell v. Bayley, 30 L. T. N. S. 516, the in-Courts will not pretend to be more ignorant than the rest of mankind, therefore they will presume and take judicial notice of the fact of common knowledge that "smoke becomes soot, which falls and blackens where it rests; that it is injurious to vegetation, to many kinds of goods, and annoying to people," and hence that heavy volumes of dense, dark smoke, discharged within a populous city, are a public nuisance.

Field v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410; Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698; Gaskell v. Bayley, 30 L. T. N. S. 516.

In an action by public authorities to abate a public nuisance, it is not necessary to aver and prove that particular persons have been damaged or inconvenienced by the public nuisance sought to be abated.

Kansas v. McAleer, 31 Mo. App. 436; Smiths v. McConathy, 11 Mo. 518.

The city had express authority to pass the smoke ordinance, and its enactment makes out a prima facie case that it is reasonable.

Municipal corporations are prima facie the sole judges of the necessity of these ordinances, and courts will not ordinarily review their reaspectors of nuisances had reported to the local authorities the result of his investigation of smoke nuisances upon the defendant's premises, and notice had been given pursuant to the sanitary act of 1866 requiring the abatement of the nuisance which was referred to as the chimney upon the defendant's premises within the borough not being the chimney of a private dwelling house, sending forth black smoke in such quantities as to be a nuisance, and the defendant's contention was that it was necessary for the plaintiffs to show that the emission of such dense smoke was also injurious to health. The court held that it was not necessary to show that the issuing of black smoke was injurious to health, as well as a nuisance, and that the issuing of black smoke in the quantities and manner shown by the evidence was a public nuisance within the provisions of the statute.

So, in Higgins v. Northwich Union Guardians of Poor, 22 L. T. N. S. 753, the defendant was compelled to obey the order of the guardians of the poor and abate a nuisance arising from black smoke emanating from the chimneys on his salt works, the English sanitary act of 1860 including any chimney other than one of a private dwelling house sending forth black smoke, and constituting the same a nuisance.

Under the English nuisance removal act of 1855, and the sanitary act of 1866, each daily emission of smoke is a separate act of disobedience. Queen v. Waterhouse, L. R. 7 Q. B. 545, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 115, 26 L. T. N. S. 761.

So, under the English nuisances removal acts of 1855 and 1860, and the sanitary act of 1866, the master who authorizes and directs the lighting of fires causing the smoke on the premises is the person properly liable to be proceeded against for nuisances by reason of smoke created thereby, but the justices must inquire whether the nuisance was likely to recur or be repeated, and if satisfied that it is, must order its abatement. Barnes v. Ackroyd, 26 L. T. N. S. 692, 20 Week. Rep. 671, L. R. 7 Q. B. 474, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 110.

And in Millard v. Wastall, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 277, in a suit by an inspector of nuisances of the borough against defendant for suffering a nuisance to sonableness when passed in strict pursuance of an express grant of power.

A clear case should be made out to authorize a court to interfere with the powers of a city respecting the exercise of its police powers on the ground of unreasonableness.

In determining whether it be reasonable, the court should not substitute its discretion for that of the municipal legislation.

Kansas v. McAleer, 31 Mo. App. 486.

Ordinarily, whether or not an ordinance is reasonable is a question for the court, and not the jury. It is a question for the court in this case.

Com. v. Worcester, 3 Pick. 462; State v. Overton, 24 N. J. L. 435, 61 Am. Dec. 671; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 327; Ang. & A. Priv. Corp. § 357; Boston v. Shaw, 1 Met. 130; Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679.

The ordinance is clear, precise, and definite in its requirements and demands, uniform in its operation, since it affects all alike who come within its provisions; its classification is general, and it is neither discriminating nor oppressive.

No law will be declared unconstitutional unless clearly so, and every reasonable intention will be made to sustain it.

Wells v. Missouri P. R. Co. 110 Mo. 286, 15

exist and for noncompliance with the requisites of a notice served on him requiring him to abate it, it was held, under the English Public Health Act, of 1875, § 91, subs. 7, and §§ 94 and 96 that a notice to abate a nuisance caused by quantities of black smoke issuing from a factory chimney need not necessarily specify the work required to be done in order to abate the nuisance.

Yet in Norris v. Barnes, L. R. 7 Q. B. 537, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 154, 23 L. T. N. S. 622, 20 Week. Rep. 708, it was held that the justices had no jurisdiction to order the abatement of smoke issuing out of the chimney of a bichrome manufactory under the English acts of 1866 and 1865.

But it has been stated that the emission of dense smoke from smokestacks or chimneys is not necessarily a public nuisance, and whether it is so or not must depend largely upon the locality and surroundings. St. Paul v. Gildilan, 36 Minn. 298.

Smoke and noise, although they may disturb a party, are an inconvenience from which a party cannot be relieved under article 669 of the Revised Code of Louisiana, where a lawful business is authorized by the city authorities, and is not consistent with the provisions of the police regulation. Lewis v. Behan, 23 La. Ann. 130.

Where the legislature by its act does not authorize the city council to declare smoke a nuisance, but authorizes such council to regulate it and prevent injury and harm from it, the city by its ordinance cannot make it a nuisance per se, especially where no regard is had to the injury or annoyance that follows it, nor to the chimney or location. Sigler v. Cleveland, 3 Ohio N. P. 119.

And a city has no power to pass an ordinance declaring the emission of dense smoke from the smokestack of any boat or locomotive, or from any chimney anywhere in the city, a public nuisance, and making the owner of such building guilty of a misdemeanor by reason of such emission, there being no enabling statute or provisions in the charter authorizing the city council to define and declare what shall constitute a nuisance, nor to enact ordinances to prevent and punish the acts complained of without any lawful investigation or inquiry into the question whether it constitutes a public nuisance, chapter 4, § 3, of the charter of St. Paul containing no adequate or appropriate provisions to warrant the ordinance in question, even though, under subdivisions 81 and 82, 39 L. R. A.

§ 3, of the charter, the council are authorized to remove or abate nuisances in the public streets, and such as are injurious to the public health or safety, such provisions referring to things which are nuisances per se, or which may be determined to be such by competent authority, no authority being implied to declare things to be nuisances without investigation which may or may not become such according to circumstances. St. Paul v. Gildilan, 36 Minn. 298.

In State, McCue, v. Ramsey County Sheriff, 48 Minn. 236, 239, the defendant was arrested on the charge of creating and maintaining a nuisance in violation of Minn. Special Laws 1889, chap. 375, declaring the emission of dense smoke within the city of St. Paul under certain circumstances a nuisance, and prescribing a penalty. The 1st section prohibited the emission of dense smoke within the city with certain limitations as to distance, location, and surroundings, and the 2d prescribed the penalty, while the 3d declared that nothing therein contained should be construed to apply to manufacturing establishments using the entire product of combustion and the heat, power, and light produced thereby within the building wherein the same were generated or within a radius of 300 feet therefrom. Upon the defendants seeking to be released upon habeas corpus the court held that the act was invalid inasmuch as no arbitrary distinction between the different kinds or classes of businesses can be sustained, the statute being leveled against the nuisance occasioned by dense smoke, the distinction or qualification attempted to be made with regard to the different kinds of businesses being untenable.

And it has been held that the smoking of tobacco may be classed among the subjects of legislation by municipal corporations. State v. Heidenhain, 42 La. Ann. 483, 486.

But smoking in itself is not to be condemned by any public policy. State v. Heidenhain, 42 La. Ann. 483, 486.

Although smoking may be agreeable and pleasant, and almost indispensable to those who have acquired the habit, yet it is distasteful and offensive, and sometimes hurtful to those who are compelled to breathe the atmosphere impregnated with tobacco in close and confined places, and therefore a city ordinance which prohibits smoking in street cars as a nuisance, is valid. State v. Heidenhain, 42 La. Ann. 483, 486.

While, ordinarily speaking, a person has a right to have the air diffused over his premises in its natural state, free from all artificial impurities (1 Wood, Nuisances, 3d ed. § 495), the law relaxes this strict rigor of the rule in towns and cities, and does not recognize every business or use of property as a nuisance that imparts a degree of impurity to the air.

Gantt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The city of St. Louis instituted this action against the defendant to recover a fine of $50 for the violation of what is known as the "Smoke Ordinance." That ordinance provides that "the emission into the open air of dense black or thick gray smoke within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis is hereby declared to be a nuisance, and the owners, occupants, managers, or agents of any establishment, locomotives, or premises from which dense black or thick gray smoke is emitted or discharged are made guilty of a misdemeanor, and subject to a fine not less than $10 nor more than $50; and each and every day wherein such smoke shall be emitted shall constitute a separate offense." The statement of the city attorney averred that defendant had violated the above ordinance, in this,—to wit: "In the city of St. Louis, and the state of Missouri, on the 4th day of September, 1895, and on divers other days and times prior thereto, the said Edward Heitzeberg Packing & Provision Company, a corporation (Charles L. Heitzeberg, president), did then and there emit and discharge into the open air, within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, dense black and thick gray smoke from the smokestack or chimney of the building, being numbered 3101 North Broadway, situated on west side of said street, in said city of St. Louis, Missouri, said Edward Heitzeberg Packing & Provision Company being the occupant of said building, contrary to the ordinance in such case made and provided." Defendant filed a motion to dismiss, which was overruled, and, on trial, defendant was convicted as charged, October 30, 1895, and fined $10. On the same day, defendant perfected an appeal to the St. Louis court of criminal correction. Defendant renewed its motion to dismiss in the court of criminal correction, which was overruled, and which raised the following points: (1) The complaint does not state a cause of action against defendant. (2) The smoke ordinance is unconstitutional and void. (3) The complaint is not responsive to the ordinance.

On December 28, 1895, the cause was submitted on an agreed statement of facts, in substance as follows: That defendant is a corporation, and is the owner or operates and controls a large manufacturing plant, at No. 3101 North Broadway, corner of Branch street, in St. Louis, Missouri; that it owns, controls, and operates a furnace in connection with said plant, wherein are burned or consumed large quantities, daily, of soft or bituminous coal; that there is a smokestack or chimney connected with said furnace, which is owned and operated by defendant; that said street, known as "Broadway," on which the establishment fronts, is one of the principal thoroughfares of the city of St. Louis, and is located in a neighborhood in which there are numerous stores and dwellings and a large number of manufacturing establishments; that among the said manufacturing establishments, and most all of them using the same kind of coal, are the following (establishments enumerated); that the court may take judicial notice of the size and commercial importance of the city of St. Louis; that said city is densely populated, containing nearly 600,000 inhabitants; that on September 4, 1895, there was emitted and discharged into the open air, within the corporate limits of said city, from the stack or chimney of defendant's plant, 89½ minutes of dense black and thick gray smoke, arising from the use in the furnace of defendant corporation of common soft or bituminous coal as fuel, out of an observation of 100 minutes, from 9:55 A. M. to 11:35 A. M., conducted by three smoke inspectors, to wit, Samuel R. Fox, August Kulckmeier, and W. L. Scott, of which 18½ minutes of that time said stack discharged into the open air dense black smoke, so black and dense that it was opaque, and could not be seen through, and of that time said stack discharged into the open air thick gray smoke for a period of 21 minutes,—smoke that was heavy and dense, but not perfectly black; that said dense black and thick gray smoke so emitted and discharged as aforesaid was carried for a distance of several blocks before it became very much dissipated,—that is, before it became very much scattered and diffused into the air within the corporate limits of said city; that William B. Potter would testify that he is an engineer, and at present manager and chief engineer of the St. Louis Sampling & Testing Works, and is also chairman of the smoke commission of the city of St. Louis; that for a period of eight or ten years he had made a special study of the problem of smoke abatement, with special reference to the conditions of the plants and establishments of the city of St. Louis; that during said period he has tested and reported on the varying degrees of efficiency of numerous devices designed for the abatement of smoke where large quantities of common soft or bituminous coal are used as fuel; that, in his opinion, as a result of long study, experience, and observation in the city of St. Louis, it is entirely practicable to abate smoke, or, rather, reduce it below the terms of dense black or thick gray, as used in city ordinance No. 17,049, and at the same time use soft or bituminous coal in great quantities; that it is entirely practicable to reduce the smoke in the various plants and establishments in the city of St. Louis so that dense black or thick gray smoke would not be emitted or discharged into the open air; that this reduction or abatement of the smoke can be accomplished without injury to the boiler plants, and without any unreasonable requirements as to skill or amount of labor on the part of those in charge of or of those operating the boilers; that dense black or thick gray smoke of the character above described, as having been emitted and discharged into the open air within the corporate limits of the city of St. Louis, from the smokestack or chimney of defendant's plant, would be damaging and detrimental to certain classes of property, and would cause inconvenience and annoyance to persons within said city; that said smoke ordinance, No. 17,049, is in existence and in force within said city. No further evidence being offered, at defendant's request the court declared the law to be that, under the law and the evidence, plaintiff could not recover. The city excepted to the declaration of law. Thereupon the court found a verdict and judgment for defendant, and ordered a discharge. In due time, the city filed its motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and, after perfecting its bill of exceptions, sued out a writ of error from this court.

By its charter (2 Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, p. 2098, § 26, cl. 6), the city of St. Louis is authorized "to declare, prevent, and abate nuisances on public or private property, and the causes thereof." It will be observed that it is not specifically empowered to declare the emission of thick smoke within the city limits to be a nuisance per se. Notwithstanding the broad terms in which the power is given to declare nuisances, it is not competent for the city to declare that a nuisance which is not so in fact. We take it that the line of demarkation is quite plain under a municipal grant like this. As was said in Lake View v. Letz, 44 Ill. 81, and quoted with approval by Judge Scholfeld in Des Plaines v. Poyer, 128 Ill. 348: "There are some things which in their nature are nuisances, and which the law recognizes as such. There are others which may or may not be so, their character, in this respect, depending on circumstances." In the latter instance it is manifestly beyond the power of the village to declare in advance that those things are a nuisance." Judge Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations, discussing this power of municipal corporations to declare and abate nuisances, says: "Such powers, conferred in general terms, cannot be taken to authorize the extrajudicial condemnation and destruction of that as a nuisance which, in its nature, situation, or use, is not such." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. §§ 95, 374. This court, in River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 91, 46 Am. Rep. 6, announced a safe and conservative rule on this subject. Said the court: "We do not deny that the general assembly may confer upon municipal authorities the power to abate nuisances, and to declare what shall be deemed nuisances, but the latter power cannot be so absolute as to be beyond the cognizance of the courts to determine whether it has been reasonably exercised in a given case or not," citing Yates v. Milwaukee, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984, in which the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Miller, said: "But the mere declaration by the city council of Milwaukee that a certain structure was an encroachment or obstruction did not make it so, nor could such declaration make it a nuisance, unless it in fact had that character."

Now, smoke alone was not a nuisance per se at common law, nor has it been so declared to be by any statute of this state. The legislature has defined what shall constitute a nuisance in this state by a general enactment, in these words: "Every person who shall erect or maintain any public nuisance, . . . to the annoyance or injury of any portion of the inhabitants of this state, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." 1 Mo. Rev. Stat. 1889, § 8851. Numerous cases may be found collated by the author in 1 Wood, Nuisances, 8d ed. § 505, and notes, which hold that smoke alone may constitute a private nuisance; but, in order to have that effect, it must either produce a tangible injury to property, as by the discoloration of buildings, injury to vegetation, discoloration of furniture or clothing or merchandise, or some tangible injury to property, real or personal, or sensibly impair its comfortable enjoyment; but in all of these cases it is a question of fact, depending on the character of the smoke, the quantity, the location, and circumstances. St. Paul v. Gillilan, 36 Minn. 298; Sigler v. Cleveland, 8 Ohio N. P. 119. None of the authorities cited by the learned counsel for the city state the law otherwise save the decision in Field v. Chicago, 44 Ill. App. 410. That was a prosecution under the smoke ordinance of Chicago, and the defendants requested the trial court to give the following instruction: "The jury are instructed that it is the duty of the city to prove that, among other things, the smoke that issued from the chimney of the defendants at the time complained of was not only dense, but was, at that particular time, of a nature detrimental to the property which was close enough in proximity to it to be affected by it injuriously, or was of a nature to be personally annoying to the public at large, and unless the jury believe, from the evidence, that the smoke complained of was, at the particular time in question, dense, and also proved to be detrimental to property within the city of Chicago, or was of a nature to be personally annoying to the public at large, then your verdict should be for the defendants." Concerning the propriety of refusing this instruction, the court said: "The last half of it, as to what the jury should believe in order to convict, was perhaps proper, but the first half, requiring the city to prove what may be presumed without proof, was not. It is a matter of common knowledge that smoke becomes soot, which falls and blackens where it rests; that it is injurious to vegetation, to many kinds of goods, and annoying to people. This common knowledge is so generally diffused in Chicago, that no jury could be without it." That case is the only one which holds that smoke is a nuisance per se; that it is unnecessary to prove that any annoyance followed its emission, or that it was detrimental to any property. The supreme court of Illinois, in Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698, expressly declined to say whether the mere emission of dense smoke in the city of Chicago, without proof that it was a nuisance in fact, was a nuisance per se. On the other hand, the supreme court of Minnesota, in St. Paul v. Gillilan, 36 Minn. 298, held that "the emission of dense smoke from smoke-stacks or chimneys is not necessarily a public nuisance. Whether so or not, would depend largely upon the locality and surroundings." In that case the ordinance was held void because no provision was made for a determination of the question upon the facts of any particular case, and for the reason that the city had no power to pass such an ordinance. The smoke ordinance of the city of Detroit was upheld by the supreme court of Michigan in People v. Lewis, 86 Mich. 278; but that ordinance was radically different from the St. Louis ordinance, in that it only made the emission of "dense smoke, or smoke containing soot . . . which shall damage the property or injure the health of any person, or shall specially annoy the public," an offense. It is unnecessary to add that the Detroit ordinance defines a nuisance at common law. In Harmon v. Chicago, 110 Ill. 400, 51 Am. Rep. 698, the admission that the smoke emitted was detrimental to property, and a personal annoyance to the public, was made the basis of the decision, whatever views the court may have entertained on the question before us. The British act of Parliament (29 & 30 Vict. chap. 90, § 19) enacts that "the word 'nuisance' shall include every chimney (not being the chimney of a private dwelling house) sending forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance." It is obvious from its terms that it depended in each case whether the smoke was emitted in such quantity as to be a "nuisance" within the meaning of the English law.

No one, we suppose, will doubt that dense smoke may be emitted in such quantities as to become an intolerable nuisance, both to the public and individuals; but the question before us is the power of the city, under its charter, to declare every emission of black dense smoke or thick gray smoke a nuisance, irrespective of the length of time it is emitted, or whether it is in fact a nuisance, and without providing for any inquiry as to these facts. In a word, is such an ordinance not so unreasonable that the courts should declare it void for that reason? Now, it was admitted at the bar of this court by the learned special counsel who argued the case for the city that the emission of dense black or thick gray smoke for one or two minutes constitutes an offense under this ordinance; and yet he admitted that up to this time no device or means was known or had been invented whereby such smoke could under all circumstances be suppressed or prevented; that in the first starting of a fire before the coal or wood was thoroughly ignited, dense smoke would necessarily be emitted; but he avoided this objection to the ordinance by claiming that the inspectors employed to detect violations of the ordinance exercise a wise discretion in such cases, and do not attempt to prosecute every emission of dense black or thick gray smoke. Now, the ordinance itself would punish every house-keeper who kindled a fire to cook his or her morning meal, or to warm the house. Every replenishing of the furnace, whether in the heart of the business centers or upon the remote western boundary of the city, would alike subject the owner to punishment. No exception whatever is made as to time or quantity. When it is considered, as it must be by this court, that St. Louis has attained its growth in population and wealth in a large degree from the fact of its proximity to the great mines of bituminous coal which lie at its very door, and that this fuel has enabled it to become a great manufacturing city, and that this soft coal is peculiarly liable to produce this objectionable dense smoke, it seems to us that this ordinance, which makes no reasonable allowance for the regulation of this smoke, but essays, in advance of any known device for preventing it, to punish all who produce it to any degree whatever, is wholly unreasonable. On the other hand, if, as learned counsel suggests, the ordinance is not enforced in all its strictness, but much is left to the discretion of the inspectors, then we have an unregulated official discretion, which of itself renders the ordinance void, for it cannot be tolerated that the rights of a citizen in this state shall depend entirely upon the caprice of any official, high or low. All valid ordinances must fix the duty or liability of the citizen by certain intelligible, prescribed rules, so that he may govern himself accordingly. Our conclusion is that while it is entirely competent for the city to pass a reasonable ordinance looking to the suppression of smoke when it becomes a nuisance to property or health, or annoying to the public at large, this ordinance must be held void, because it exceeds the powers of the city under its charter to declare and abate nuisances, and is wholly unreasonable.

The judgment of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction is affirmed.

L. V. LEWIS, Recept.,

v.

AMERICAN SAVINGS & LOAN ASSOCIATION et al., Recept., and

William D. HALE, Receiver, etc., of American Savings & Loan Association, Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

1. It is a reasonable presumption that a foreign corporation which has obtained a license by depositing securities which it had agreed to do, and which the law required as a condition of the license, did so in the manner and for the purposes prescribed by the law.
2. The compliance by a foreign building and loan association with the laws of the state which created it need not be investigated by the authorities of another state in which it deposits securities as required by statute in order to obtain a license to do business therein.
3. An extension of the business of a corporation into another state is within the power of the directors.
4. A deposit of securities by a foreign corporation as required by law in order to obtain the right to do business in the state is not ultra vires.
5. The plea of ultra vires will not be allowed to prevail when it will not advance justice, but will, on the contrary, accomplish a legal wrong.
6. A foreign corporation, as well as its stockholders and receivers, is estopped from disputing the validity of a trust upon which the corporation deposited securities as a condition of the license to do business in the state.

7. Only resident shareholders and creditors are entitled to participate in the proceeds of securities deposited with the state treasurer by a foreign building and loan association under Sanb. & B. Anno. Stat. §§ 2014a, 2014b, in order to obtain the right to do business in the state.

8. Securities deposited by a foreign building and loan association "in trust for the benefit and security of its members in this state," in order to obtain the right to do business in the state under Sanb. & B. Anno. Stat. §§ 2014a, 2014b, will be sold or collected in case of insolvency, and the proceeds applied according to the trust, and the residue only turned over to the receiver appointed in the state of incorporation.

APPEAL by defendant receiver from orders of the Circuit Court for Dane County retaining for distribution among Wisconsin creditors assets of the American Savings & Loan Association, a Minnesota corporation, which had been deposited with the treasurer of Wisconsin, for permission to do business in that state as against the claim of the Minnesota receiver to them. Affirmed.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

The American Building & Loan Association was incorporated and organized April 15, 1887, under and by virtue of the laws of Minnesota, as a building and loan association, having its principal office and place of business at Minneapolis, Minnesota; and it continued to transact its corporate business there until 1893, when its corporate name was changed to that of the American Savings & Loan Association. The general nature of its business was declared to be "to assist its members in saving and investing money, and in buying and improving real estate, and in procuring money for other purposes, by loaning or advancing under the mutual building society plan, to such of them as might desire to anticipate the ultimate value of their shares, funds accumulated from the monthly contribution of its stockholders, and also such other funds as may from time to time come into its hands." The government of the corporation and the management of its affairs was vested in a board of seven directors, elected by the stockholders. Membership was acquired by taking stock in the company, and paying the prescribed admission fee. The directors were authorized "to enter into such contracts and agreements, and appoint such agents for its business management as they may deem for the best interest of its affairs;" and the directors "might sell and dispose of the mortgages held by the corporation whenever they might deem best, and as provided by the by-laws." No by-laws were ever passed on this subject July 11, 1889, the articles of incorporation were amended so as to provide that "the board of directors shall not sell or dispose of any of the mortgages held or owned by this corporation." The principal question presented by the appeals is as to the construction, validity, and effect of the law of Wisconsin requiring foreign mutual building and loan associations to make a deposit of securities of the value of $100,000 with the state treasurer of Wisconsin as a condition upon which such corporations might receive a license from and do business in the state. The statute (Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. §§ 2014a, 2014b) provides that "no foreign building and loan association . . . shall issue its shares, receive moneys, or transact any business in this state, unless such association shall have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer of Wisconsin, in trust, for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, the securities of the actual cash value of $100,000 of the kind mentioned in § 2 of this act [§ 2014b] to be approved and accepted by said state treasurer, and held in trust as aforesaid, until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall have been fully redeemed and paid off by such association, and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged." And it was provided that "if any securities on deposit, as provided in this act, are wholly or partially extinguished by payments on the same or otherwise, or such securities depreciate in value for any cause, new securities must be added, so that the deposit may at all times be kept good and of the value of $100,000."

The defendant association was doing business in this state from the time of the passage of the above act, having 246 members in Wisconsin, 162 of whom became such prior to the date on which the law went into force, to wit, April 19, 1889. The plaintiff, Lewis, a resident of Wisconsin, the holder of five shares of stock, upon which $243 had been paid, alleging that there are a large number of residents and citizens of the state of Wisconsin, legal members, owning and holding stock in the defendant association, whose names he was unable to get, or their postoffice address, charged that the defendant association was insolvent; that a large part of its assets had been improvidently invested and squandered, and that, on the application of a creditor or creditors thereof residing in Minnesota, William D. Hale, the appellant, had been appointed receiver of all the property of the defendant association by the courts of Minnesota, in proceedings initiated therein; that, under the laws of Wisconsin, the defendant was entitled to withdraw all the securities deposited with the state treasurer, and substitute other and similar securities therefor, and that, during the year then passed, the defendant association had withdrawn a large portion of the securities theretofore duly deposited with the state treasurer of Wisconsin, and substituted in their stead other securities; that such securities so deposited consist in large part of mortgages upon real estate, which are likely to depreciate in value unless enforced according to law, and that the only property of said association in Wisconsin was the securities aforesaid, from which, if not preserved and properly cared for and converted into cash, it would be impossible for resident members of said association to recover back moneys paid into said association; that it was necessary for the protection of the rights of the plaintiff, and of the members and stockholders in said defendant association resident in the state of Wisconsin, that a receiver for the defendant association in Wisconsin should be appointed, in order to ascertain all of the members and stockholders in said association residing in Wisconsin, and the amount of their respective claims, and to convert into money the securities so deposited for their protection, and distribute the same to such persons as may be entitled thereto, under the direction and supervision of the court; and an injunction was sought restraining the defendant Peterson, as state treasurer, from in any manner parting with the custody and control of said securities, and permitting any withdrawal or substitution of the same. Judgment was prayed that said securities so held be sequestered and distributed among the members and stockholders of said association who are residents of the state of Wisconsin, including the plaintiff, according to law; that a receiver or receivers, to take charge thereof, and convert the same into money, with the usual powers and authority, be appointed. An injunction restraining and enjoining all persons from proceeding in any manner or way to obtain a lien on said securities, and from in any manner interfering with or intermeddling with the same, was prayed for; and that the court direct notice to be given, as it might deem proper, requiring all members and stockholders of said association who are residents of the state of Wisconsin to submit their claims, and become parties to the action, within such reasonable time as might be fixed by the court; and for such other and further relief, etc. In addition to these facts, it appeared from the pleadings that some time prior to May 10, 1889, the defendant association deposited with the state treasurer of the state of Wisconsin, in trust for the benefit and security of all its members in that state, securities consisting of mortgages taken by it in the course of its business, to the actual cash value of $100,000, which were duly approved and accepted by such treasurer, and which had since been held in trust by him and his successors in office, under the laws of this state relating to foreign building and loan associations, by which the state treasurers are required to hold such securities until all shares of stock in said association shall have been fully redeemed and paid off by the defendant association, and until all contracts and obligations of the defendant association to members and persons residing in the state of Wisconsin shall have been fully performed and discharged; that the defendant Peterson, as such state treasurer, holds said securities in his custody under said trust to the face value of $113,891.80. The appellant, William D. Hale, who had been appointed by the district court of Hennepin county receiver for said association, petitioned the court to be made a defendant in the action in the circuit court for Dane county; and it was ordered accordingly, and he interposed an answer and counterclaim, in which he admitted that the association was duly licensed by the state of Wisconsin to do business in said state in the year 1889, which said license was continued from time to time thereafter until the 1st day of January, 1894. The plaintiff and the defendant S. A. Peterson, as treasurer, etc., and M. C. Clarke, the receiver appointed by the circuit court of Dane county, Wisconsin, demurred to said answer and counterclaim. Orders were entered sustaining the demurrers, from which the defendant William D. Hale, the receiver appointed by the Minnesota court, appealed. The board of directors of the defendant association passed a resolution May 1, 1889, as follows: "Resolved, that the state treasurer of Wisconsin be made a depository of the association for temporary convenience in complying with the law of Wisconsin in regard to the deposit of securities, $100,000. Also, resolved that the association comply with the Wisconsin law as soon as possible."

The counterclaim alleged: (1) that the mortgages belonging to the American Savings & Loan Association in the possession of S. A. Peterson, state treasurer, at the time of making and filing plaintiff's complaint aggregated in value the sum of $145,234. That prior to the 11th of July, 1889, there were delivered to said Peterson, as such treasurer, mortgages of said association aggregating in value the sum of $108,060, of which there remained in his hands at the time of making and filing the plaintiff's complaint, as a part of the mortgages first above stated, mortgages aggregating in value the sum of $20,784; and between July 11, 1889, and the 1st of January, 1894, there was, of the mortgages above stated as in the possession of said state treasurer at the time of making and filing the complaint, delivered to him at various times, mortgages aggregating $80,850; and after January 1, 1894, there was delivered to him the remainder of said mortgages, which were in his possession at the time of the making and filing of said complaint, aggregating in value the sum of $43,600. That, of the mortgages delivered to him subsequent to the 11th day of July, 1889, a large part thereof were delivered to him in lieu of mortgages in his possession prior to said date, which had been by him surrendered to said association, and the remainder thereof were delivered to him as an addition to those delivered prior to that date. (2) That all of said mortgages are regular building and loan association mortgages, made and executed by shareholders and members of said association to secure the payment by said members of their regular installments of dues upon their stock, upon which said stock they had been granted an advancement or loan, and to secure the payment of the amount of such loan, and that they were non-negotiable, and could not be transferred by said association. (3) That, being a mutual building and loan association, it has no power or authority at any time to pledge, transfer, assign, sell, or dispose of any of its mortgages; and that none of said mortgages were deposited with said state treasurer by said association, but were given and delivered to him by officers and employees of said association, who were not authorized by said association to so deliver the same; and that they kept in the books of said association a statement or account of said mortgages so delivered to said treasurer. (4) That said mortgages, and each of them, held by the state treasurer at the time of making and filing the complaint, were held by him wrongfully, and without right or authority of law for said possession; that the shareholders had no knowledge whatever of the delivery of said mortgages, nor did they at any time consent thereto or acquiesce therein; that the only action ever taken by said association relative to making a deposit with the state treasurer of Wisconsin was taken by its board of directors on the 1st of May, 1889, at a call meeting of said board, as hereinbefore stated. The entire number of shareholders residing in Wisconsin when the action was commenced was 246, 162 of which had become such prior to the time when the Wisconsin statute took effect. (5) The Wisconsin stockholders, on becoming members, etc., subscribed for their shares of stock in the same manner, and received like certificates therefor, as did all the other shareholders of said association, wheresoever residing; and that said association was a mutual corporation; and that each shareholder therein, including the plaintiff, and "all the other shareholders in Wisconsin, enjoyed and were subject to like rights, privileges, immunities, and liabilities that other members enjoyed." (6) That, under its articles of incorporation, none of the shareholders of the association did or could have higher or superior rights than those enjoyed by all: that at the date of appellant's appointment, it had shareholders in thirty-five states, owned real estate in nineteen states, and held mortgages on real estate in twenty-nine states. (7) That the association had violated certain laws of the state of Minnesota, had become insolvent, and incapable of effectuating the object for which it was organized and created, and incapable of carrying out its contracts and obligations; that the appellant, William D. Hale, was duly appointed, pursuant to the statutes of Minnesota, as fully set forth, by the district court of Hennepin county, general receiver of such association, in an action wherein the state of Minnesota, on the relation of its attorney general, was plaintiff, and said association was defendant; and that the order appointing him required him to take charge of all the property and effects of such association, to collect, sue for, and recover all debts, dues, and demands that were due said association, and to manage and administer all the affairs of said association under the direction of said court; that, pursuant to said order and appointment, the said association executed and delivered to the receiver, William D. Hale, deeds of all the real estate owned by it, and due and sufficient assignments of all its property, including said mortgages herein referred to, as being in the possession of said Peterson, as treasurer of the state of Wisconsin, on the 14th day of January, 1896. (8) That M. C. Clarke, on the 5th of February, 1896, was, by the order of the circuit court of Wisconsin for Dane county, appointed receiver of said association for the state of Wisconsin; and the defendant S. A. Peterson, state treasurer, was ordered and directed to turn over all the said mortgages referred to in the plaintiff's complaint, and specified in the answer and counterclaim, to said Clarke, as such receiver; and that the said Peterson had turned over and delivered the same accordingly; and that said Clarke was proceeding to collect the same, and would, unless interfered with by the court, distribute the proceeds of the same to the shareholders resident in Wisconsin, thereby giving to said Wisconsin shareholders a preference over the other shareholders of said association. (9) That the assets of the association are not sufficient to pay to all its shareholders dollar for dollar of the amount which they had paid in or any other or greater sum than 40 per cent thereof; that if said Clarke, acting as receiver, should collect said moneys, and distribute the proceeds thereof to the Wisconsin shareholders, they would receive dollar for dollar of the amount they paid in to said association, and thereby be constituted a preferred class of shareholders, against equity and good conscience, and contrary to the purpose of said association, as defined by its articles of incorporation, by-laws, and contracts for membership with its shareholders; and, finally, that the law under which it is alleged said mortgages were deposited was intended to protect said Wisconsin shareholders in all their rights growing out of their membership in said association, and not for the purpose of extending, altering, or changing said rights; that the purpose for which any deposit made by said association with said state treasurer under said law was made terminated and was at an end when said association became insolvent and incapable of carrying out its contracts, and effectuating the purposes of its being. The defendant prayed that the court might, by its decree, direct said Clarke, as such receiver, to turn over and deliver said mortgages so held by him to said William D. Hale, to be by him collected, and the proceeds equitably distributed to all the shareholders, wherever residing, and for general relief.

Mr. Eugene G. Hay, for appellant:

Absolute mutuality of interest is the foundation of all such corporations.

Towle v. American Bldg. Loan & Inv. Soc. 60 Fed. Rep. 181.

Each shareholder, upon becoming a member of this association, agreed with each other shareholder, that he would share with him equally the profits and bear with him equally the losses of the common enterprise. Each shareholder, upon accepting his certificate of stock, agreed that he would be a mutual participant in the fortunes of the association, whether they be good or bad.

The proceeds of the mortgages will not be distributed to Wisconsin shareholders unless rightfully in the possession of the state treasurer, and the statute authorizes it.

The insolvent corporation here under consideration has no creditors in Wisconsin. The 264 shareholders resident in that state are not creditors. They may become creditors and they may become debtors, dependent entirely upon whether the assets of the insolvent estate are sufficient to pay the claims of the creditors who are not members of the association. They derive all their rights through the laws of Minnesota, and their contracts with each other entered into when they became members of the mutual corporation.

Taylor v. Life Asso. of America, 18 Fed. Rep. 493.

These shareholders hold no promise of the corporation to return the contributions they have made in payment of their stock dues. Independent of such rights as may grow out of the state treasurer's possession of these mortgages resulting from the circumstances of their delivery to him, and the laws of Minnesota and of Wisconsin relative thereto, the shareholders of Wisconsin have no right to the proceeds thereof to the exclusion of the shareholders in the thirty-four other states.

Where a foreign mutual corporation has funds or property in another state, the members of that mutual corporation, residing in that state, will not be permitted to acquire a preference over the members residing in other states, by seizing that property and distributing it to themselves to the exclusion of the other members.

The contention that out of the securities deposited with the treasurer, the Wisconsin shareholders are to receive back dollar for dollar of the amount contributed by them in the payment of their dues, is to constitute them preferred shareholders.

The proper construction of this law is that the mortgages deposited with the state treasurer were there only to enable the Wisconsin shareholders to enforce such rights as they might have in the association, growing out of their contractual relation; the insolvency of the association and the appointment of the receiver have abrogated these contracts; hence the purpose for which the deposit of the mortgages with the state treasurer was made is at an end, and the mortgages should be turned over to the domiciliary receiver, and distributed equitably among all of the shareholders of the association the same as all of the other assets of the association will be distributed.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal question presented by these appeals is as to the construction, validity, and effect of the law of Wisconsin requiring foreign mutual building and loan associations to make a deposit of securities of the value of $100,000 with the state treasurer as a condition upon which such corporations may receive a license from and transact business in this state. The statute (Sanborn & Berryman Anno. Stat. §§ 2014a, 2014b), provides that "no foreign building and loan association . . . shall issue its shares, receive moneys or transact any business in this state unless such association shall have and keep on deposit with the state treasurer of Wisconsin, in trust, for the benefit and security of all its members in this state, the securities of the actual cash value of $100,000 of the kind mentioned in § 2 of this act [§ 2014b]; to be approved and accepted by said state treasurer, and held in trust as aforesaid, until all shares of such association held by residents of this state shall have been fully redeemed and paid off by such association, and until its contracts and obligations to persons and members residing in this state shall have been fully performed and discharged." The deposit is required at all times to be kept good and of the value of $100,000. The defendant corporation, in order to be allowed to enter the state, and transact its proper business as a building and loan association therein, and to obtain a license to that end, as it did May 10, 1889 (which was renewed from time to time, and continued in force during the entire period it transacted business in said state), deposited with the state treasurer of Wisconsin, as it appears, its mortgage securities taken in the course of its business, to the required amount. The defendant corporation was a foreign corporation, created and existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota, located and having its principal office in Minneapolis. The general nature of its business was "to assist its members in saving and investing money, in buying real estate, and in procuring money for other purposes, by loaning or advancing under the mutual building society plan." By article 6 of its articles of association, the government of the corporation and the management of its affairs were vested in a board of seven directors, chosen from and by the stockholders. By its amended articles of association adopted July 31, 1889 (art. 19), it was provided that "the board of directors may sell and dispose of the mortgages held by this corporation, whenever they may deem best and as provided by the by-laws; but no by-laws on the subject were adopted. Article 18 of the same date provided that "the directors of this corporation may enter into such contracts and agreements and appoint such agents as they may deem best for the interest of its affairs." Article 19 was amended July 11, 1889, so as to read as follows: "The board of directors shall not sell or dispose of any of the mortgages owned by this corporation." The Minnesota statute (chapter 236 of the General Laws for 1889, which became a law April 22 of that year, before the defendant corporation was licensed to do business in Wisconsin, as amended June 1, 1891, and embodied in Minn. Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2860) provided, in substance, that every building and loan association governed by the act should deposit and keep with the state auditor or a trust company all mortgages or other securities received by it in the usual course of business, and that, whenever required by the laws of any other state, territory, or nation, its securities sufficient to allow such association to enter and do business in such state, territory, or nation might be deposited with some officer authorized to receive the same in such state, territory, or nation, under the laws thereof, for the benefit of its members and creditors. Provisions were made regulating the transfer accordingly, which are so extended as not to admit of convenient quotation; but they seem to plainly recognize as lawful a deposit in another state of securities of the association, in order to entitle it to a license to enter such state and transact its business therein. Suffice it to say that the provisions of the Minnesota statute seem designed to facilitate the convenient using and tracing of its securities deposited for the purpose indicated, and its provisions appear to be in the main directory. Compliance with it appears to be a matter of local administration, and not a condition precedent to the right to use and deposit its securities for the purpose of entering and transacting business in such other state. Within twenty days after the enactment of the Wisconsin statute, the corporation had constituted the state treasurer of Wisconsin "a depository for temporary convenience, in complying with the laws of Wisconsin in regard to deposit of securities, $100,000," and resolved that it would "comply with the Wisconsin law as soon as possible." A license was issued to it pursuant to the statute, and it was renewed or continued in force until January 1, 1894.

2. In view of the action of the defendant through its board of directors, and the fact that it is conceded that the securities of the kind and character mentioned were held by the state treasurer of Wisconsin when the action was commenced to the amount of $145,234, we must conclude and hold that the mortgages in dispute were deposited with the state treasurer by the defendant corporation, or by its authority, in a bona fide attempt "to comply with the Wisconsin law," as it had already resolved to do, and had made the state treasurer of that state its depository for that purpose. The Wisconsin law required the deposit of securities under the act to be made with the state treasurer. The defendant corporation obtained the prescribed license. It was required and it was its duty to deposit the securities mentioned to the amount of $100,000. This, it would seem, had been agreed should be done; and, upon the facts disclosed by the record, we think that it is a reasonable presumption that what was agreed to be done was done in the manner and for the purposes prescribed by the act. In Sparks v. National Masonic Acct. Asso. 100 Iowa, 458, it was held that when a foreign insurance company is shown to have transacted business in a state where, by the statute, certain acts were to be done by that company before it had a right to transact business therein, a conclusive presumption arises that the company has complied with the law in that respect. It is alleged in the counterclaim, in substance, that the provisions of the Minnesota statute were not complied with by the corporation defendant in making the deposits with the state treasurer of Wisconsin. The state authorities of Wisconsin, in receiving these securities, as provided by the statute, were not bound to investigate the question of local administration or compliance with the law of Minnesota by the corporation and state authorities. The allegations that the possession of the securities by the state treasurer was wrongful, and that they were delivered to him by officers and employees of the corporation without lawful authority, are legal conclusions. It was enough that the securities were, as it is conceded, the property of the corporation; and that its directors, who deposited them for the purpose indicated, had power "to enter into such contracts and agreements as they might deem for the best interests of its affairs;" and that the directors, in the exercise of their discretion, desired to obtain a license to prosecute and carry on the business of the corporation in Wisconsin in order to realize the profits and advantages consequent upon such extension of its business, which it appears has been extended to thirty-four states. Heath v. Silverthorn Lead Min. & Smelt. Co. 89 Wis. 146.

8. It was within the power of the directors to determine upon and make the intended extension of the business of the corporation; and it was their duty and within their power as well to make the necessary deposit of its securities as required by the Wisconsin law, which was a condition precedent to the right of the corporation to obtain the desired license, and transact its business in Wisconsin. In any view that may be taken of the case, we think that the transaction was within the undoubted power of the corporation. The deposit was made accordingly. The license was issued. The defendant entered the state, and carried on its business therein, and for a period of five years derived the benefits and advantages expected to result from such extension of its business, and the protection and authority of the state. It was well understood by the corporation, its directors, officers, and members, that these securities had been deposited, and had so remained, with the state treasurer, under the pledge specified in the Wisconsin statute, and until financial disaster and insolvency overtook the corporation. It could enter the state of Wisconsin, and carry on its business, only on complying with the terms and conditions of the Wisconsin statute. Having the right to extend its business, it seems clear that it was not ultra vires the corporation to comply with the conditions upon which alone it could lawfully obtain a license to so enter the state and carry on its business, the prosecution of which was for the common advantage and profit of the corporation, and of all its members and shareholders.

4. It is familiar law that the recognition of the existence of a corporation by any other than the state of its creation, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of such other state or states,—“a comity which is never extended where the existence of the corporation or the exercise of its powers are prejudicial to their interests or repugnant to their policy. Having no absolute right of recognition in other states, but 89 L. R. A.

depending for such recognition and the enforcement of its contracts upon their assent, it follows, as a matter of course, that such assent may be granted upon such terms and conditions as those states may think proper to impose. They may exclude the foreign corporation entirely. They may restrict its business to particular localities, or they may exact such security for the performance of its contracts with their citizens as, in their judgment, will best promote the public interests. The whole matter rests in their discretion.” This was so held by the Supreme Court of the United States, nearly thirty years ago, in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U. S. 8 Wall. 168, 181, 19 L. ed. 357, 360, affirmed in that court by many subsequent cases, and as well by other courts of the highest respectability and authority. Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. ed. 297, and cases cited; Life Assn. of America v. Rundle (“Reife v. Rundle”), 108 U. S. 222, 225, 26 L. ed. 337, 339; Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Raymond, 70 Mich. 485; Morse v. Home Ins. Co. 30 Wis. 496, 11 Am. Rep. 580; State, Drake, v. Doyle, 40 Wis. 175, 197, 23 Am. Rep. 692; State, Covenant Mut. Ben. Assn., v. Root, 83 Wis. 687, 690, 19 L. R. A. 271; Wyman v. Kimberly-Clark Co. 93 Wis. 554.

In Hooper v. California, 155 U. S. 648, 39 L. ed. 297, the cases in the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject are collected and cited, and it was there stated that “the principle that the right of a foreign corporation to engage in business within a state other than that of its creation depends solely upon the will of such other state, has been long settled, and many phases of its application have been illustrated by the decisions of this court. . . . While there are exceptions to this rule, they embrace only cases where a corporation created by one state rests its right to enter another and to engage in business therein upon the Federal nature of its business. As, for instance, where it has derived its being from an act of Congress, and has become a lawful agency for the performance of governmental or quasi governmental functions, or where it is necessarily an instrumentality of interstate commerce, or its business constitutes such commerce, and is therefore solely within the paramount authority of Congress. In these cases, the exceptional business is protected against interference by state authority.” In the case cited, the court said: “The state of California has the power to exclude foreign insurance companies altogether from her territory, whether they were formed for the purpose of doing a fire or a marine business. She has the power, if she allows any such companies to enter her confines, to determine the conditions on which the entry shall be made. And, as a necessary consequence of her possession of these powers, she has the right to enforce any conditions imposed by her laws as preliminary to the transaction of business within her confines by a foreign corporation, whether the business is to be carried on through officers or through ordinary agents of the company; and she has also the further right to prohibit a citizen from contracting within her jurisdiction with any foreign company which has not acquired the privilege of engaging in business therein, either in his own behalf or through an agent empowered to that end. The power to exclude embraces the power to regulate, to enact, and enforce all legislation in regard to things done within the territory of the state which may be directly or incidentally requisite in order to render the enforcement of the conceded power efficacious to the fullest extent, subject always, of course, to the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States." The doctrine thus established is, in our judgment, conclusive as to the validity of the pledge of the securities here in question, under the Wisconsin statute, and of the trusts therein specified. The defendant association clearly had the power to make the deposit as incident to the accomplishment of the purpose for which it was created. In North Hudson Mut. Bldg. & L. Asso. v. First Nat. Bank, 79 Wis. 31, 36, 11 L. R. A. 845, this court held that a building and loan association might lawfully do those things reasonably necessary in order to accomplish the objects and purposes of its organization which were not expressly forbidden. In general, in exercising the powers conferred by its charter, a corporation may adopt any proper and convenient means tending directly to their accomplishment, and not amounting to the transaction of a separate unauthorized business. Clark v. Farrington, 11 Wis. 307; State, Priest, v. Regents of Wisconsin University, 54 Wis. 159; Madison, W. & M. Pl. Road Co. v. Watertown & P. Pl. Road Co. 5 Wis. 173.

The association defendant had not been forbidden to make the deposit of its securities taken in the course of its business to enable it to enter the state of Wisconsin or any other state, and obtain a license to transact its business therein. It was the absolute owner of these securities, and it might lawfully so use them. It was required by the statutes that "if any securities on deposit as provided by this act are wholly or partially extinguished by payment of the same or otherwise, or such securities depreciate in value for any cause, new securities must be added, so that the deposit may at all times be kept good and of the value of $100,000." The association defendant, by accepting its license, was bound to comply with the law; and, in the absence of any allegations to the contrary, it must be presumed that all mortgages deposited at or after the date of the license, May 10, 1889, were deposited for the purpose of complying with the law, and keeping its deposit up to the required amount of $100,000. The subsequent amendment to the articles of incorporation (July 11), providing that "the board of directors shall not sell or dispose of any of the mortgages held or owned by the corporation," is relied on; but this provision must be construed, we think, in connection with the statute of Minnesota, which, as already noticed, quite clearly contemplated that the securities of the association might be used and pledged, if need be, for the purpose of complying with the law under which it could enter to transact business in another state. It was not intended by this amendment to deprive the corporation of the power, by the use of its securities, to maintain and keep good its deposits, in order to transact its business in the thirty-four states which it appears to have entered for that purpose. The more reasonable view would seem to be that the amendment was intended to prevent an absolute sale or traffic in its securities, and not a deposit of such securities for the purpose indicated. We arrive, therefore, at the conclusion that the deposit of securities in question, made with the state treasurer for the purpose indicated, was within the lawful power of the corporation as represented by its directors, and that the action of the directors in making it was binding upon the corporation and all its members to the extent and according to the terms of the statute under which it was made.

5. The deposit was, as we have said, within the power conferred upon the corporation, and not in violation of the trust reposed in the board of directors, that the affairs of the corporation should be managed, and its property and funds applied, solely for the purpose of carrying out the objects for which the corporation was created. It is well settled that a corporation cannot avail itself of the defense of ultra vires when the contract in question has been in good faith fully performed by the other party, and the corporation has had the full benefit of the performance and of the contract. Much less will the claim that the transaction was ultra vires be allowed as a ground for rescinding the contract, and restoring to the complaining party, on that ground, the property or funds with which he has parted, after he has had the benefit of full performance of the contract by the other party; and, in general, the plea of ultra vires will not be allowed to prevail, whether interposed for or against a corporation, when it will not advance justice, but, on the contrary, will accomplish a legal wrong. Kadiash v. Garden City Equitable Loan & Bldg. Asso. 151 Ill. 531; Whitney Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62; Union Nat. Bank v. Matthews, 98 U. S. 628, 629, 25 L. ed. 190. "Where it is a simple question of capacity or authority to contract, arising either on a question of regularity of organization or of power conferred by the charter, a party who has had the benefit of the agreement cannot be permitted, in an action founded on it, to question its validity. It would be in the highest degree inequitable and unjust to permit the defendant to repudiate a contract the fruits of which he retains." Sedgw. Stat. Constr. § 73. In 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 425, the subject is fully considered, and numerous modern authorities are cited, showing that "where a contract has in good faith been fully performed either by the corporation or the other party, the one who thus has received the benefit will not be permitted to resist its enforcement by the plea of mere want of power." Darst v. Gale, 83 Ill. 186; Carson City Sav. Bank v. Carson City Elevator Co. 90 Mich. 550; Holmes & G. Mfg. Co. v. Holmes & W. Metal Co. 127 N. Y. 260; Rider Life Raft Co. v. Roach, 97 N. Y. 378; Bradley v. Ballard, 55 Ill. 415, 7 Am. Rep. 656; State Board of Agriculture v. Citizens' Street R. Co. 47 Ind. 407, 17 Am. Rep. 702; Oil Creek & A. R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Transp. Co. 83 Pa. 160, 166.

The result of these views is that the receiver appointed by the circuit court for Dane county, Wisconsin, is entitled to retain the securities in question, and to subject them, under the order of the court, to the fulfillment of the trust upon which they were so deposited; and, to that end, they may be sold or collected, and the proceeds so applied, and any residue that may remain must be turned over to the appellant, the receiver appointed by the district court of Hennepin county, Minnesota. The corporation defendant, as well as its stockholders and its receiver, appointed by the court in Minnesota, are estopped from disputing the validity of the trust upon which the state treasurer had received these securities, and held them when the corporation became insolvent, and this action was commenced. The corporation, by its directors, consented to and made the deposit, and their action became binding alike on members and stockholders in other states; and they have thus waived all right, on legal or constitutional grounds, to question the validity of the trust on which the securities are held, as expressed in the statute.

6. We cannot perceive how it can be maintained that the contract clause of the Federal Constitution can be invoked to release these securities from the operation and effect of such pledge and estoppel, whatever view may be taken of the rights and relations of the entire body of stockholders as between themselves and the corporation. They have waived their right to insist upon the constitutional objection they urge against the Wisconsin statute, or to question the validity of the trust. Whatever modification or change may have occurred in the contractual relations existing between these parties is the sole result of their lawful and proper consent, or of those who were chosen and fully empowered in law to represent them, namely, the board of directors, without whose authority the securities could not have been deposited or pledged under the statute. The right to invoke the contract provision of the Federal Constitution, we think has been waived by them; and the case on this point falls strictly within the principle stated by Judge Cooley in his celebrated work on Constitutional Limitations (p. 214), where he states that "there are cases where a law in its application to a particular case must be sustained, because the party who makes objection has, by prior action, precluded himself from being heard against it. Where a constitutional provision is designed for the protection solely of the property rights of the citizen, it is competent for him to waive the protection, and to consent to such action as would be invalid if taken against his will." And several instances of the application of this principle are given. The learned author states: "In these and the like cases the statute must be read with an implied proviso that the party to be affected shall assent thereto; and such consent removes all obstacle, and lets the statute in to operate the same as if it had in terms contained the condition." There are many well-considered cases sustaining the position that a party may, by his own act or conduct, preclude himself from insisting upon constitutional objections to a statute affecting his rights. The subject is discussed by Paine, J., in Burrows v. Bashford, 22 Wis. 104, where the opinion is expressed that it is not unconstitutional for the legislature to provide that a party may voluntarily subject himself to unconstitutional provisions as a condition to the enjoyment of a new advantage given by the act. So, in the present case, in consideration of the benefits derived by the defendant corporation and its shareholders from the statute under consideration, in being allowed to enter the state and transact business therein, they must be precluded from insisting upon the invalidity of the statute. Bank of Columbia v. Okely, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 235, 4 L. ed. 559; People v. Murray, 5 Hill, 468. A party may renounce a constitutional provision made for his benefit (Embury v. Connor, 3 N. Y. 511, 53 Am. Dec. 325; Lee v. Tillotson, 24 Wend. 337, 35 Am. Dec. 624), and, having waived it, cannot subsequently ask for its protection. The views we have already expressed render the contention of the appellant in respect to the relations which the shareholders of a mutual building association ordinarily sustain to the corporation and to each other inapplicable, as well as the contention that the enforcement of the trust specified in the statute in these securities will destroy equality of right between the shareholders in general, rendering, as it is contended, the Wisconsin shareholders preferred shareholders.

7. Whatever the practical result of the enforcement of the trust in favor of Wisconsin shareholders, creditors, and others sustaining contractual relations with the corporation defendant may be, it rests, as we think and as we hold, upon the consent of the corporation and of its shareholders lawfully given, as it well might be in the present case, by and through its board of directors, for a valid consideration received by the corporation to the benefit and advantage of those now denying its validity. The right of the state of Wisconsin to pass and enforce the act for the better protection of its citizens and residents against irresponsible foreign corporations entering, or desiring to enter, the state, and transact business therein with its citizens, cannot, we think, be denied. We cannot assent to the position that the security afforded by the deposit required by the act, and thus consented to and made by the corporation through its directors, may be avoided or nullified at the instant when the necessity for retaining it and enforcing it becomes imperative. If it was lawful to require and take the security, it is rightful and lawful to insist on it, and enforce it, according to the very terms and true meaning of the act under which it was given; and insolvency of the corporation will not release the trust or discharge it. The language of the Wisconsin statute is free from doubt or ambiguity, and construction has no office to perform in respect to it. Its meaning and purpose are obvious, and it is the manifest duty of the court to give it full effect. This cannot be done without strictly applying the securities or their proceeds to the uses prescribed by the statute. This trust was not created for the benefit or indemnity of members, creditors, and shareholders of the defendant corporation generally, residing out of the state. These were not within its plan, purpose, or policy. The deposit was required and made in pursuance of a wise state policy, solely for the benefit and indemnity of resident shareholders and creditors, and for their protection and advantage only. Language could not have been readily employed to have made the intention plainer than is expressed in the statute. To now turn these securities over to the appellant, to the end that they may be collected and converted, and the proceeds applied ratably in satisfaction of all the claims of shareholders and creditors generally, whether residents of Wisconsin, or not, would, we think, be a manifest perversion of the trust, and render the security and indemnity they were deposited to furnish resident shareholders, and others indicated in the statute, a mere delusion. We think that the demurrers to the appellant's answer and counterclaim were properly sustained.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County directing the sheriff to turn over to the assignee for creditors of Louis Henes, Jr., property in his possession under an execution in favor of plaintiff. Reversed.

CROSS-APPEALS from orders of the Superior Court for Milwaukee County in a proceeding to enforce payment of a claim against Louis Henes, Jr., in favor of plaintiff; the plaintiff appealing from the order dissolving the levy of the execution; and defendant appealing from the order refusing to vacate the judgment and execution. Reversed on plaintiff's appeal. Affirmed on defendant's appeal.

Statement by Pinney, J.:

On the 4th of May, 1897, the plaintiff caused to be entered in the superior court of Milwaukee county a judgment by confession upon a certain promissory note, dated August 15, 1896, in and by which Louis Henes, Jr., promised to pay to the plaintiff or order $24,000 in thirty days from date, with interest at 6 per cent from the date thereof, and claiming that $24,078.90, for principal and interest, was due thereon. Costs were included in the entry of the judgment, for the amount of $32.20. $25 whereof was for attorney's fees, as costs by statute. Execution was issued upon said judgment, and on the 4th day of May, 1897, the sheriff of Milwaukee county levied upon certain personal property of the defendant, Henes, of the value of about $10,000; and it was made to appear that he still retained the custody thereof, and claimed the right to sell the same, by virtue of said execution. An order was granted, upon the record, documents, etc., in the action, that plaintiff, together with the sheriff of Milwaukee county, show cause, etc., on the 29th day of May, before said court, at the court-house, etc., why the judgment in said action, and the execution issued thereunder, should not both be vacated and set aside, and the levy made thereunder dissolved. The order was also based upon the affidavit of Henry C. Schranck, from which it appeared that on the 10th day of May (six days after the entry of said judgment and levy) the defendant, Louis Henes, Jr., made to said Schranck a voluntary assignment of all his property and estate not exempt by law, pursuant to chapter 80 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, and acts amendatory thereof; that said Schranck qualified as such assignee, and was then acting as such; that long prior to the entry of said judgment the said defendant was, and ever since had been, insolvent; and that on the 10th of May, 1897, after the making of such voluntary assignment, and after this deponent had duly qualified, he demanded of such sheriff in writing, the possession of the property so levied on, but that said sheriff and said plaintiff refused, and ever since refused, to deliver up the same to him as such assignee; that said sheriff proposed to offer for sale and sell the said property on or before Wednesday, the 26th day of May, 1897; that the majority of the creditors of said assignee were nonresidents of the state of Wisconsin; that they were interested in said property, and any sale that might be had thereof, and that the best interests of all such creditors would be promoted, and better bids would probably be procured, provided said sale was postponed for a reasonable time; that, as appeared from the judgment roll in the action, the costs therein were taxed at the sum of $32.20, and allowed, upon the consent of the defendant's attorney, as set forth in his answer; that said costs so taxed and allowed at said sum included an item designated, "Costs by statute, $25," which the defendant alleged to be grossly excessive, and was included without the authority or consent of the defendant, and in fraud of his rights and the rights of creditors; that, as deponent was informed and believed, the note upon which the judgment was rendered was from time to time renewed, and the time of payment thereof extended, by agreement between the parties to said action, and the last renewal or extension thereof was made April 14, 1897, for a period of thirty days; and that the principal of said note was not due or payable until after the judgment was entered. The plaintiff, afterwards, on the 4th of May, remitted said item of $25 so taxed and included in the judgment, and notified such assignee thereof. Upon the hearing of this motion the court ordered "that by reason of the voluntary assignment by said defendant, made on the 10th day of May, 1897, and within ten days after the property of said defendant was levied upon under the execution issued herein on the 4th day of May, 1897, said levy became, and is hereby declared to be, dissolved, and the said sheriff is hereby directed to forthwith turn over to said assignee, all and singular, the property levied upon by him under said execution, and that the motion of said assignee, in so far as it seeks to dissolve said levy, be, and the same is hereby, granted."

It was further ordered "that said judgment and execution issued thereunder be not vacated nor set aside, but that the same stand, and that the motion of said assignee to vacate or set aside said judgment and execution be denied." The plaintiff appealed from that portion of the order directing the sheriff of Milwaukee county to turn over to the assignee of the defendant herein property levied upon under the execution issued upon said judgment, and declaring said levy to be vacated. The said Henry C. Schranck, as assignee, etc., appealed from that part of the order of the superior court which denied his motion to vacate and set aside the judgment therein, and the execution issued thereon.

On the 18th day of May, 1897, Henry C. Schranck, as assignee of Louis Henes, Jr., obtained an order from the circuit court of Milwaukee county, in the matter of the assignment of said Louis Henes, Jr., requiring the plaintiff in said judgment, the Second Ward Savings Bank, and the sheriff of Milwaukee county, to show cause before said circuit court, at, etc., why they, and each of them, should not be required to deliver and turn over to Henry C. Schranck, as assignee of Louis Henes, Jr., the property and assets levied upon by said sheriff of Milwaukee county under two certain executions issued upon judgments of the superior court of Milwaukee county in favor of said Second Ward Savings Bank against Louis Henes, Jr., and for such other or further order or relief, etc. This order was based upon the petition of said Henry C. Schranck, assignee, stating the execution and delivery to him by said Louis Henes, Jr., of the voluntary assignment of all his property and estate for the benefit of his creditors on May 10, 1897, and that he thereupon duly qualified as such assignee, and had ever since and was then acting as such.

The petition further alleged that the assignor, at the time of the assignment, and for many years prior thereto, had been engaged in the business of a wholesale and retail dealer in coal and wood in said city, and that on or about August 15, 1896, said assignor executed and delivered to the Second Ward Savings Bank his promissory note for $24,000, dated that day, and due thirty days after date, together with a warrant of attorney thereto annexed, in the usual form, authorizing the confession of judgment thereon; that on or about November 21, 1896, said assignor executed and delivered to said Second Ward Savings Bank his certain other promissory note for $2,000, with warrant of attorney to confess judgment thereon thereto annexed, in the usual form, payable sixty days after date.

The petition further stated that upon the 6th of May, 1897, three days prior to the execution and delivery of said assignment, the Second Ward Savings Bank caused judgment to be entered in the superior court by confession upon said judgment notes as follows, namely, a certain judgment for $24,111.10, damages and costs, and a certain other judgment for the sum of $1,086.53, damages and costs, and that on said 6th day of May, 1897, executions issued on said judgments were delivered to F. G. Isenring, sheriff of Milwaukee county, who on that day levied upon, all and singular, the property of the said assignor, and ever since had and retained the custody of, and claimed the right to sell, the same, by virtue of said executions.

It was further stated in said petition that at the time of the execution of said assignment, and the time of the entering and docketing of the said judgments, said Louis Henes, Jr., was insolvent, and that it appeared from his books and papers in the possession of the petitioner, and from statements made by him to petitioner, that said assignor on the 6th day of May, 1897, owed debts to the amount of about $57,000, and that "according to the best knowledge, information, and belief of your petitioner, the assets of said assignor consisted of the divers items therein stated, of the cash value of not to exceed $10,000;" that at the time of the execution and delivery of the said judgment notes said Louis Henes, Jr., was insolvent, and that at the time of the receipt of said judgment notes by said Second Ward Savings Bank it knew, or had reasonable cause to believe, said assignor to be insolvent; and that at the time of the execution and delivery of said assignment, and of the entry of the aforesaid judgments, said assignor was insolvent. It alleged demand by the assignee of the sheriff for possession of, all and singular, the property of the assignor so levied on, under and pursuant to the provisions of chapter 334 of the Laws of Wisconsin for the year 1897, but that the said sheriff and the said Second Ward Savings Bank refused, and still did refuse, "to deliver up possession thereof to your petitioner." And the petitioner prayed the order of the court in the premises, requiring said sheriff to deliver and turn over to him, as such assignee, all and singular, the property levied upon by him as aforesaid, under and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided.

An affidavit was read at the hearing, made by one Charles C. Schmidt, one of the general officers of the Second Ward Savings Bank, a judgment creditor, to the effect that he was and had been cashier of such bank for many years, and, as such officer, personally conducted the transactions mentioned in the affidavit and order to show cause, and knew all the circumstances connected with and surrounding the same; that the judgments mentioned and order to show cause were entered and docketed, and the executions issued and delivered to the sheriff of Milwaukee county, and the levies and seizures thereon were made on the 4th day of May, 1897, and not on the 6th day of May, 1897, as alleged in said affidavit; and, further, that, at the time of the receipt of the judgment notes by the bank from said assignor, the said bank did not know, nor did affiant or any of the other officers of said bank, nor did they or either or any of them, have any cause to believe, that the assignor herein was insolvent; that the bank accepted and received both of said judgment notes from the assignor on the dates mentioned in the affidavit, in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Upon the hearing, on motion by the attorneys for each and all of said parties, it was ordered that said circuit court assume and take jurisdiction of the matters set forth in said petition and order, and of the parties appearing therein. And it was ordered that the prayer of said petition be and was thereby granted, and that by reason of said voluntary assignment the levies set forth in said petition be, and they were thereby dissolved; and said sheriff was directed to forthwith turn over to said assignee, all and singular, the property levied upon by him under the executions. From said order the said Second Ward Savings Bank appealed.

Messrs. Howard & Mallory, for appellant:

Rev. Stat. § 1693a, was before this court in McCaul v. Thayer, 70 Wis. 188, in which case it was held that an execution levy made under a judgment entered within sixty days prior to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, upon a judgment note given by the assignor more than sixty days prior to such assignment, is not void.

The provisions of chapter 384 of the Laws of 1897, providing for the dissolution of process and levies upon the making of a voluntary assignment by the debtor, cannot be held to apply to execution levies made under judgments entered upon judgment notes given more than sixty days prior to the making of such assignment, and long prior to the passage of said chapter 384, Laws of 1897.

To hold otherwise would be to sanction an impairment of the obligation of the contract between appellant and respondent's assignor.

The remedy given to appellant, to enforce the right given to him by the execution of the judgment notes in this case, by the law as it existed at the time of the execution of said notes, was to enter judgment, issue execution thereon, levy upon the property of the debtor and sell the same to satisfy its debt. And, at the time of the execution of the judgment notes in this case, this right could not be taken away by the making of a voluntary assignment by the debtor, providing that the judgment note, upon which judgment was entered, was given more than sixty days prior to the making of such assignment.

Hon. John F. Dillon, in 5 Am. L. Reg. N. S. p. 91, says that such decisions may in a general way be divided into three classes:

One class maintains that the obligation of a contract, legally regarded, consists in the remedy which the law gives to enforce it, and as a consequence, the efficiency of the remedy cannot be impaired without thereby impairing the obligation. Another class broadly distinguishes between obligation and remedy, and maintains that the remedy may be changed or even wholly taken away by the legislature without contravening the Constitution of the United States.

But the prevailing view is a middle one between these extremes, and asserts the doctrine that the remedy may be changed in the regular and ordinary course of legislation, provided it is not destroyed, or the rights which existed in favor of the creditor at the time the contract was made are not substantially interfered with, seriously embarrassed, or defeated.

No definite lines have been drawn between the obligations of a contract and permitted changes of remedies. Every case has been and must be determined upon its own circumstances.

Any statute is unconstitutional, as impairing the obligation of contracts, which introduces a change into the express terms of the contract, its legal construction, its validity, or discharge.

The remedy provided by law for the enforcement of a contract is no part of its obligation,—unless included in the express terms of the contract,—and whatever pertains merely to the remedy may be changed, modified, or abrogated by the legislature in its discretion to any extent, provided a substantive remedy be still left to the creditor, and such changes may constitutionally apply to existing contracts.

The time within which a remedy may be exercised may be limited or extended for a definite and reasonable period.

Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 582, 76 Am. Dec. 288.

The fact that the substituted or remaining remedy is less beneficial does not make the change unconstitutional.

Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 811, 11 L. ed. 148; Curtis v. Whitney, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 68, 20 L. ed. 513; Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 580, 76 Am. Dec. 288; *Streubel v. Milwaukee & M. R. Tested by the few general principles laid down by the courts, chapter 384 is constitutional.

The remedy in question on this appeal was a purely special, statutory remedy, permitting a preference, and was subject to change.

Pinney, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Except as to a matter of costs in the entry of the largest judgment against Louis Henes, the question involved in these appeals is whether chapter 384, Laws 1897, as applied to the facts stated, is unconstitutional, as impairing the obligation of the contracts contained in the notes and warrants of attorney upon which the judgments above set forth were entered; the respondent claiming that this statute is a permitted change of the existing remedy, while the defendant bank claims that the statute is a law impairing the obligation of these contracts, and its substantial rights under them, and therefore void, under the provisions of the Constitutions of the state and of the United States, prohibiting the passage of any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The act in question took effect April 30, 1897, and is "An Act to Amend Chapter 80, Rev. Stat. for 1878, Entitled, 'Of Voluntary Assignments.'" It provides that "whenever the property of an insolvent debtor is attached or levied upon by virtue of any process in favor of a creditor, or a garnishment is made against such a debtor, such debtor may, within ten days thereafter, make an assignment of all his property and estate not exempt by law, for the equal benefit of all his creditors, as provided by law; whereupon all such attachments, levies, garnishments, or other processes shall be dissolved and the property attached or levied upon shall be turned over to such assignee or receiver." The act is a general one, and is an amendment to and a part of the voluntary assignment law of the state, which, taken in connection with the act providing for the discharge of a debtor (Laws 1889, chap. 385), is, in substance and effect, an insolvent or bankrupt law, and as such permitted, in the absence of Federal legislation. The notes and warrants of attorney had been given more than sixty days before the passage of the act. The remedy given to the appellant at the time these contracts were made was to enter judgment pursuant to the warrants of attorney, issue execution thereon, and levy the same upon the property of the debtor, and sell it to satisfy the debt. This right, at the time the notes and warrants of attorney were given, could not be taken away by the making of a voluntary assignment by the debtor, if the notes and warrants of attorney upon which the judgment was entered had been given more than sixty days prior to the making of such assignment, even though the maker was insolvent at the time they were given, and when the judgment was entered. McCaul v. Thayer, 70 Wis. 188. Section 1693a, Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat., provides that "every execution levy made under a judgment confessed against any such insolvent debtor within sixty days prior to any assignment for the benefit of creditors, or under a judgment entered on a judgment note, by any such debtor, within sixty days prior to any such assignment, and the lien of any such judgments upon real estate, shall be void and of no effect."

In McCaul v. Thayer, 70 Wis. 188, this section was before the court for consideration; and it was held that an execution levy made under a judgment entered within sixty days prior to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, upon a judgment note given by the assignor more than sixty days prior to such assignment, was not void. The court, by Orton, J., said that the only mischiefs to be cured by the act were acts of the debtor by which he preferred creditors, and prevented "the equal distribution of his property among all of his creditors," and that the entry of judgment at the instance of the plaintiff or creditor alone, "upon a judgment note given," was in no sense his act at the time of such entry. "He is entirely passive. He can do nothing to aid it or to prevent it. He has given a power of attorney, which is irrevocable, because coupled with an interest. The entry of judgment on such a note by the creditor is not one of the evils or within the mischief to be cured, or named in the title, or within the purview of the law." "The rights of the parties had become fixed by the giving of such a note when it was lawful and could not possibly change the condition of the debtor as to his creditors, or prevent the equal distribution of his property among them." And that "the entry of judgment is a mere legal consequence of the giving of the judgment note. It is not a new act by the debtor, but a natural and legal result, beyond his control," that "the judgment, so to speak, is embodied within the note, and a necessary part and essential element of it, and the note naturally changes its form into a judgment of record, under the statute." And, further commenting upon such securities, he said: "A judgment note is a security, and a valuable one, to the holder, and it is so recited in the power of attorney. This method of business has grown into the very necessities of our business of banking, merchandising, commerce, and of buying and selling in all forms, and of exchange. It is the most common as well as the most valuable method of security in connection with commercial paper, and to destroy or discredit it would derange and unsettle the business of the country, and seriously affect the public interests."

The contention that the debtor could prevent the entry of judgment indirectly, by making an assignment, was combated, as not within the intention of the legislature, as it would work a violation of the contract rights of such a creditor. It was further laid down that the power of attorney to enter judgment upon the note when due, and which gave the note the name and character of a judgment note, added value thereto in the market, as well as intrinsically, "and that value neither the debtor nor the legislature has any right to lessen by prohibiting its use in entering judgment by any pretext of technical or legal fraud;" and it was there held that the 2d clause of § 2, chap. 349, Laws 1883, should be construed as if it read, "or under a judgment entered on a judgment note made by any such debtor within sixty days prior to any such assignment." Under the decision in McCaul v. Thayer, 70 Wis. 188, judgment notes were thus placed upon a basis by which they were greatly increased in value, and a much more extended use was made of them by merchants, bankers, and business men, as securities.

The remedy given to the appellant by the law in force at the time these notes and warrants of attorney were given, and which entered into, and formed a part of, the contracts, and made them particularly valuable, was to enter judgment, issue execution, and levy upon the property of the debtor, and sell the same to satisfy the debt. The debtor could not defeat it by revoking the warrant of attorney. The notes and warrants of attorney were potentially judgments upon which an execution could be speedily issued and levied. They were substantially preferences legally and properly acquired by the appellant over all other creditors of the defendant. The time within which they might be questioned by the assignee of the maker, under his voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors, had expired, and the preferences had become absolute, before the act of 1897 became operative. The effect of the statute upon these contracts, according to its terms, was to enable the debtor (assignor) to revoke the remedy thus given, and to render these securities as a means of reaching and selling his property to satisfy the judgments thereon of no value whatever. It authorized and empowered the debtor, at his option, to withdraw his property from a levy for that purpose, and defeat the remedy which made them especially valuable; and, if the contention of the respondents is maintained, the remedy secured by these contracts might thus be utterly defeated at the option of the assignor. The orders appealed from, pursuant to the statute, dissolved the levy made, and rescued the property from the hands of the sheriff and the creditor thus rightfully pursuing it, to work out the remedy secured to him by the law of the contracts. It is contended in support of the act that it is a part of the state system of insolvency or bankruptcy, and that it is legislation which relates to the remedy, and so within the constitutional competency of the legislature.

In Edwards v. Kearney, 96 U. S. 600, 24 L. ed. 796, it was said that "the obligation of a contract includes everything within its obligatory scope. Among these elements nothing is more important than the means of enforcement. This is the breath of its vital existence. Without it, the contract, as such, in view of the law, ceases to be, and falls into the class of those 'imperfect obligations,' as they are termed, which depend for their fulfillment upon the will and conscience of those upon whom they rest. The ideas of right and remedy are inseparable. 'Want of right and want of remedy are the same thing. . . . A statute providing that a previous contract of indebtedment may be extinguished by a process of bankruptcy would involve its discharge; and a statute forbidding the sale of any of the debtor's property under a judgment upon such a contract would relate to the remedy.' . . . It cannot be doubted, either upon principle or authority, that each of such laws would violate the obligation of the contract, and the last not less than the first. These propositions seem to us too clear to require discussion. It is also the settled doctrine of this court, that the laws which subsist at the time and place of making a contract enter into and form a part of it, as if they were expressly referred to or incorporated in its terms. This rule embraces alike those which affect its validity, construction, discharge, and enforcement."

In Green v. Biddle, 21 U. S. 8 Wheat. 1, 5 L. ed. 547, the court said: "It is no answer that the acts of Kentucky, now in question, are regulations of the remedy, and not of the right to lands. If those acts so change the nature and extent of existing remedies, as materially to impair the rights and interests of the owner, they are just as much a violation of the compact as if they directly overturned his rights and interests." And it was further said [42 U. S. 1 How. 816, 11 L. ed. 145] that: "whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract. But if that effect is produced, it is immaterial whether it is done by acting on the remedy, or directly on the contract itself. In either case it is prohibited by the Constitution,"—and that the test as to whether a contract has been impaired is whether its value has, by legislation, been diminished. It is not, by the Constitution, to be impaired at all. This is not a question of degree or manner or cause, but of encroaching in any respect on its obligation,—dispensing with any part of its force. Planter's Bank v. Sharp, 47 U. S. 6 How. 801, 12 L. ed. 447.

In Antoni v. Greenhow, 107 U. S. 769, 27 L. ed. 468, it was said that "it is competent for the state to change the form of the remedy, or to modify it otherwise as they may see fit, provided no substantial right secured by the contract is thereby impaired. . . . Whenever the result last mentioned is produced, the act is within the prohibition of the Constitution and to that extent void."

In Brine v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. 96 U. S. 627-637, 24 L. ed. 858-861, it was held, through Mr. Justice Miller, that "all the laws of a state existing at the time a mortgage or any other contract is made which affect the rights of the parties to the contract, enter into and become a part of it, and are obligatory on all courts which assume to give a remedy on such contracts; [that] the construction, validity, and effect [of contracts] are governed by the place where they are made and are to be performed. . . . It is therefore said that these laws enter into, and become a part of, the contract. There is no doubt that a distinction has been drawn, or attempted to be drawn, between such laws as regulate the rights of the parties, and such as apply only to the remedy. It may be conceded that in some cases such a distinction exists. In the recent case of Tennessee, Bloomstein, v. Sneed, 96 U. S. 69, 24 L. ed. 810, we [the court] held that, so long as there remained a sufficient remedy on the contract, an act of the legislature changing the form of the remedy did not impair the obligation of the contract. But this doctrine was said to be subject to the limitation that there remained a remedy which was complete, and which secured all the substantial rights of the party. . . . At all events, the decisions of this court are numerous that the laws which prescribe the mode of enforcing a contract, which are in existence when it is made, are so far a part of the contract that no change in these laws which seriously interfere with that enforcement are valid, because they impair its obligation within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States." Edwards v. Kearney, 96 U. S. 595, 24 L. ed. 793. And the learned justice, enforcing his argument, quoted from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the case of Bronson v. Kinzie, 42 U. S. 1 How. 816, 11 L. ed. 145, as follows: "Whatever belongs merely to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contracts, but if that effect is produced it is immaterial whether it is done by acting on the remedy or directly on the contract itself. In either case it is prohibited by the Constitution." And further that "it is manifest that the obligation of the contract, and the rights of a party under it, may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether, or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing. And no one, we presume, would say that there is any substantial difference between a retrospective law declaring a particular contract or class of contracts to be abrogated and void, and one which took away all remedy to enforce them, or encumbered it with conditions that rendered it useless or impracticable to pursue it."

In Denny v. Bennett, 123 U. S. 497, 32 L. ed. 494, quoting the language of the court in Gilman v. Lockwood, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 409, 18 L. ed. 432, it was said that "state legislatures may pass insolvent laws, provided there be no act of Congress establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy conflicting with their provisions, and provided that the law itself be so framed that it does not impair the obligation of contracts."

The whole subject of legislation in violation of these constitutional provisions is elaborately considered in the recent case of Barnitz v. Beverly, 168 U. S. 118, 41 L. ed. 93, in which it is laid down that, "the obligation of a contract consists in its binding force on the party who makes it. This depends on the laws in existence when it is made. These are necessarily referred to in all contracts, and forming a part of them as the measure of the obligation to perform them by the one party, and the right acquired by the other. There can be no other standard by which to ascertain the extent of either than that which the terms of the contract indicate, according to their settled legal meaning. When it becomes consummated, the law defines the duty and the right, compels one party to perform the thing contracted for, and gives the other a right to enforce the performance by the remedies then in force. If any subsequent law affect to diminish the duty, or to impair the right, it necessarily bears on the obligation of the contract, in favor of one party to the injury of the other; hence any law which, in its operation, amounts to a denial or obstruction of the rights accruing by a contract, though professing to act only on the remedy, is directly obnoxious to the prohibition of the Constitution." And it is obvious it can make no difference as to the character of the law,—whether it be an insolvent law, or a law upon any other subject, having the effect indicated. Denny v. Bennett, 128 U. S. 497, 32 L. ed. 494.

The extent of the power of the legislature over remedies was fully considered and discussed in the case of Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 560, 76 Am. Dec. 283, and cases cited; and the result was reached that the legislature possesses the power of changing or modifying laws governing proceedings in courts of justice, in respect to past as well as future contracts, and this power is unrestricted, except that a substantial remedy must be afforded according to the course of justice as it existed at the time the contract was made. Hasbrouck v. Shipman, 16 Wis. 297. The doctrine of the case of Edwards v. Kearzey, 96 U. S. 595, 24 L. ed. 798, that the remedy subsisting in a state when and where a contract is made and is to be performed is a part of the obligation, is now universal; and any legislation, though acting merely upon the remedy, that substantially impairs or lessens the value of the contract, is forbidden by the Constitution, and therefore void. People, Reynolds, v. Buffalo, 140 N. Y. 307.

The situation when the judgments are entered was this: The maker of the notes and warrants of attorney had become insolvent. The creditor bank invoked the remedy existing when the contracts were made, which entered into and formed a part of them, and made them valuable securities, by which they had become valid preferences. The law authorizing the entry of judgment on them, and immediate execution and levy thereof upon the debtor's property, had not been withdrawn. Judgments were entered, and levy was made accordingly upon a sufficient amount, it would seem, to pay a considerable part of the debt. The debtor thereupon elected to make, and did make, a voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors. By virtue of the assignment and the operation of the act in question, the creditor is deprived of the benefit of his lawful remedy, which we think was an essential part of the contracts or securities. By the subsequent action of the courts, executing the statute, the fruit of such lawful remedy, out of which to satisfy its debt, has been wholly wrested from its grasp, and turned over to the debtor's assignee for equal distribution among all his creditors, so that the amount which the creditor bank will probably receive from such property will be but a trifling sum. The remedy, therefore, which entered into and formed an important part of the contracts evidenced by the notes and warrants of attorney, within the meaning and effect of the decisions referred to, is practically abrogated and taken away.

Conceding that the legislation in question belongs to the class known as "remedial" it is still evident that the value of these contracts was materially lessened by and through its operation, and their validity and binding force were impaired. It is needless to add that legislation having such an operation or effect upon prior contracts cannot be justified or sustained because it relates to, or is amendatory of, state legislation on the subject of insolvency or bankruptcy. Existing contracts may be impaired by such legislation as well as by any other. We hold, therefore, that the provisions of the act in question, as applicable to notes and warrants of attorney, and judgments and executions to enforce the same, given more than sixty days before a subsequent assignment for the benefit of creditors, impair the validity, force, and effect of such contracts, and are therefore void.

2. It was argued that the larger judgment should be set aside because costs were included in it; that the proceeding was a special proceeding under the statute, upon which, by law, no costs could be allowed. It is sufficient, upon this point, to notice that by the warrant of attorney the defendant expressly stipulated for the entry of "judgment with costs." The supervision which courts exercise over judgments entered, as these were, upon warrants of attorney, is of an equitable character; and, as the costs were certainly reasonable in amount, the case does not present any equity or merit which should incline the court to vacate or set aside the judgment on that ground. Six days after the entry of the judgment the plaintiff bank remitted the item of "$25 by statute," taxed and included in the judgment, and declined to contend for it. Whatever error or irregularity there may have been in this respect must be held to have been cured, if not by the stipulation for release of errors, certainly by promptly remitting the item objected to. Re Ellis (No. 11, August term, 1897), 73 N. W. 887.

It follows from these views that the order of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee county, directing the sheriff of Milwaukee county to forthwith turn over to said assignee, all and singular, the property levied upon by him under said executions, must be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded, with directions that said court cause said property, or its proceeds, to be restored to the sheriff of Milwaukee county, to be disposed of and applied in satisfaction of the executions mentioned, and that the order of the Superior Court, appealed from by the Second Ward Savings Bank of Milwaukee must be reversed, with costs, and the cause remanded to that court, with directions to cause to be restored to the sheriff of Milwaukee county the property, or its proceeds, turned over by the order of that court to Henry C. Schranck as assignee of Louis Henes, Jr., to the end that it may be applied in satisfaction of the said judgments in favor of the Second Ward Savings Bank of Milwaukee against said Louis Henes, Jr., the assignor, and that the part of the order of said Superior Court refusing to vacate the said judgment and execution against the said Louis Henes, Jr., must be affirmed, with costs; and judgment is ordered accordingly:

Cassoday, Ch. J., dissenting:

The power of a state legislature to pass state insolvent laws was determined by the Supreme Court of the United States seventy years ago, but only after one of the most able and persistent controversies ever experienced by that exalted tribunal. Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 213-369, 6 L. ed. 606-659. It was there held that (1) in the absence of legislation by Congress on the subject a state had the authority to pass such a law; (2) that "a bankrupt or insolvent law of any state which discharges both the person of the debtor, and his future acquisitions of property, is not 'a law impairing the obligation of contracts,' so far as respects debts contracted subsequent to the passage of such law;" (8) but that a "certificate of discharge, under such a law, cannot be pleaded in bar of an action brought by a citizen of another state, in the courts of the United States, or of any other state than that where the discharge was obtained." There were at the time only seven members of the court, and Mr. Justice Johnson wrote the only opinion in support of the third proposition quoted, and was the only member of the court concurring in all three propositions stated. Marshall, Duval, and Story dissented from the first and second propositions, and Washington, Thompson, and Trimble dissented from the third proposition. The three propositions thus determined in that case have since been repeatedly acquiesced in by the whole court as the settled law of this country on the subject. Boyle v. Zacharie, 81 U. S. 6 Pet. 348, 635, 648, 8 L. ed. 428, 527, 532; Cook v. Moffat, 46 U. S. 5 How. 310, 12 L. ed. 166. Thus, it appears that the opinions of Mr. Justice Johnson were the controlling opinions in the case, and hence what he said about impairing the obligation of contracts may be instructive. "'Right' and 'obligation' are considered by all ethical writers as correlative terms. Whatever I by my contract give another a right to require of me, I by that act lay myself under an obligation to yield or bestow. The obligation of every contract will then consist of that right or power over my will or actions, which I, by my contract, confer on another. And that right and power will be found to be measured neither by moral law alone, nor universal law alone, nor by the laws of society alone, but by a combination of the three,—an operation in which the moral law is explained and applied by the law of nature, and both modified and adapted to the exigencies of society by positive law. The Constitution was framed for society, and an advanced state of society, in which I will undertake to say that all the contracts of men receive a relative, and not a positive, interpretation; for the rights of all must be held and enjoyed in subserviency to the good of the whole. The state construes them, the state applies them, the state controls them, and the state decides how far the social exercise of the rights they give us over each other can be justly asserted. . . . In the construction of their contracts they are controlled by the laws of the society of which they are members, and for the construction and enforcement of their contracts, they rest upon the functionaries of its government. They can enter into no contract which the laws of that community forbid, and the validity and effect of their contracts is what the existing laws give to them. The remedy is no longer retained in their own hands, but surrendered to the community, to a power competent to do justice, and bound to discharge towards them the acknowledged duties of government to society, according to received principles of equal justice. . . . When that state of things has arrived in which the community has fairly and fully discharged its duties to the creditor, and in which pursuing the debtor any longer would destroy the one, without benefiting the other, must always be a question to be determined by the common guardian of the rights of both, and in this originates the power exercised by governments in favor of insolvents." Ogden v. Saunders, 25 U. S. 12 Wheat. 281-283, 6 L. ed. 629, 630. And then, after stating that his views thus expressed were as applicable to contracts prior to the enactment as to those subsequently made, he said: "Whenever an individual enters into a contract, I think his assent is to be inferred, to abide by those rules in the administration of justice which belong to the jurisprudence of the country of the contract. And when compelled to pursue his debtor in other states, he is equally bound to acquiesce in the law of the forum to which he subjects himself. The law of the contract remains the same everywhere, and it will be the same in every tribunal; but the remedy necessarily varies, and with it the effect of the constitutional pledge, which can only have relation to the laws of distributive justice known to the policy of each state severally. It is very true that inconveniences may occasionally grow out of irregularities in the administration of justice by the states. But the citizen of the same state is referred to his influence over his own institutions for his security, and the citizens of the other states have the institutions and powers of the general government to resort to. And this is all the security the Constitution ever intended to hold out against the undue exercise of the power of the states over their own contracts and their own jurisprudence." Id. 285, L. ed. 630. And so it was held by the same court, prior to that decision, that while a state statute could not discharge a debtor from liability on debts contracted before its passage, and thus destroy the creditor's right of satisfaction out of the debtor's subsequent acquisitions of property, yet that it might take away his remedy, given by statute, to imprison the debtor, since such imprisonment was no part of the contract, and hence the debtor's release therefrom did not impair the contract. Sturges v. Crmonishield, 17 U. S. 4 Wheat. 123, 4 L. ed. 529. Thus, it is held by the same court that a state may, by statute, "reduce the rate of interest upon judgments previously obtained in its courts," without impairing the obligation of contracts, since such interest is given by statute, and not by contract. Morley v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 146 U. S. 162, 36 L. ed. 925. So, where a statute gave a lien for labor and materials contracted for, it has been held that "the lien is no part of the contract, but a merely incidental accompaniment, deriving its vitality from positive enactment, and liable always to be controlled, modified, or taken away by subsequent enactment." Frost v. Nisley, 54 Me. 845. So it was held by this court nearly forty years ago that an act of the legislature extending the time to answer in actions to foreclose a bond and mortgage previously given, from twenty days to six months, and also enlarging the time required for notice of sale of the mortgaged premises, was a valid enactment; that "the legislature may alter or vary existing remedies as they please, provided that in so doing their nature and extent is not so changed as materially to impair the rights and interests of the parties." Von Baumbach v. Bade, 9 Wis. 560, 76 Am. Dec. 283. This was held on the theory that a state statute may impair the remedy on an existing contract, without necessarily impairing the contract itself; that "the only limit or qualification to this power is, that the legislature must confine their action within the bounds of reason and justice, and not so prolong the time in which legal proceedings are to be had as to render them futile and useless in the hands of the creditor, or to seriously impair his rights or securities." Ibid.

In the case at bar the note and warrant of attorney were dated August 15, 1896. Chapter 884, Laws 1897, was published and went into effect April 30, 1897, and, among other things, provided that all attachments, levies, garnishments, or other process against an insolvent debtor, within ten days prior to an assignment for the benefit of creditors, made by such debtor, shall be dissolved, and the property attached or levied upon be turned over to the assignee. The judgment in question was entered upon the warrant of attorney May 4, 1897. On the same day execution was issued thereon and levied on certain personal property of the debtor. Six days thereafter the debtor made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of his creditors. It is conceded that the judgment was rightfully entered, because it was so expressly stipulated in the contract; but, although the contract released all intervening errors in the entering of the judgment or the issuing of the execution, yet the only right to execution was by existing remedial statutes, and not by virtue of the contract itself. The act does not undertake to discharge the debtor from subsequent debts,—much less from prior debts. In 1883 insolvent debtors were prohibited from giving preferences to one creditor over another in making assignments. Later statutes limited to a certain extent the right of creditors of such insolvent debtors to obtain preferences in certain ways, and within a specified time prior to the making of such assignment by the debtors. Sanborn & Berryman, Anno. Stat. § 1693a. The act in question was manifestly designed to narrow such limits still further, and to secure, at least to some extent, a more equal distribution of the estates of insolvent debtors. The insolvent laws of several states expressly provide for dissolving attachments and releasing levies on the property of insolvent debtors under certain conditions. It would seem that in some of them the question here presented, as to prior contracts, must have arisen and been adjudicated soon after such enactments; but we have been referred to no case, and I have not had the time to search for any. Upon general principles, and under the authorities cited, it seems to me that state legislatures have the power, by the enactment of general laws, to secure an equal distribution of the estate of an insolvent debtor, even as to prior debts or nonresident creditors. There is another line of cases supporting these views. It has been held by numerous decisions, state and Federal, that the discharge of the debtor under a state insolvent law in the state of his domicile will not release him from debts owing to nonresidents, even where such insolvent laws were enacted prior to the contract, unless the nonresident creditor has proved his claim, or become a party to the proceedings. Cook v. Moffat, 46 U. S. 5 How. 295, 13 L. ed. 159; Baldwin v. Hale, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 223, 17 L. ed. 531; Gilman v. Lockwood, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 409, 18 L. ed. 432; Stirn v. McQuade, 66 N. H. 408; Kelsey v. Drury, 9 Allen, 27; Guernsey v. Wood, 180 Mass. 508; Phanix Nat. Bank v. Batcheller, 151 Mass. 589, 8 L. R. A. 644. In other words, such nonresident creditor, not proving his claim, nor becoming a party to the proceedings, is no more affected by the insolvency proceedings than a creditor whose debt was contracted prior to the enactment of the insolvent law. In Denny v. Bennett, 128 U. S. 489, 32 L. ed. 491, Purdy & Co. sued Van Norman & Bro. in a state court of Minnesota, and attached a part of their goods December 31, 1883. On the same day Van Norman & Bro. made an assignment to Bennett, under the state law, for the benefit of such creditors as proved up their claims. On the same day Lopp & Flersham sued Van Norman & Bro. in the United States circuit court, and the United States marshal, Denny, attached a portion of their goods, but did not prove up their claim in the insolvency proceedings. Thereupon the assignee, Bennett, sued the United States marshal, Denny, for the value of the goods so taken by him, and obtained judgment in the state court, which was affirmed in the supreme court of Minnesota. [Bennett v. Denny] 38 Minn. 580. And that judgment was affirmed on writ of error by the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is held, in effect, that a discharge from debts under the insolvent laws of a state did not release debts due to a citizen of another state, who had not proved up his claim, nor submitted to the jurisdiction of the state court; that the assignee, Bennett, under the state law, was entitled to the property, against such foreign creditor so attaching the same in the United States circuit court, and the depriving of such foreign creditor of any remedy, as against the goods so attached and assigned, was permissible, and did not impair the obligations of such contract. Such lien by such attachment in a suit in favor of a nonresident in the Federal court was no more subject to be dissolved by the insolvency proceedings than an attachment or levy in the state court in favor of a resident creditor upon a contract made prior to the insolvent statute. The same court has since held in effect, that a deed of conveyance made by an insolvent debtor to a nonresident creditor by way of preference may be avoided by state insolvency proceedings within the time limited therein, notwithstanding such foreign creditors were not served with process, and could not have been compelled to become parties to the insolvency proceedings, even if they had been served. Brown v. Smart, 69 Md. 320. Affirmed 145 U. S. 454, 36 L. ed. 773. This was on the theory that the property and debtor were within the state, and the jurisdiction was in rem. As indicated, the act in question does not undertake to discharge the insolvent debtor, nor to exempt his subsequent acquisition of property, but merely to prevent preferences, to the extent mentioned, out of such of the insolvent's estate as existed at the time of making the assignment. It merely suspends the ordinary effect of such levy during the ten days immediately preceding such assignment. In my judgment, and in view of the adjudications cited, the act did not impair the obligation of contracts, even as to the debt previously contracted.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF WISCONSIN.

JOHN V. FARWELL COMPANY

v.

George HILTON, Assignee, etc., of M. Kruschke, et al.

(84 Fed. Rep. 298.)

Replevin for goods fraudulently purchased may be maintained without tendering back a partial payment of the consideration, if the purchaser has realized from sales more than the amount which he has paid.

(December 24, 1897.)

MOTION for judgment non obstante veredicto or for new trial after verdict in favor of defendant in an action to recover goods sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant's assignors which were procured by them by fraudulent representations. New trial granted.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thompson, Harshaw, & Thompson and D. K. Tenney, for plaintiff:

Where a person obtains goods fraudulently, and disposes of and receives the proceeds of the same, to an amount greater than his payments, the money so received by him is in reality the property of the plaintiff, and, he already having in his hands an amount of money greater than that which he has paid, he is not only theoretically, but practically, in a better position than at the time of the contract; he cannot be heard to say that he has not been restored by the plaintiff to the possession he was in at the time of the making of the contract.

One who has rescinded a contract of settlement on the ground of fraud and illegality is not bound to tender what he has received in settlement, before bringing his action at law.

Springfield F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hull, 51 Ohio St. 270, 25 L. R. A. 87; Bebout v. Bodle, 38 Ohio St. 500; Allerton v. Allerton, 50 N. Y. 670; Smith v. Solomon, 7 Daly, 216; Baird v. Howard, 51 Ohio St. 57, 22 L. R. A. 848; Potter v. Taggart, 59 Wis. 1.

Under the maxim that the law does not require a vain thing to be done, a tender before bringing suit will not be deemed necessary if the vendee has parted with the goods in whole or in part, or in any way has put it beyond his power to make restitution.

Henry L. Crane Boot & Shoe Co. v. Trentman, 84 Fed. Rep. 620.

Where the right to rescind springs from discovery of fraud, there is an exception to the rule; the defrauded party does not lose his right to rescind because the contract has been partly executed, and the parties cannot be fully restored to their former position.

Mr. F. W. Houghton, for defendants:

A judgment non obstante veredicto is rendered only when the plea confesses a cause of action and the matter relied upon in avoidance is insufficient, although found true, to constitute either a defense or a bar to the action.

A vendor who was induced to sell the vendee by fraudulent representations cannot, after receiving payments from the vendee, rescind the sale and replevy the goods sold without returning to the vendee the payments so received, even though the vendee has sold goods of a greater value than the amount so paid to the vendor.

NOTE.—The above case is, as the opinion states, "one of the recognized exceptions" to the general rule that the status quo must be restored before rescission of a contract can be made operative. This is because the vendee had received as proceeds of the property fraudulently obtained more than he had paid to the vendor.

The intimation in the note to Sisson v. Hill (R. 39 L. R. A.

I.) 21 L. R. A. 208, that the case is opposed to the current of authority, although criticised in the opinion in the present case, seems to be fully justified by the decisions. That case did not come within the exception above stated, but that exception was recognized and clearly pointed out in the note to Sisson v. Hill on page 209.

In all actions of trover or replevin to recover the property parted with, and in all actions based solely upon the original relations between the parties, the plaintiff must show that he rescinded the fraudulent contract before the commencement of the action.

Tisdale v. Buckmore, 83 Me. 461; Stevens v. Hyde, 32 Barb. 171; Thompson v. Peck, 115 Ind. 512, 1 L. R. A. 201; Stuart v. Hayden, 36 U. S. App. 463, 72 Fed. Rep. 402, 18 C. C. A. 618; Pangborn v. Ruemenapp, 74 Mich. 578.

The party electing to rescind must also place the other party as nearly as possible in statu quo. To do this, if he has received anything under the contract, whether it be property or securities, he must restore it. To this general rule there may be an exception of the case where that which was received was absolutely worthless. But the burden to show this would be on the party who had failed to restore it.

Cooley, Torts, p. 504.

If a party would rescind a contract of sale on the ground of fraud on the part of the vendee, it is his duty to return what he has received in payment before he can maintain an action for the goods sold.

Seaman, District Judge, delivered the following opinion:

The action is replevin for goods purchased by the assignor under fraudulent representations which induced the sale, and the verdict is special, rendered by direction of the court, finding in favor of the defendants for the value of all goods purchased on and prior to March 23, 1897, and in favor of the plaintiff for all the goods which were purchased after that date. The direction of alverdict in favor of the defendants for the value of the goods covered by the earlier purchases was founded wholly upon the view that replevin could not be maintained because payments had been made and accepted by the plaintiff to the amount of $1,411,—which were made generally upon account and were clearly applicable to the first purchase of goods, embracing the invoices down to and including March 23, 1897,—and there was neither return nor tender of the amount so paid; and this, notwithstanding the undisputed fact that goods had been sold from such purchases by the assignor prior to his assignment in excess of the amount so paid. If this view of the law was correct, or even if it appears to be supported by the weight of authority, the verdict should not be disturbed, as I should deem it proper to leave it for determination on writ of error, if I entertained serious doubt as to the doctrine applicable in such case. But an examination of the authorities cited for and against the proposition, and consideration of the grounds which lie at the foundation of the general and well-settled rule that the status quo must be restored before rescission of the contract can be made operative, convince me that the case in that regard is within one of the recognized exceptions to the rule; and that tender of the amount paid on account of the purchases was not essential to rescission, the condition precedent for replevin of the goods remaining on hand, because it appears beyond dispute that goods included in the same purchase, and not found, had been sold by the vendee exceeding the aggregate of such payments, both in the invoice value and in the amount realized from such sales.

The general doctrine clearly prevails that a voidable contract cannot be rescinded in part while affirmed as to the residue; that the right to treat the transaction as though no contract were entered into does not allow the retention of any advantages derived under the contract relation. The authorities recognize exceptions to this rule, although the broad exception stated in Parsons on Contracts as to all cases in which fraud constitutes the ground for rescission does not appear to have found acceptance. But the transaction in question is, in my opinion, entitled to exception as a whole by reason of the sales by the vendee out of his fraudulent purchase, as the severance is his act, depriving the defrauded vendor of any opportunity to exercise his election to rescind as to such goods; and the remittances sent to the vendor, being received before discovery of the fraud and within the invoice value, are justly applicable to the conversion by way of indemnity, and its retention will not, under the circumstances, be treated as ratification of the contract. Assuming, as it must be assumed here, that the purchase was effected through the fraudulent representations of the vendee, he made these sales in perpetuation of that fraud. To return to him the amount so paid over would operate as a premium upon fraud, giving him all the benefits at the expense of the defrauded party. Instead of restoring the status quo, such requirement would aggravate the injury and contravene the purposes of the rule. In Sisson v. Hill, 18 R. I. 212, 21 L. R. A. 207; Sloane v. Shaffer, 156 Pa. 59; Schofield v. Shaffer, 156 Pa. 65; Henry L. Crane Boot & Shoe Co. v. Trentman, 84 Fed. Rep. 620; and other cases cited on behalf of the plaintiff,—similar questions were clearly presented, and repayment or tender was held unnecessary to effect rescission; and I am of opinion that the conclusions there reached are within, and not opposed to, the current of authority, notwithstanding the note to that effect appended to Sisson v. Hill (R. I.) in 21 L. R. A. 207, 18 R.

I. 212. The case of Thompson v. Peck, 115 Ind. 512, 1 L. R. A. 201, cited as holding contra, is clearly distinguishable in the fact that the entire consideration which was paid or received upon two separate contracts was retained (the notes being held prima facie payment in that state), while the verdict gave recovery for goods derived under all the contracts of purchase indiscriminately. Clearly, no ground was established for the exception of such transactions from the rule. Neither Stuart v. Hayden, 86 U. S. App. 462, 18 C. C. A. 618, and 72 Fed. Rep. 403, nor the other authorities cited by defendants, seem to me applicable upon the state of facts shown in this case. I am constrained, therefore, to the opinion that the verdict must be set aside; and it is so ordered.

The motion for judgment non obstante verdicto must be denied, as the case is not, in my opinion, within the line to which such action is applicable. Neither is the verdict in such shape that the finding in question can be disregarded, and judgment be entered for the plaintiff as to the value of the goods in the first purchase. Let orders be entered accordingly.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Respt.,
v.
TRUCKEE LUMBER COMPANY, Appt.
(116 Cal. 397.)

1. Pollution of the water of a river by means of refuse from a sawmill, so as to destroy the fish therein, is a nuisance.

NOTE.—Governmental control over right of fishery.

Some control over rights of fishery has always been exercised and upheld by the courts. Even in case of fisheries in the ocean the government may control the conduct of its own citizens, although, without treaty regulations, the modern rule seems to be that such control cannot be extended beyond the 3-mile line as against citizens of foreign states.

By 46 & 47 Vict. chap. 22, regulations are made for the exclusive fishery limits of the British islands and for British fishing-boats outside of such limits, and the jurisdiction of an offense is given to sea-fishery officers, and their jurisdiction is held to be exclusive. Queen v. Cubitt, L. R. 22 Q. B. Div. 622.

If the political branch of the government assumes jurisdiction over a certain water, the courts will not inquire into it, but will act upon the jurisdiction so assumed. The Kodiak, 53 Fed. Rep. 128.

By a convention between England and France regulations were made as to fishing upon the seas lying between the two countries. By the English act to enforce the convention, jurisdiction over violations of it is given to justices of the peace, and therefore no action can be maintained in the Queen's bench for injuries done by a violation of the act. Marshall v. Nicholls, 16 Jur. 1155, 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 343, 12 Q. B. 882.

The award of the arbitrators under the arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the seal fisheries determined 89 L. R. A.

2. The state has a right to protect fish in all streams through which they have freedom of passage to and from the public fishing grounds, although they flow over lands entirely subject to private ownership.

3. The source, course, and destination of the rivers of the state are a matter of judicial cognizance.

The seal fishery act of 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. chap. 19) provides that a person belonging to a British ship shall not kill, or take, or hunt, or attempt to kill or take, any seal within Behring sea during the period limited by the order, and places upon a person found within the sea the burden of showing that he was not violating the act. The Oscar and Hattie v. Reg. 23 Can. S. C. 396.

After the award of the arbitrators the United States passed a statute prohibiting its citizens from taking seals within 60 geographical miles of the Pribilof islands, which the courts will enforce. The James G. Swan, 77 Fed. Rep. 473.

Section 1956, Rev. Stat. of the United States, forbade the killing of seals within the limits of Alaska territory or the waters thereof, except by persons authorized to do so by the government. The Kodiak, 53 Fed. Rep. 128.

And all licensed vessels found within the prohibited zone are presumed to have been violating the act. United States v. The Jane Gray, 77 Fed. Rep. 908.

If the government contracts with an individual to permit his killing a certain number of seals each year in its fisheries, the contract will be broken so as to entitle the other party to damages

In Queen v. The Ainoko, 4 Can. Exch. 195, it was held that the mere presence of a ship within the zone prohibited by the act of regulating the seal fisheries owing to a bona fide mistake in the master's calculations will not justify a forfeiture of the vessel.

Under the British act of 1891, relating to the Behring seal fisheries, a vessel found within the prohibited limits in order to escape forfeiture was bound to show that fishing or shipping implements on board had not been used for illegal sealing during the voyage. Queen v. The Oscar and Hattie, 3 Can. Exch. 241.

If a body of water is wholly within the dominion of a country it may regulate the public right of fishing therein, and the regulations will apply to acts done more than 3 miles from the shore. Mowat v. McFee, 5 Can. S. C. 65.

In The Grace, 4 Can. Exch. 283, it is said that it is an axiom of international law that every state is entitled to declare that fishing on its coasts is an exclusive right of its own subjects.

In case a river forms the boundary between two states, each state has the power to exclude the citizens of the other state from fishing on its side of the middle line of the stream, and it has exclusive power to regulate the fisheries within such limits. Re Mattson, 69 Fed. Rep. 535.

By the compact between Maryland and Virginia, Virginia has the right to make such regulations, with the consent of Maryland, as may be necessary to protect its fisheries, and when the regulations are properly made and consented to they may be enforced in Virginia against citizens of Maryland. *Hendricks v. A body of water having well-defined shores and no current, lying entirely in the state of Iowa a quarter of a mile from the main channel of the Mississippi river and forming no part of that river for the purpose of navigation, is within the jurisdiction of Iowa, and within the provisions of a statute against the use of seines in the waters of that state, and not within an exception of boundary waters. State v. Haug, 95 Iowa, 413, 29 L. R. A. 390.

Under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of 1818, and the British and Canadian laws to enforce it, a United States fishing vessel is liable to seizure and confiscation if after throwing its net into the sea it is permitted to drift within the 3-mile limit, and proceeds to secure the fish from the net there. Queen v. The Frederick Gerring, Jr. 5 Can. Exch. 164. Affirmed The Frederick Gerring Jr., v. Queen, 27 Can. S. C. 271.

The 3-mile limit does not apply to the great lakes but the sovereignty of the respective states reaches to the boundary line between them, and a foreign vessel may be condemned if it is found fishing over the boundary line contrary to the laws of the 89 L. R. A.

As against the general government, the state may make regulations for the protection of fisheries within bays upon its coast which are not more than 6 miles wide at the mouth, and such regulations may be enforced against vessels licensed under the laws of the general government. *Manchester v. The dominion parliament in Canada has the right to legislate on the subject of fishery regulations. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

The dominion has no authority over the question of the right to take fish from particular waters. And it therefore has no right to lease private rights of fishery in the waters. This right belongs to the province. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

The dominion Parliament has the right to control in such manner as in its discretion shall seem expedient all deep-sea fishing, and the right to take all fish ordinarily caught either on the sea coast or in the great lakes or in the rivers of the dominion, and such as are valuable for food within the dominion, or for exportation for that purpose, or for any other purpose of trade and commerce, and must include as well the right to catch fish as the designation and control of the places where the fish may be caught and the times and manner of catching them. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

The legislature has the authority to regulate the taking of fish within the state, and to inflict penalties for a violation of their regulations. Burnham v. Webster, 5 Mass. 206.

This is particularly true so far as the public rights are concerned. These have always been held to be under the control of the government.

Power to grant rights to individual.

The effect of the rule that the government has control over the public rights of fishery is that it may take away the public right and vest it in an individual.

Prior to Magna Charta the Crown had the right to create a several fishery in tidal water which be could grant to a private individual even after the adoption of that statute. Malcolmson v. O'Dea, 10 H. L. Cas. 568, 9 Jur. N. S. 1135, 9 L. T. N. S. 93, 12 Week. Rep. 178.

Where the provisions of Magna Charta are not in force, as in the province of Quebec, the Crown in right of the province may grant exclusive rights of fishing in tidal water. Re Jurisdiction over Provincial Fisheries, 26 Can. S. C. 444.

Although the power of the Crown to grant private fisheries in tidal waters was restrained by Magna Charta the right of Parliament to do so is undoubted. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

A several salmon fishery granted by the Crown to a subject before Magna Charta does not merge if it reverts to the Crown, but may be granted by it to another subject. Duke Northumberland v. Houghton, 39 L. J. Exch. N. S. 66, L. R. 5 Exch. 127, 22 L. T. N. S. 491, 18 Week. Rep. 495.

The presumption is that a grant of land on a river above the ebb and flow of the tide passes the right of fishery to the grantee. If the right is expressly reserved the Crown may grant the right of fishery to another person, and there is no common right of fishery in the public. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

In Chalker v. Dickinson, 1 Conn. 382, 6 Am. Dec. 250, it is said that the state may grant a private right of fishery in a public river.

The California act of 1859 gave the owner of land fronting on Eel river the right of exclusive fishing privileges, and the court held that although the streams and shores to high-water mark were in the public the legislature might grant qualified rights therein to individuals so far as they are not inconsistent with the principal use. Heckman v. Swett, 99 Cal. 309.

Michigan How. Stat. § 2172, protects the rights of riparian owners along the lakes and in the adjacent bays and inlets to the exclusive fishing with stationary nets for 1 mile from low-water mark. Lincoln v. Davis, 58 Mich. 375, 51 Am. Rep. 116.

A statute providing that the one who first makes a weir for catching fish on any flat shall not be interrupted in its enjoyment will apply to pounds when they come into use. Stannard v. Hubbard, 34 Conn. 370.

Under a statute providing that when any person shall have been at the expense of clearing a fishing place in a river, and has used the right to take fish there in the season thereof, he shall have the right of enjoyment of the fishing place; the right cannot be assigned to another person. Munson v. Baldwin, 7 Conn. 168.

licensing of persons wishing to fish in waters of Puget sound. State, Curry, v. Crawford, 14 Wash. 373; Morris v. Graham, 16 Wash. 348.

Under the Washington statutes a licensee of a fishing right may maintain a bill to enjoin a person from constructing a pound within a specified distance of his nets contrary to the provisions of the statute. Walker v. Stone, 17 Wash. 578.

Some of the states have recently exercised this power for the purpose of promoting the cultivation of food fish. The statutes make provision for the exclusive occupation of waters by persons who will cultivate fish in them.

A statute permitting the flowing of land for the purpose of raising a pond for the cultivation of useful fishes is constitutional. Turner v. Nye, 154 Mass. 579, 14 L. R. A. 487.

The Pennsylvania act of June 3, 1878, permits the owner of a pond to make of it a private fish-pond upon which no trespassing shall be allowed, by stocking it with fish and posting certain notices. Com., Glenburn Fish & G. Protective Assn., v. Singer, 19 Pa. Co. Ct. 627.

The Maryland statute for the protection of fish in artificial ponds has no application to ooves of a navigable water. Soilers v. Sollers, 77 Md. 148, 20 L. R. A. 94.

To make a body of water private so as to enable the owner to exclude other persons from fishing in it under the act of 1878, after he had stocked it with fish, it must be wholly on his land so that the fish with which it is stocked may be confined there. Reynolds v. Com. 96 Pa. 458.

And the same is true under the act of 1878. Benscoter v. Long, 157 Pa. 208.

In People v. Hall, 8 App. Div. 15, the question was raised, but not decided, whether a pond could be protected as a private propagating ground which was not wholly on the land of the one claiming it.

The mere fact that one who cultivates fish in a pond does not own the whole pond, and there is nothing to prevent the fish from going over land of another person, will not give strangers a right to fish in the pond of the one cultivating the fish without his permission. Com. v. Skatt, 162 Mass. 219.

The New Hampshire laws forbid the taking of fish from any pond wholly within the control of a person who owns the land around it and has expended money and labor in stocking it with fish for his own use. State v. Welch, 66 N. H. 178.

The act of 1871 gave the proprietor of an unnavigable tidal stream where it emptied into salt water, who encloses it for the purpose of cultivating fishes, control of the stream within his own premises and around the mouth of the stream. Eastham v. Anderson, 119 Mass. 528.

No notice of an intention to lease a pond lying wholly within one township need be given where the application is made by the town and the lease is made to it. Com. v. Elliot, 146 Mass. 5.

The licensee of a great pond for the purpose of cultivating useful fishes under the statute of 1869 has the exclusive right of fishing in the whole pond, although he has not occupied any part of it with inclosures or appliances to carry out the purposes of the lease. Com. v. Weatherhead, 110 Mass. 175.

Under the Massachusetts statutes the fish commissioners may lease a great pond for the cultivation of useful fishes and prohibit other persons from catching fish therein, even those which are migratory and come in from the sea. Com. v. Vincent, 108 Mass. 447.

The legislature may lawfully give the right to take fish for propagation during a time that they cannot be taken for other purposes. People v. Brooks, 101 Mich. 88.

Right of individual.

The general rule has been that in non-navigable waters the riparian owner had, as incident to his ownership of the soil, a right to fish in the water which was exclusive of all other persons.

The right of a riparian owner to fish in the water of a private river is not a riparian right in the nature of an easement, but is strictly a right of property. Queen v. Robertson, 6 Can. S. C. 52.

But the King had the right to royal fish, and no subject can have them without the King's special grant. Royal Fishery of the Banne's Case, Davies Rep. 149, Cited in Angell, Tidewaters, p. 35 Appx.

But in Massachusetts the right of the individual has never been recognized. The rights of fishery, even in non-navigable waters, have been held to be public so that the state could dispose of them at its pleasure.

In Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222, it is said that in Massachusetts, from its earliest settlement, the common-law rule that fisheries in streams not navigable belong to the riparian proprietors has been modified. It was deemed most conducive to the public good to subject salmon, shad, and alewife fisheries to public control whenever the legislature thought proper to interfere.

In Vinton v. Welsh, 9 Pick. 87, it is said to be the rule of Massachusetts that the legislature having always exercised the right of regulating fisheries in rivers not navigable, the common-law right of fishery in the riparian proprietors is subject to such regulations as the legislature may make.

The legislature may give to a town the right to improve a great pond for public fishing without making compensation to a riparian owner of the stream connecting with it whose fishery rights are destroyed thereby. Cole v. Eastham, 133 Mass. 65.

Part of the proprietors of a pond cannot give an exclusive lease of the right of fishing therein. Com. v. Parley, 130 Mass. 469.

If a grant of land is made to certain persons as trustees for settlers on it who have a right to take fish in the adjoining waters, the fishery is common to all the settlers and cannot be exclusively claimed by the trustees, and regulations may be made for the taking of fish which will exclude the trustees, although they have the title to the land bordering on the fishing place. Nickerson v. Brackett, 10 Mass. 212.

In Waters v. Lilley, 4 Pick. 145, 16 Am. Dec. 383, it is said that the legislature in establishing the right to occupy fresh-water streams not connected 89 L. R. A.

with the sea for the use of mills, made no provision in regard to fish. And that the right of fishery in such streams was exclusive in the owner of the banks.

And the same rule was followed in Maine.

The Maine Constitution does not prohibit the interference by the legislature with fisheries in streams not navigable, since such power was reserved by the legislature of Massachusetts before the separation of Maine from it, and the common-law right of the riparian owner made subject to the public control. And therefore the legislature may give to a stranger a right of fishing in a certain stream to the exclusion of the riparian owner. Lunt v. Hunter, 16 Me. 9.

But under the Maine statutes no weir can be placed below low-water mark in front of the shore or flats of a riparian owner so as to interfere with the approach of fish to a weir which he may locate on his own land. Donnell v. Joy, 86 Me. 118.

Under the New Hampshire laws the owner of a pond which is entirely out off from other waters of the state may take trout from it at any time, the legislature not having attempted to interfere with such right. State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 250, 47 Am. Rep. 199.

Under the Tennessee act making it a misdemeanor to catch fish otherwise than by hook and line, making an exception in favor of owners of private waters, a person acting under license of the owner may fish with a net in private water properly inclosed as required by the statute. Maney v. State, 6 Lea, 218.

Power to interfere with private right.

Notwithstanding the individual may have a right to fish in streams passing over his land, the state may for the common good regulate the time and manner of taking fish so that the general interests may not be diminished.

Laws for the regulation of the time and appliances for catching fish may prohibit a landowner from fishing in a small stream running through his own land. Com. v. Bender, 7 Pa. Co. Ct. 624.

The owner of a lake has no constitutional right to fish therein which is unwarrantably interfered with by prohibiting them to be taken except in a specified manner. Peters v. State, 96 Tenn. 682, 38 L. R. A. 114.

If a private lake connects with a public body of water like Lake Ontario, the owners of the private lake will be subject to the regulations which the legislature makes for the control of the fishing for the public good. People v. Doxtater, 75 Hun. 472.

A state may prohibit the taking of fish by means of artificial lights and spears over a man's own lands, if the water there is connected with other bodies of water through which fish migrate. People v. Collison, 85 Mich. 105.

Under the Canadian act of 31 Vict. chap. 60, §§ 2 and 19, giving the minister of marine and fisheries the right to issue licenses when the exclusive right of fishing does not already exist, and to forbid fishing except under authority of license, there is no right to forbid salmon fishing on private property without a license. No statute should be construed to give a right to license the right of fishing on private property unless the power is given in clear and unequivocal language or irresistible inference. Venning v. Steadman, 9 Can. S. C. 206.

Boatable waters, within the meaning of a constitutional provision giving the right to fish in all boatable and other waters, not private property, are waters that are of common passage as highways for business or pleasure, and do not include all waters that may be boatable in fact. *New England Trout & S. Taking fish by means of numerous single-baited hooks and lines set in holes through the ice and tended by one person is a violation of a statute prohibiting the taking of fish in any other manner than by the ordinary process of angling with a single-baited hook and line. State v. Skolfield, 63 Me. 266.

A purse or drag net cannot be used on the Maine coast in a small indentation between headlands which are not 3 nautical miles apart, although the depth of the bay is slight so that a cove above is formed rather than a bay. State v. Murray, 84 Me. 135.

There may be inlets and inner harbors within a large bay to which the statute will apply. State v. Thompson, 85 Me. 189.

Legislative authority to construct a dam across a tidal river does not exempt it from the general statute for the protection of fisheries so as to permit the use of nets for fishing above the dam, if fish still migrate up and down the river past the dam. Oliver v. Bailey, 85 Me. 161.

Where the statute prohibits the setting of a net except when the owner is actually drawing or dragging a net for fish, a person engaged in dragging for fish cannot set his net in such a way as to prevent the passage of fish up the river, and keep it set for several hours while he is engaged in dragging another net; but the stationery net and drag net must both be put into the water at the same time. Hanscomb v. Russell, 15 Gray, 162.

By the Massachusetts statute it is made an offense to take smelt otherwise than by hook and line. Com. v. Prescott, 151 Mass. 60.

The Michigan act of 1885 prohibits the taking of fish by means of nets in waters of the state except the great lakes and their connecting rivers. People v. Kirsch, 87 Mich. 539.

The acts for the regulation of the right of fishing in the Hackensack river do not prevent the use of nets during certain seasons of the year provided they do not extend more than one fifth across the stream. Budd v. Sip, 13 N. J. L. 348.

If suckers are excepted from a prohibition of taking fish with nets the court will not strike out the exception because other sections of the statute expressly mention suckers as fish which may be taken with nets in certain specified waters. People v. Tanner, 128 N. Y. 416, Affirming 88 N. Y. S. R. 349.

The legislature has the right to control and regulate the right of fishing in the public waters of the state, and may prohibit the taking of fish with nets in specified waters. Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 228, 7 L. R. A. 184.

As far as the waters of a state are common passageways for fish, they are of public character and subject to legislative control. State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 47 Am. Rep. 199.

The state has a right by common law to protect fish in streams not navigable. State, Weller, v. Snover, 42 N. J. L. 341.

Streams in which alewives and other fish have been accustomed to ascend are subject to the regulations of the legislature. No individual can prescribe against this right which belongs to the public. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222.

Right to prevent obstruction of stream.

At common law a riparian owner could not interfere with the passage of fish up the stream. Weld v. Hornby, 7 East, 195, 8 Smith, 244.

In Murphy v. Ryan, 2 Ir. C. L. Rep. 143, 16 Week. Rep. 678, it is said that the law precludes the riparian proprietors from preventing the passage of fish through the river.

By the Massachusetts colonial statute of 15 Geo. II. chap. 6, persons who build a dam across a stream where salmon, shad, or other fish usually pass up into natural ponds to cast their spawn, were required to make sufficient passageway for the fish. At least where no provision has been made for compensation for the destruction of the fish below the dam, which will result from the stoppage of the passage of the fish in the stream. Holyoke Water-Power Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

Where a dam was authorized across a river with the proviso that a fishway should be erected, and if it should prove inadequate, compensation should be made to owners of fisheries above the dam, it was held that if the fishway should prove inadequate the owner should have an opportunity to make it adequate before suit brought, and if the statute provided a way for assessment of damages that was exclusive. Bristol v. Ousatonie Water Co. 42 Conn. 410.

No prescriptive right to maintain a dam without fishways can be acquired against the public. Parker v. People, 111 Ill. 581.

The statute may require everyone who constructs or maintains a dam to place suitable fishways in it. Parker v. People, 111 Ill. 581.

Under the Illinois act of 1885, forbidding the placing of anything in a stream which would substantially and materially interfere with the passage of the fish up and down the stream, a net cannot be maintained with wings which reach nearly to the banks on either side. Summers v. People, 29 Ill. App. 170.

Under a statute providing that no person shall place across any stream, any line in such a manner as to obstruct the free passage of fish up, down, or through the watercourse, a set line will 89 L. R. A.

Under the Illinois act of 1889, no net can be placed in any stream which would in any manner obstruct the free passage of fish up and down, or through the watercourse; and it was held that a person was liable for the acts of his employees if they pursued his general directions and he knew substantially what had been done. Smith v. People, 48 Ill. App. 130.

Notice of time when passageways shall be open for the running of fish must be given before an action can be maintained for the penalty for refusing to keep the stream open. Hancock County v. Eastern River Look & Sluice Co. 16 Me. 303.

Every owner of a mill dam holds it under the limitation that a sufficient and reasonable passageway shall be allowed for the fish, and this limitation is not extinguished by any neglect of the government in compelling the owner to comply with it. Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 522, 3 Am. Dec. 236.

The setting of a net in a river is not within the province law of 8 Anne, chap. 3, for preventing obstructions to the passage of fish in rivers. Com. v. Ruggles, 10 Mass. 391.

Where a town was given by statute the right of disposing of the privilege of taking certain kinds of fish in the river within its limits, and a penalty was prescribed for obstructing the passage of fish, it was held that the penalty was merely cumulative, and that a common-law action might be maintained against a person obstructing the passage of the fish. Barden v. Crocker, 10 Pick. 383.

In a river not navigable the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishing to the thread of the stream except so far as this right has been qualified by legislative regulations. But this right does not include the right to prevent the passage of fish to the lakes and ponds for the multiplication of their species. Com. v. Chapin, 5 Pick. 199, 16 Am. Dec. 386.

By the act of 1788, chap. 68, to prevent the destruction of fish in Mystic river, obstructions to the passage of fish up the river were prohibited. Hyde v. Russell, 2 Cush. 251.

In Cleveland v. Norton, 6 Cush. 380, it was held that the act of 1783, chap. 5, which imposed a penalty on a person who should, without liberty from the proper authorities, use any net or engine in any part of the creeks or ponds adjacent to a great pond where fish usually cast their spawn so as to take and obstruct the fish that pass up and down the creeks, did not apply to the taking of fish by such means in the arms, coves, or bays in the great pond itself.

The statute of 1818, chap. 109, provided a penalty for placing any net, seine, or obstruction in or across Charles river which would interfere with the free passage of fish up and down the river. Watertown v. Draper, 4 Pick. 165.

above the dam, but nothing is done as to rights below it, while the charter says nothing as to fishways a subsequent statute may require the maintenance of a fishway. Inland Fisheries Comrs. v. Holyoke Water Power Co. 104 Mass. 446.

In State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513, it is said that the maintenance of dams without fishways in an unnavigable river which is the outlet of a large inland lake, thereby obstructing the passage of migratory fish from the sea to the lake, is an indictable offense at common law.

By the Nebraska statute the owners of milldams are obliged to maintain proper fishways for the passage of fish from the lower to the higher level of the streams. West Point Water Power & L. Improv. Co. v. State, Moodie, 49 Neb. 218.

The New Hampshire statutes require the maintenance of fishways in dams. State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513.

After a dam has been maintained for twenty-one years, the legislature cannot require the owner to construct a passway through it for fish without making him compensation. Woolever v. Stewart, 36 Ohio St. 146, 38 Am. Rep. 569.

The common-law remedy for abatement of a nuisance does not apply to the erection of a dam without a fishway, under a statute providing that fishways shall be constructed, and that if upon inspection by the commissioners the ways shall be found inadequate the supervisors of highways shall make them conform to the provisions of the statute. Criswell v. Clugh, 3 Watts, 330.

In Com. v. Pennsylvania Canal Co. 66 Pa. 41, 5 Am. Rep. 329, it was held that purchasers of the state's rights in the canals could not be compelled by the legislature to maintain sluices in the dams for the passage of fish.

The Missouri statute requires persons building dams to maintain aprons on them in such a way that fish can pass over them in either direction whenever the stream is swollen beyond its normal capacity. State v. Griffin, 39 Mo. 49.

If the statute prohibits weirs without openings only in certain portions of the stream a complaint for violation of the statute must show that the weir was in the prohibited portion of the stream in case it alleges absence of an opening. State v. Turnbull, 78 Me. 362.

By the law of Massachusetts the rights of fishery in such rivers as the Connecticut are public rights, and unless there is some express provision to the contrary are subject to such reasonable regulations as the state may make for their protection; including the right to require of persons who own or build dams that they construct fishways therein. The payment of damages to the owners of fishing rights above a dam erected by a manufacturing corporation in a public stream will not, in case its charter is subject to amendment at any time, prevent the legislature from requiring it to construct a fishway to the satisfaction of the fish commissioners at any time it sees fit to do so. Holyoke Water Power Co. v. Lyman, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 500, 21 L. ed. 133.

legislature cannot, after such compensation has been made, and the dam erected with fishways which the commissioners held to be sufficient, require it to be altered at large expense so as to provide for a fishway through it. Com. v. Essex Co. 18 Gray, 247.

The legislature has no power to compel the opening of a passageway for fish in a dam on private property where the river is not navigable and has passed to private persons. The court says the legislature has no greater right to pass laws directing how the waters of that river shall be used than they would have to regulate the use of the most inconsiderable stream in the state which has been granted by the state. And the statement in Shaw v. Crawford, 10 Johns. 236, to the contrary was held to be a dictum. People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 195, 8 Am. Dec. 382.

In People v. Dextater, 75 Hun. 472, it is said that the rule of People v. Platt, 17 Johns. 195, 8 Am. Dec. 382, was considered to be consistent with Hooker v. Cummings, 20 Johns. 91, 11 Am. Dec. 249, in which it is said the legislature has confessedly the right of regulating the taking of fish in private waters.

In State v. Glen, 52 N. C. (7 Jones, L.) 321, the court held, on the authority of People v. Platt, that after the legislature had granted to a private individual the bed of a river, and he had erected a dam and mills thereon, he could not, without compensation, be compelled to open a passageway for fish through it.

And that ruling was followed in Cornelius v. Glen, 52 N. C. (7 Jones L.) 512.

Preservation of fish in public waters.

The regulation of the right of fishery in the navigable streams of the state is a proper subject of legislation by the legislature. Skinner v. Hettrick, 73 N. C. 53.

In Lawton v. Steele, 119 N. Y. 226, 7 L. R. A. 134, it is said that the right to regulate fishing in public waters has been exercised from the earliest period of the common law, citing statute 2 Hen. VI. chap. 15.

It is competent for the legislature to appropriate and regulate fisheries in navigable as well as in private waters. Fuller v. Spear, 14 Me. 417; Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. 531.

In Smith v. Maryland, 59 U. S. 18 How. 71, 15 L. ed. 239, the court, speaking of the title of the state to the soil under the navigable waters, says the state holds the propriety of this soil for the conservation of the public rights of fishery therein and may regulate the mode of that enjoyment so as to prevent the destruction of the fishery. In other words, it may forbid all such acts as would render the public right less valuable, or destroy it altogether.

A bayou extending back from a public body of water and into which fish have free access from such water, and not wholly on the premises of a private individual, is "waters of the state" within the meaning of a statute prohibiting seines, nets, or traps in waters of the state. State v. Blount, 35 Mo. 543.

The Vermont statute prescribed a fine for fishing with a set line in the waters of the state. State v. Stevens, 69 Vt. 411.

The New York act of 1879 prohibited fishing with nets in waters which were held to include the American waters of Niagara river below the Falls. People v. Gillette, 38 N. Y. S. R. 352.

A Connecticut statute provided that no person should use a bush seine in the Ousatounick river or obstruct the drawing of seines and taking of fish there; and it was held that the statute applied to the whole river, and not to certain parts of it only. Eastman v. Curtis, 1 Conn. 323.

In Spear v. Robinson, 29 Me. 531, it was held that the Massachusetts act of 1803, to regulate the shad and alewife fisheries in Warren, was still in force.

Under the Maine statutes the offender cannot be taken for trial beyond the county adjoining the one where he was found. Stiphen v. Ulmer, 88 Me. 211.

In State v. Sturgess, 9 Or. 537, it was held that the Oregon act of October 25, 1880, to protect salmon, did not apply to the Colorado river.

The Pennsylvania legislature, as early as 1761, passed laws for the regulation of fisheries. Hart v. Hill, 1 Whart. 132.

Powers of fish officers.

Under the act of 36 & 37 Vict. chap. 71, power was given to the conservators to make by-laws for the protection of the salmon fisheries, but it was held that under that act they had no power to make a by-law which prohibited the use of nets for catching other fish within the salmon grounds if they could be used without damage to the salmon fishery. Pidler v. Berry, 59 L. T. N. S. 230.

Where a statute provides for the appointment by each of three counties of a fish warden who shall see to the preservation of fish, and provides that upon failure in appointment or refusal of others to act one may do so, there will be no presumption of non-appointment or refusal to act, but one who attempts to act alone must show that he has authority to do so. Hancock County v. Eastern River Lock & Sluice Co. 20 Me. 72.

By the Maine act of March 4, 1826, to regulate the alewife fishery in Bristol, so long as the fish committee act within the sphere of their duty they are not trespassers, and no one has a right to oppose them in the performance of their duties. Fossett v. Bearce, 27 Me. 117.

Since the act of 1826, regulating the alewife fishery in Bristol, no power can reside in any persons except the fish committee to adjudicate upon the sufficiency of any sluiceway, or to open any sluiceway in another's dam, or to abate any dam as a nuisance for the absence of a sluice. Bearce v. Fossett, 34 Me. 575.

The fish committee cannot maintain an action for the penalty provided by the act of 1826, unless they have taken the oath required by the act. Fossett v. Geyer, 55 Me. 160.

Where the statute authorized the fish committee to require openings to be made in dams on the river, their decision is conclusive, unless it is shown that they acted corruptly or under unjustifiable motives. Briggs v. Murdock, 13 Pick. 306.

If a fish warden takes a net and keeps it for an unlawful time without instituting proceedings for its condemnation, he will be a trespasser ab initio. Russell v. Hanscomb, 15 Gray, 166.

If the statute creates a board of commissioners to designate the fish sluices in the river, and to protect them by indictment, there will be no authority to destroy a fish trap as a nuisance which is not in a fish sluice. Boatwright v. Bookman, Rice, L. 447.

Regulation of lobster fishing.

The Maine statute requires the liberation of all lobsters which are females, or are under 9 inches in length. State v. Bennett, 79 Me. 55.

The fact that certain lobsters were taken more than a marine league from the shore does not prevent the infliction of the penalty for their destruction within the state. State v. Craig, 80 Me. 85.

Under a statute providing a penalty for taking young lobsters less than 9 inches long, the fact that the lobsters are less than 9 inches long raises the presumption that they are young, and the latter fact need not be proved. Thompson v. Smith, 79 Me. 160.

The Maine act of 1887 permitting the seizure of barrels of lobsters in which short ones were found was repealed by the act of 1889 covering the same general subject-matter of regulation of the lobster fisheries. Staples v. Peabody, 83 Me. 207.

Conviction may be had on complaint without the necessity of an indictment under the Maine statute against the possession of short lobsters. State v. Sinnott, 89 Me. 41.

A statute prohibiting the possession of short lobsters applies to lobsters taken out of the state. Com. v. Young, 155 Mass. 393.

A statute declaring that whoever sells, or offers for sale, or has in possession, a short lobster shall forfeit $5, and that the possession of the lobster shall be prima facie evidence to convict, will be construed so as to be upheld, and the latter clause will not render it meaningless. Com. v. Barber, 143 Mass. 560.

If a statute prohibits the having in possession of short lobsters, it will apply as well to lobsters taken out of the state as to those taken within the state. Com. v. Savage, 155 Mass. 278.

A common carrier who does not know or have good reason to know that barrels received by him for shipment contain short lobsters, is not liable for receiving them under a statute making it unlawful to possess for any purpose short lobsters between certain dates. State v. Swett, 87 Me. 99, 29 L. R. A. 714.

A charge of having in possession certain short lobsters is not sufficient without showing that there was no intention of liberating them. State v. Bennett, 79 Me. 55; State v. Trefethen (Me.) 3 New Eng. Rep. 842.

Penalty and its infliction.

A statute authorizing a confiscation "on view" of the implements used in drifting for salmon contrary to the provisions of the statute, does not require the net to be seen in the water to justify the confiscation. It is sufficient if the complainant acting "on view" himself sees what, if testified to by 89 L. R. A.

him, would be sufficient to convict of the offense charged. So, if complainant upon receiving notice that a boat is going out to drift for salmon goes to the beach when the boat comes in and finds the net, which is a drifting net, wet, and that it has taken fish, and is told by the men that they have been drifting, a seizure may be made. *Mowat v. Violation of the Pennsylvania act of 1878 cannot be tried in the criminal court of the court of sessions unless the defendant enters into a recognition to answer to the charge of the misdemeanor. Com. v. Owens, 7 Montgomery Co. L. Rep. 144.

Seizure and destruction of nets by officers, in obedience to a statute, in abating a nuisance caused by their voluntary use by the owner in violation of the fishery laws, does not deprive the owner of his property without due process of law, or of a certain remedy in the laws for all injuries to his property, or make an unconstitutional distinction as to the possession, enjoyment, and descent of property. Bittenhaus v. Johnston, 92 Wis. 568, 32 L. R. A. 380.

The legislature may authorize the seizure of nets found in use in violation of the law to be disposed of as directed by the court before whom the offense is tried. Osborn v. Charlevoix Circuit Judge (Mich.) 4 Det. L. N. 731.

The New Jersey statutes provide for the seizure of nets used for fishing in the Delaware river. Shoemaker v. State, 20 N. J. L. 183.

But it has been held that a state cannot provide for the confiscation of a fish net in such a way as to deprive the owner of his property without due process of law. State v. Owen, 1 Ohio L. D. 168.

A statute providing that nets used in taking fish in violation of law shall be forfeited, and may be seized by the public officer of the county, is void as being without due process of law, and without judicial hearing and judgment. Jeck v. Anderson, 57 Cal. 251, 40 Am. Rep. 115.

Setting nets for turtles does not violate the provisions of a statute making it unlawful to take fish in any waters by means of nets, although fish become entangled in the net, if they are returned to the water as far as possible. People v. Deremo, 106 Mich. 621.

Under a statute making it unlawful to be knowingly possessed of fish taken in a net, a person fishing with a troll line which becomes entangled in a net which he takes into the boat finding fish caught in it, and rows 100 yards to the shore without releasing the fish, is guilty. People v. McMasters, 74 Hun, 226.

Constitutional provisions.

Several different constitutional provisions have been invoked to defeat statutes which have been passed for the regulation of fisheries.

Either general or special laws, as the legislature may deem proper, can be enacted respecting the preservation of fish, under a Constitution giving power to enact such laws, and adding that they may be enacted or enforced in particular counties or geographical districts designated by the general assembly. Peters v. State, 96 Tenn. 682, 33 L. R. A. 114.

The title of an act, "An Act to Consolidate and Amend the Several Acts Relating to Game Fish," is not broad enough to cover provisions prohibiting the use of explosives in killing fish. Com. v. Nihil, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 532.

In People v. Miller, 88 Mich. 383, it was held that the provisions of an act to prevent the killing of fish in Klinger lake by other means than by hook and line were within the title.

The fact that no maximum fine is fixed for the offense does not render the statute void under a constitutional provision forbidding excessive fines. Re Yell, 107 Mich. 228.

The exception of lakes having an area of 15 square miles and over, and subject to overflow and backwater from the Mississippi river, which is made in a statute prohibiting the taking of fish except by rod or line, is not an arbitrary and unnatural exception, but rests upon the idea that such lakes, being periodically replenished from the river, are not liable to suffer a material waste or destruction of their stock of fish as lesser lakes or streams would. Peters v. State, 96 Tenn. 682, 33 L. R. A. 114.

The commerce clause of the United States Constitution does not prohibit the state from forbidding the exportation of fish from the state. Van Fleet, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is in the name of the people, on the information of the attorney general, to restrain the commission of an alleged nuisance, the complaint alleging, in substance, that defendant, a corporation, maintains and operates a sawmill and box factory on the bank of the Truckee river, at the town of Truckee, in this state, in which it cuts and manufactures lumber and boxes; that said river is a fresh-water stream, having its source in the state of California and flowing into the state of Nevada, and is now, and for a long time prior hereto has been, stocked with fish; that defendant, in operating its mill and factory, has heretofore and does now place and allow to pass into the waters of said river large quantities of refuse matter, consisting of sawdust, shavings, slabs, edgings, waste, and other deleterious substances, the effect of which has been and is to pollute said stream and the waters thereof, and render the same unfit for use, and which substances are poisonous and deleterious to the fish in said stream, and are killing, destroying, and exterminating them, all of which is alleged to be in violation of the rights of the people, and a public nuisance; that defendant threatens to, and, unless restrained, will, continue to commit said wrongful acts, to plaintiff's irreparable injury. A preliminary injunction was granted ex parte on the filing of the complaint, which defendant subsequently moved to vacate. The motion was made upon the complaint alone, based upon the objection that the facts alleged made no case for relief. The motion being denied, this appeal ensued.

The sole question is whether the complaint states a cause of action, and this is to be determined precisely as if the pleading were subjected to a general demurrer.

The first point made against the complaint is that the facts alleged do not constitute a public nuisance, within the definition of our Code.

But this objection would seem to overlook the most material feature of the complaint. It is alleged that the acts of defendant have the effect of polluting and poisoning the waters of the river, and thereby killing and destroying the fish therein. Anything which is "an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property by an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons," is a public nuisance. Penal Code, § 870; Civ. Code, §§ 8479, 8480. The fish within our waters constitute the most important constituent of that species of property commonly designated as wild game, the general right and ownership of which are in the people of the state (Ex parte Master, 103 Cal. 476, 488), as in England it was in the King; and the right and power to protect and preserve such property for the common use and benefit is one of the recognized prerogatives of the sovereign, coming to us from the common law, and preserved and expressly provided for by the statutes of this and every other state of the Union. The complaint shows that, by the repeated and continuing acts of defendant, this public property right is being, and will continue to be, greatly interfered with and impaired; and that such acts constitute a nuisance, both under our statute and at common law, is not open to serious question. People, Ricks Water Co., v. Elk River Mill & L. Co. 107 Cal. 219.

But defendant urges that the facts do not show the infringement of any public right, in that the right, if any, shown to be interfered with, is solely that of fishery, or the privilege to take fish; that this is a public right only so far as it pertains to navigable waters, while, as to all other waters, it is exclusively in the riparian proprietor; that, as the Truckee river is not a navigable stream, the destruction of the fish therein is not an injury to the public for which the people can complain, there being no allegation that the riparian proprietors thereon have been injured. In the first place, the common right to take fish extends, not alone to navigable waters, but exists as to all waters the lands underlying which are not in private ownership,—in other words, to all lakes, ponds, or streams, navigable or otherwise, upon the public lands of this state or the United States not protected by reservation; and, since there is no averment that the lands along the Truckee river are held in private proprietorship, we think the presumption must be that the title remains in the government. But, in the next place, if this is not the presumption the case would not be different. The dominion of the state, for the purposes of protecting its sovereign rights in the fish within its waters, and their preservation for the common enjoyment of its citizens, is not confined within the narrow limits suggested by defendant's argument. It is not restricted to their protection only when found within what may in strictness be held to be navigable or otherwise public waters. It extends to all waters within the state, public or private, wherein these animals are habituated or accustomed to resort for spawning or other purposes, and through which they have freedom of passage to and from the public fishing grounds of the state. To the extent that waters are the common passageway for fish, although flowing over lands entirely subject to private ownership, they are deemed for such purposes public waters, and subject to all laws of the state regulating the right of fishery. Cottrill v. Myrick, 12 Me. 222; State v. Franklin Falls Co. 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 513; State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 47 Am. Rep. 199, and 59 N. H. 484.

For the purposes of the right involved in this action, then, the Truckee river, so far as it flows within this state, is a part of the waters to which the jurisdiction of the state in the protection of its fish supply extends. This court will take judicial cognizance of the fact that the river has its source in Lake Tahoe, a large navigable body of water lying partly in this state, and that it flows thence into the state of Nevada, and empties into Pyramid lake, also navigable; and the court may also take notice of a fact so common and notorious that between these two bodies of water the river affords, and has from time immemorial, a natural and free highway for the passage of the fish inhabiting these lakes. Even, therefore, if, as contended by defendant, the lands through which the stream flows are to be presumed, in the absence of contrary averment, to be owned in private proprietorship, it can make no difference as to the right here asserted. While the right of fishery upon his own land is exclusively in the riparian proprietor, this does not imply or carry the right to destroy what he does not take. He does not own the fish in the stream. His right of property attaches only to those he reduces to actual possession, and he cannot lawfully kill or obstruct the free passage of those not taken. "This right in the owner of the land must be regarded as qualified to a certain extent by the universal principle that all property is held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare, and to that extent it is subject to legislative control. It is a well established principle that every person shall so use and enjoy his own property, however absolute and unqualified his title, that his use of it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the public. Hence, while the riparian owner has the exclusive right of fishery upon his own land, he must so exercise that right as not to injure others in the enjoyment of a similar right upon their lands upon the stream above and below." State v. Roberts, 59 N. H. 256, 47 Am. Rep. 199.

The mere fact, therefore, that the interference or obstruction complained of may in fact be in a stream where the right of fishery is exclusively in private riparian owners, does not make the acts here complained of any less an invasion of the public right, nor prevent the state from protecting its general interest in the property.

The fact that acts of the character alleged are by the Penal Code made a misdemeanor, and punishable as such, does not make them less a nuisance, nor imply that the legislature intended to make the criminal remedy exclusive of the civil. Nor is there anything in the objection that the attorney general is not privileged to maintain the action upon his own information, without the intervention of a private relator. People v. Davidson, 80 Cal. 888; People v. Stratton, 25 Cal. 242; People v. Gold Run Ditch & Min. Co. 66 Cal. 138, 56 Am. Rep. 80.

The other objections made do not call for particular notice.

Order affirmed.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

John KELLEY

v.

Oliver F. RHODES, County Assessor.

(..... Wyo.....)

1. A herd of sheep driven through the state is not exempt from taxation as personal property in transit if the purpose of driving is not merely transportation, but comprehends also that of grazing and feeding them upon the natural grasses, not as a mere necessary incident of the travel, but as one of the purposes of the movement.
2. The existence of a purpose to obtain grazing for sheep, united with the purpose of transportation, is to be determined from all the facts in each case, including the course, the character of the territory grazed upon, the time employed, the subsequent method of intended shipment, the ordinary facilities for transportation by other means, the place selected for commencing other transportation, and perhaps the time of year and the eventual purpose of their shipment.
3. A return of property for taxation in another state does not exempt it from taxation in the absence of a statute to that effect, if the property is otherwise legally taxable under the laws.
4. Uniformity in an assessment for taxes, and in the mode thereof, exists if the same basis of valuation is taken as to all property of like character.
5. Hearing and opportunity for review of an assessment for a tax on sheep under act of 1895 is not denied, since a provision therefor under Rev. Stat. § 8846, is applicable in such cases.
6. A payment of a tax on sheep is not voluntary when made after first refusing to pay it and because the collector declares either that he can or that he will take enough sheep to pay the tax.
7. A county is a "municipal corporation" within the meaning of the proviso of Rev. Stat. § 8065, respecting actions against municipal corporations to recover back taxes actually paid over to such corporation.
8. State and school-district taxes are collected for the "use and benefit" of the county within the meaning of the proviso of Rev. Stat. § 8065, authorizing action to recover back a tax actually paid over to any municipal corporation for whose use and benefit it was levied or collected.

The phrase "all taxation shall be equal and uniform," § 28, art. 1, has been held to refer to equality and uniformity in the rate, but it has also been held to mean uniformity in the mode of assessment. It implies equality in the burden, and this equality of the burden cannot exist without uniformity in the mode of assessment as well as in the rate of taxation.

Powder River Cattle Co. v. Johnson County Comrs. 8 Wyo. 598; Johnson County Comrs. v. Searight Cattle Co. 8 Wyo. 777.

Mr. R. W. Breckons, for defendant:

In determining whether the act itself is contrary to the commerce clause of the Constitution, the question is whether the taxation of live stock brought into the state for the purpose of grazing is an interference with commerce among the several states.

The taxing power of a state is one of its attributes of sovereignty. It exists independent of the Constitution of the United States, and may be exercised to an unlimited extent, except so far as it has been surrendered to the Federal government.

Gilman v. Sheboygan, 67 U. S. 2 Black, 510, 17 L. ed. 305; Union P. R. Co. v. Peniston, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 5, 21 L. ed. 787.

A state may, so long as it does not trench on the Constitution of the United States, tax all persons, property, or business within its jurisdiction or reach, and whether any person, property, or business is within its jurisdiction is not a Federal question, but must be determined by the state for itself.

The practice of driving sheep across the different states, and the purpose with which they are so driven, are so well known that the court will judicially notice it.

The main object and purpose were to take advantage of the range afforded by the state of Wyoming to maintain their sheep in the state of Wyoming, and to increase the value of the sheep by driving them across the state.

The custom of trailing cattle to market has passed into disuse. When, therefore, we find cattle started across the country on hoof it must be apparent that the object with which such live stock are so started is not one of shipment; and when live stock are so started and we find them maintained by the grasses on the open range, and find them increase in value while so shipped, it is evident that they are trailed across the country for the sole purpose of grazing.

The summary method in which the tax is collected, and the unusual power given to the assessor, do not make the statute void as being in conflict with either the Federal or the state Constitutions.

To hold that property could not be taxed unless an opportunity should be given the property owner to appear before the board of equalization would be to hold that no property brought into the state after the meeting of the board of equalization could be taxed.

Potter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff having brought this action against the defendant, as county assessor, to recover certain taxes collected upon a herd of sheep belonging to him, upon issue having been joined, the parties agreed upon a statement of facts in substance as follows: The defendant was the duly elected, qualified, and acting county assessor from the 7th day of January, 1895, until the 4th day of January, 1897. The plaintiff, who was a resident and citizen of the state of Kansas, was the owner of certain sheep, numbering about 10,000 head, which, on or about October 29, 1895, were in the county of Laramie, in charge of an agent, who was driving and transporting them through the state of Wyoming from Utah to Nebraska. In driving said sheep it was the practice to permit them to spread out at times in the neighborhood of a quarter of a mile, and while being so driven to graze over land of that width. In some instances they were driven through large pastures, in other instances through the public domain, and in other instances through pastures inclosed by fences; and while being so driven from the western boundary of the state to Pine Bluffs station (which is located near the eastern boundary), they were maintained solely by grazing along the route of travel. Said sheep were duly returned by plaintiff for taxation, and were assessed for 1895 in the county of Juab, Utah. On October 29, 1895, the defendant, in company with the deputy sheriff of the county of Laramie, collected $250 from said agent, alleged to be tax as due for the current year, 1895. Before said collection, upon demand therefor, payment was refused by plaintiff's agent, whereupon defendant stated to him that he "could" or "would" take enough sheep, and sell them, to pay the said taxes, with costs. Thereupon, to prevent the seizure and sale of such sheep, and the damages which must thereby accrue, said agent paid said sum of money to the defendant. It was a fact, and defendant was notified thereof, that said herd of sheep was driven across this state for the purpose of shipment, and that the same were not brought into the state for the purpose of being maintained permanently therein. At the time of the regular assessment of property for taxation for 1895 the plaintiff had no property in the state. At the time of such assessment plaintiff had no notice of the time or place of the meeting of the board of equalization, or that any assessment had been made against him in said county or state; and he had no property within the state at the time the 1895 taxes were regularly and legally levied in the county of Laramie. Plaintiff demanded from defendant a return of the amount of tax so collected, which was refused. The time consumed in driving said sheep through Wyoming was from six to eight weeks, and by the route traveled the distance was about 500 miles. Said taxes were assessed, levied, and collected by defendant without the action, authority, or assistance of the board of county commissioners or any other officer of said Laramie county. Said property was not regularly assessed in any other county of the state for that year, and no taxes thereon had been paid in any other county of the state. For shipment purposes, it was not necessary that the sheep should be driven into Wyoming, and the railroad over which they were shipped could be reached from the point from which they were first driven by traveling a less distance than was required to drive them to any point in this state. The tax was paid without any protest other than appears above. The amount collected was, prior to the commencement of the suit, paid over by defendant to the county treasurer, and by the latter distributed in the manner provided by law,—part to the state, part to the school district in which the sheep were found, and part to the county. There is now pending in the same district court an action by plaintiff against the defendant individually for the recovery of the same money.

Upon the submission of the cause upon the facts agreed to as aforesaid, the district court reserved to this court for its decision, as important and difficult questions, the following: (1) Was live stock driven and transported in the manner plaintiff's sheep were subject to taxation in the year 1895? (2) Were these sheep driven in Wyoming for the purpose of being grazed within the meaning of the law authorizing the taxation of such property? (3) Does the fact that the said sheep were returned by the said plaintiff for taxation, as assessed by the assessor and collector of taxes for the year 1895, in the county of Juab, territory of Utah, exempt such property from taxation in this state for that year? (4) Was the payment of the tax by the plaintiff, under the evidence in this case, a voluntary or involuntary payment, and was the payment so made that the plaintiff would be authorized, under the law, to recover the taxes so paid? (5) Does the fact the plaintiff was never given a hearing before the board of county commissioners as a board of equalization, or was never given any notice of the assessment and levy of said taxes, render said taxes illegal so far as plaintiff is concerned? (6) Is chapter 61, Sess. Laws 1895, authorizing county assessors to assess, levy, and collect taxes upon live stock brought into their respective counties to graze, constitutional? (7) For the recovery of taxes as paid in the manner set forth in this case, against whom should a suit be brought; and, in this case, is the suit brought against the proper person? (8) What judgment should be entered by this court in this case?

Section 8776 of the Revised Statutes, as amended January 8, 1891 (Laws 1891, chap. 86), prescribes what property shall be taxable, and sheep are designated therein. The county assessors commence the annual assessment as soon as they are furnished with the assessment roll, with which they are required to be provided by the county commissioners on the 1st Monday in April in each year. Generally, all personal property is required to be listed in the county where it may be on the 1st day of April of the current year, and, if the owner resides out of the state, it shall be listed and assessed where it may then be. The board of county commissioners of each county is constituted a board of equalization for the correction and completion of the annual assessment roll, and they are required to hold, as such, two regular meetings in each year, at the office of the county clerk. The first meeting commences on the 4th Monday in June, and may continue not exceeding fifteen days. The second is required to commence on the 4th Monday in July, and may continue not less than three nor more than six consecutive days. At the first meeting the board is authorized to add to the roll any omitted taxable property, and to hear and determine the complaints of all parties feeling aggrieved by the assessment of their property as returned by the assessor; and may increase, diminish, or otherwise alter and correct any assessment or valuation. It is made the duty of the county clerk to notify each person whose assessment has been raised or increased by the board of the amount thereof. Such persons may appear before the board at either meeting, and be heard respecting the same. Section 8801, Rev. Stat., as amended by chapter 86, Laws 1890-91. The annual levy is required to be made by the board of county commissioners on or before the 1st Monday in September in each year, and thereafter the county clerk is required to prepare a tax list and deliver the same to the collector (who is, and has for many years been, the county treasurer) by the 8d Monday of September, upon receipt of which the last-named officer is required to proceed with the collection. Rev. Stat. §§ 8806, 8808. No notice or demand on any taxpayer is enjoined, but, after the date last above mentioned all such taxes, which include state, county, and school-district taxes, are due and payable at the office of the collector. Laws 1890-91, p. 163. After the tax list has been committed to the collector, if he ascertains that any property has been omitted, upon his reporting the fact to the assessor, the latter is authorized to enter it upon the assessment roll, and assess the value, and the collector to enter it upon the tax list, and collect the tax, as in other cases. Rev. Stat. § 8817. General provision is also made for the taxation of any personal property "brought, driven, or coming" into the state at any time prior to the last day of each year, and which shall remain for a period of not less than thirty days. Rev. Stat. § 8845. It is made the duty of the proper officers to assess such property at any time after the annual assessment, and the taxes thereon becomes due and collectible at the same time, and in the same manner, as the annual taxes; and, if assessed after such annual taxes are payable, they become due as soon as assessed and levied. As to such property, however, it is provided that, in case it shall have been in the state, before such assessment more than thirty days, but less than six months, there shall be collected but a half year's tax, the same to be computed at one half the tax levied against other like property for the current year. From the provisions of this section, merchants and dealers are excepted as to goods and merchandise brought in to replenish their respective stocks, and to keep them up to the amount at which they were respectively originally assessed, provided such merchants have been assessed on their stocks for the current year. This law was upheld in Frontier Land & Cattle Co. v. Baldwin, 3 Wyo. 764. The above outline of the laws in force prior to 1895 will assist in a proper understanding and construction of the act of February 16, 1895, in pursuance and by authority of which the taxes involved in this suit were collected. That act, which has since been repealed by the act of March 1, 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 113), was as follows:

"Sec. 1. All live stock brought into this state for the purpose of being grazed shall be taxed for the fiscal year during which it shall have been brought into the state.

"Sec. 2. Assessors are, for the purpose of enforcing this act, hereby vested with the powers, and charged with the duties vested in and conferred upon other officers for the collection of taxes.

"Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of the assessors in the several counties to levy and immediately collect the taxes provided for in this act, as soon as any live stock is brought into their counties to graze; and to pay without delay such amounts to the treasurers of their respective counties.

"Sec. 4. Whenever the owner of any live stock upon which a tax has been levied, as provided in this act, shall refuse to immediately pay the amount of such tax to the assessor who levied it, such assessor shall proceed forthwith to collect such tax as provided by law for the collection of delinquent taxes on other kinds of personal property."

Laws 1895, chap. 61.

This statute is assailed by counsel for plaintiff as being in conflict with that provision of the Federal Constitution which grants to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states and with the Indian tribes, and also that provision of the same Constitution which reserves to the citizens of each state all the immunities and privileges of the citizens in the several states, and to that portion of the 14th Amendment providing that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is further contended that by the act in question a person may be deprived of his property without "due process of law" which is prohibited by § 6 of article 1 of the state Constitution, and that it violates the constitutional requirement of uniformity in taxation. Const. art. 1, § 28; Id. art. 15, § 11. The provisions of the state Constitution invoked are as follows: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." "All taxation shall be equal and uniform." All property, except as in the Constitution otherwise provided, shall be uniformly assessed for taxation, and the legislature shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property real and personal." The facts in the case, and the question submitted for our decision, involve a consideration of the above-mentioned propositions. Touching the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the greater reliance appears to be placed by counsel upon the one affecting interstate commerce. It has been discussed, and is, perhaps, necessary to be considered in its effect upon the law, and also in its relation to the facts of the present case. It is conceded by counsel for defendant that a statute which, in terms, provides for the taxation of property in transit from one state to another, or which, by its terms, seeks to impose more onerous burdens upon property shipped from a foreign jurisdiction to the state imposing the burden than are borne by like property in such state, would be void, as in conflict with the Federal Constitution. It is urged, however, that the act in question is not such a statute. It is argued that live stock brought into the state for the purpose of being grazed is not engaged in interstate commerce. It is further conceded that, if live stock should be brought into the state from Utah on the way to eastern markets, the purpose of the owner being solely to pass through the state on his way to such markets, it would not have been brought here to be grazed, and would not be taxable. It is too well settled to admit of controversy that property engaged in interstate commerce, by being transported through a state on its journey from one state to another, would not be subject to taxation in the state through which it is passing. The only question to be considered, so far as the law is concerned, is whether its necessary result is the taxation of such property. The proposition is maintained, and is undoubtedly correct, that, before property can be taxed, it must have become identified and incorporated with the general mass of property in the state. Live stock in this state is, in the greater part, maintained by feeding or grazing upon the natural grasses of the soil. In the case of some kinds of live stock, they are largely allowed to roam at will, but over territory more or less confined in extent. With sheep the custom is to keep them in convenient flocks or herds, intrusted to herders, and to direct them from place to place, generally as to a particular herd, in some certain locality, but covering in most cases a rather large and indeterminate territory. They are thus maintained until in proper condition for disposition, shipment, or other purposes of the owner. The only way in which such property becomes identified and incorporated with the other property of the state is by being turned at large or herded, to be maintained by grazing. Whether the purpose is that they shall remain in the state permanently or not is not a determining factor. Such a purpose does not exist in the case of the greater proportion of all the live stock in the state. The object of a cattle grower is to ship out of the state his cattle, as soon as they arrive at the proper age, size, or condition. To some extent that is also the purpose which the sheep owner has in view. When live stock are brought into this state to graze they are here to be maintained. While here for that purpose, they are as fully identified and incorporated with the other property of the state as it is possible for most of our live stock to become. The length of time that such property remains cuts no figure, if the purpose aforesaid is present. No question of interstate commerce is involved in such case which militates against the exercise by the state of its power of taxation. Neither, in that event, is a citizen of another state deprived of any of the immunities or privileges of a citizen of this state, nor is the state attempting to make or enforce a law which abridges the rights of a citizen of the United States. We observe no distinction, in respect to the matter under consideration, between the case of a sheep owner of Utah or some other state driving or bringing his sheep into this state for the purpose of and permitting them to graze here, and an owner of like property residing in this state, who brings in from another state other sheep for the same purpose. In our judgment, the act did not encroach upon the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce between the several states. Similar statutes have engaged the attention of the courts in other states, and none, so far as we are aware, have been adjudged void as an interference with interstate commerce. Some of them have been pronounced invalid for lack of uniformity in taxation, and as violating constitutional provisions of the state in which they were enacted; but that is a subject for subsequent consideration in this case. A statute of Washington taxing live stock brought into that state to graze was upheld in all respects, but the question was apparently not presented, nor was it discussed in the opinion of the court whether any provision of the Federal Constitution was infringed upon. Wright v. Stinson, 16 Wash. 388.

A much more serious question is encountered upon a consideration of the peculiar circumstances connected with the presence of plaintiff's sheep in this state. It is well settled that personal property merely in transit through a state upon its journey from one state to another acquires no situs within the state through which it passes on such journey, and is, therefore, not subject to taxation therein. None of the cases cited or coming to our attention disclose facts entirely similar to those existing in the case at bar. The case of Coe v. Errol, 62 N. H. 308, partly involved the legality of a tax assessed by a town in New Hampshire upon a lot of logs which had been cut in Maine, and driven through certain lakes and rivers into the Androscoggin river, in New Hampshire, on their way to mills in Lewiston, Maine, but on account of low water, were left in the town aforesaid during the summer. Said river was a public highway for the floating of timber and logs from the lakes and rivers in Maine down that river to Lewiston, and had been so used by the owners of the logs for more than twenty years. It was held that, as the logs were brought into New Hampshire in the usual course of transportation, and remained there no longer than was necessary under the circumstances, they were merely passing through the state, and were not taxable in that jurisdiction. It thus appears from the facts in that case that there existed no other design with respect to the logs than to convey them, on the course of their transportation, which had started in Maine, along and through regular highways for that purpose. The only cause for their delay and stoppage in the town levying the tax was insufficient water to permit their floating further down the river. A similar instance on principle, though not covering such a length of time, would be the case of goods in transit through the state by cars, or freight wagons, and by some natural or accidental cause further progress of the means of transportation be delayed for a time. In State, Detmold, v. Engle, 84 N. J. L. 425, the property assessed was a lot of coal lying on a pier at Elizabethport, which had been mined in Pennsylvania, and sent by rail to Elizabethport, to be thence shipped by water to other markets for the purpose of sale. That town was the terminus of the railroad on tide water. It was the custom to separate the coal at that place according to sizes, and, when a cargo of one size was obtained, to ship it to points in New England, or up the Hudson river, as soon as a vessel could be chartered to carry it. None of the coal was sold for consumption at Elizabethport. The coal assessed was lying on the wharf awaiting shipment. It was held that, as the coal was in transit to market in other states, and delayed in New Jersey, not for the purpose of sale, but merely for separation and assortment for the convenience of shipment to its destination, a tax thereon would amount to a tax on commerce; and with regard to goods in course of transit the court said: "Delay within the state, which is no longer than is necessary for the convenience of transshipment for its transportation to its destination, will not make it property within the state for the purposes of taxation." And further: "Property in transit through the state, or which has been sent within the state, simply for the purpose of sale, is not to be considered as having a situs within such state for purposes of taxation." The case of Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Columbia, 62 N. H. 286, is somewhat similar in its facts to Coe v. Errol, 62 N. H. 308. A Connecticut corporation, doing business in that state, contracted for spruce logs to be drawn from Vermont, and delivered on the banks of the Connecticut river and on the river in season for the spring drive of 1879, to be marked with the company's mark. There was no other provision for delivery. The logs were cut upon land in Vermont, and were on the ice in said river in the town of Columbia, in New Hampshire, when the tax was assessed, having been delivered there from day to day during the winter of 1878-79. They were there for the purpose of being transported by the river to the company's mills at Hartford, in Connecticut, as soon as the season would permit, there to be manufactured. The court said: "Upon the facts stated, the logs upon which this tax was assessed were in transit, at the time of the assessment, from Vermont, through this state and Massachusetts, to Connecticut. They were not brought into the state and were not in the state for sale, profit, manufacture, employment, or for any other purpose except that of transportation, and, having been detained here so long only as was reasonably necessary in the use of the Connecticut river as a natural highway, they had no situs in this state for the purpose of taxation. They were here temporarily, and for a purpose wholly excluding the idea of a permanent lodgment in the state, or of becoming incorporated with and forming a part of the personal property of the state." Now, in the cases above adverted to, it appears that the property was within the state for the sole purpose of transportation, which had already commenced, and the delay was not unreasonable, but was in each instance only such as was necessary. A somewhat different case is presented in Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257. Certain coal was mined in Pennsylvania, exported therefrom, and imported into the state of Louisiana, and when the assessment was made by the authorities of the latter state the coal was afloat in the Mississippi river in the original condition in which it was exported. It had just arrived by flatboats, and was held for sale by the boat load, and thereafter more than half of it had been exported by foreign steamships, and the balance sold into the interior of the state by the flatboat load. Taxes thereon had been paid in Pennsylvania. It was held that, being in New Orleans, and held there for sale, without reference to the destination or use which the purchasers might wish to make of it, the tax thereon was not a tax on either imports or exports, nor upon commerce. After asserting that the taxing of goods coming from other states, as such, by reason of their so coming, would be a discriminating tax against them as imports, and would be a regulation of interstate commerce, the court, in the opinion, said: "But if, after their arrival within the state,—that being their place of destination for use or trade,—if, after this, they are subjected to a general tax laid alike on all property within the city, we fail to see how such a taxing can be deemed a regulation of commerce which would have the objectionable effect referred to."

The dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Bradley in the case of Pullman's Palace-Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 80, 35 L. ed. 619, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, has been cited by counsel for plaintiff as containing some expressions applicable to the case at bar. The majority opinion upholds the right of the state to impose a tax upon the capital stock of corporations engaged in transportation within the state, and having at all times a large number of cars in the state, by taking as a basis of assessment such proportion of its capital stock as the number of miles of railroad over which it runs its cars in this state bears to the whole number of miles of the road. In announcing the reasons of himself and two other members of the court for a dissent, the learned justice used the following language, by way, evidently, of illustration: "Certainly; property merely carried through a state cannot be taxed by the state. Such a tax would be a duty,—which a state cannot impose. If a drove of cattle is driven through Pennsylvania, from Illinois to New York, for the purpose of being sold in New York, whilst in Pennsylvania it may be subject to the police regulations of the state, but it is not subject to taxation there." The majority opinion clearly points out the distinction between a tax upon the right to carry on a business and a tax upon the property employed therein, and it was there said: "The state, having the right, for the purposes of taxation, to tax any personal property found within its jurisdiction, without regard to the place of the owner's domicile, could tax the specific cars which at a given moment were within its borders." The case of Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257, was followed in Pittsburg & S. Coal Co. v. Bates, 156 U. S. 577, 39 L. ed. 588, in which case it was contended that the coal and barges moored in the Mississippi river awaiting orders for their further movement had not reached any destination. The coal was brought down the river for the purposes of sale. The principle may be deduced from these authorities that personal property merely in transit through a state is not subject to taxation therein, as it is not to be considered as having acquired a situs in such state. The decisions have been usually qualified by adding, "unless the property is there for use or sale," or some other equivalent language. Respecting the reference of Mr. Justice Bradley to the driving of cattle through the state of Pennsylvania, it must appear evident that, even if he had said "sheep," instead of "cattle," such a driving through the eastern state he mentioned and Wyoming would not necessarily consist of the same qualities. Live stock is not maintained in the eastern states by grazing upon the natural grasses, as is the case in this region. If driven through such a state as Pennsylvania, we apprehend the cattle or sheep would be detained at convenient places for feeding, and thus such delays would be only such as would be necessary to properly care for the stock, and the feeding would be merely an incident of the transit; but with the sheep in the case at bar they grazed, and were thus maintained, as they traveled, going slowly enough to permit that, and to accomplish such purpose, were allowed to spread out over an area a quarter of a mile in width, travel through pastures fenced and unfenced, or across the public domain; and they were maintained, while on the journey, in the same manner as if they had not been in course of transit at all. The question, therefore, arises whether the sheep of plaintiff were brought into the state for use, or, in the language of the statute, to graze; for we assume that, if driven into the state for the purpose of being grazed, that is such a "use" as would come within the exception noted in the cases which have been referred to. We do not understand that an ultimate design to transport sheep out of the state is at all inconsistent with a purpose of bringing them into the state to graze. The time of the contemplated shipment may be uncertain, or it may be extended for a considerable period into the future. Incidentally, no doubt, that intention should be taken into account, but we do not conceive it to be a conclusive circumstance in determining the situs of the property, or the purpose of its presence within the state.

It is altogether clear that in case of herd sheep in this county they must, according to custom, be maintained somewhere by grazing, until the time fixed upon has arrived for starting them upon their journey to some final destination. It may well be that, if it is not desired that they shall reach such destination before a certain time, and that in the meantime the necessity of allowing them to graze and obtain the benefits therefrom is recognized places therefor may be selected by the owner, which will subserve the latter purpose, and at the same time facilitate their final transportation when the occasion therefor shall occur. Such property is migratory. They are almost constantly moving. The character of the natural grasses, and the effect thereon by the grazing of sheep, is such that such movement is necessary. They cannot be permitted to remain stationary, and feed in the same place a very long period of time. Therefore it follows that, as they must move, their course can be readily directed along the direction in which they are eventually to be taken. In such a case the purpose of grazing is not inconsistent with the idea of a driving or transportation to some distant place. Nevertheless, the mere fact that in such driving they are also permitted to graze upon the way will not determine, at all hazards, the character of the purpose in bringing them into the state. Each case must, it would seem, depend upon its own facts. It will not do to say that in every case, because an owner brings his sheep into the state to drive them through it to some other jurisdiction for purposes of sale or otherwise, they are therefore merely in transit, for the reason that such a course might be selected which would consume quite a time in getting out of the state, and at the same time the animals would be maintained by grazing, the same as if kept in the state from which they came, or if they had originally been within this state, and all the benefits would be derived that would accrue in the absence of any such intended transportation. The sheep would thus be used here in the same and only manner in which during the same time they would be used anywhere. We are of the opinion, therefore, that in determining the purpose and the situs, the course and method of travel is a proper subject and one of the elements for consideration. We do not dispute the proposition that an owner of live stock, if not otherwise disobedient to the law, and observant of the police regulations of the state, has the right to transport them to market by driving on foot as well as by rail. Strictly speaking, they will be in transit by the one method as much as by the other. If, however, the purpose of such owner is not alone that of transportation, but comprehends also that of grazing and feeding them upon the natural grasses, which is their natural source of sustenance, not as a mere necessary incident of the travel, but as one of the purposes of such movement, they would not come within the rule which exempts personal property in transit from taxation. To determine the existence or nonexistence of such a joint purpose, all the facts must be considered, the course taken; the character of the territory grazed upon; the time employed; the subsequent method of intended shipment; the ordinary facilities for transportation by other means; the place selected for the commencement of the journey by rail, if that is in contemplation; possibly the time of the year, and the eventual purpose of their shipment; the character of the live stock, and the manner in which said stock is customarily kept, maintained, and grown; and in general every competent fact which will tend to explain the purpose in view. These considerations seem to us to involve a mixed question of law and fact, and upon reserved questions this court should not decide questions of fact. A direct decision upon the second reserved question is, therefore, not proper for us to render. We have indicated such legal principles, as, in our judgment, should control the determination of that matter. In addition to the observations already made, we might say that, whether or not the sheep were intended to remain here "permanently" is of little consequence, as that term is possible to be understood. Such property may properly acquire a situs in the state for the purposes of taxation, and yet remain here a comparatively short time. If it shall be found, as a fact, reasonably deducible from the agreed statement in the case at bar, that the sheep had been, in the first instance, brought into the state for use or to graze, and had, on that account, acquired a situs within the state, the observations of the court in the case of Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715, would be pertinent. The court had under consideration the right of a town in New Hampshire to tax certain logs which had been brought down the winter before from some point in that state, and placed in the stream, and on the banks thereof in said town, to be from thence floated down the Androscoggin river to the state of Maine, to be there manufactured and sold. It was clear that the logs could not be taxed by reason of their intended exportation, as that would amount to laying a duty on exports which would be an infraction of the Federal Constitution. Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, in the opinion said: "Such goods do not cease to be part of the general mass of property in the state, subject, as such, to its jurisdiction, and to taxation in the usual way, until they have been shipped, or entered with a common carrier for transportation to another state, or have been started upon such transportation in a continuous route or journey. . . . It seems to us untenable to hold that a crop or herd is exempt from taxation merely because it is, by its owner, intended for exportation." And in discussing the subject when the journey must be considered as begun, the learned justice said: "But this movement does not begin until the articles have been shipped or started for transportation from the one state to the other. The carrying of them in carts or other vehicles, or even floating them, to the depot where the journey is to commence is no part of that journey. That is all preliminary work performed for the purpose of putting the property in a state of preparation and readiness for transportation. Until actually launched on its way to another state, or committed to a common carrier for transportation to such state, its destination is not fixed and certain. It may be sold or otherwise disposed of within the state, and never put in course of transportation out of the state. Carrying it from the farm or the forest to the depot, is only an interior movement of the property, entirely within the state, for the purpose, it is true, but only for the purpose, of putting it into a course of exportation; it is no part of the exportation itself. Until shipped or started on its final journey out of the state its exportation is a matter altogether in fieri, and not at all a fixed and certain thing." Hence, in the case before us, if it should be a fact that the property had already been incorporated with the general mass of personal property in the state, its shipment would not be deemed to have commenced until started on its final journey out of the state, which occurred at the time it was sent by rail from Pine Bluffs station. That station is located on the line of the Union Pacific Railway which traverses from east to west the entire state. Sheep driven from the western part of the state from any point in the vicinity of Utah in an easterly direction would pass numerous stations on that railway, any one of many of which might be selected as a place of shipment.

The third certified question relates to the fact that plaintiff returned his sheep for assessment and taxation for the same year in Utah. If plaintiff's property was otherwise legally taxable under the revenue laws of this state, the fact above mentioned would not exempt it, in the absence of a statute to that effect. We regard that proposition as too well sanctioned by the authorities to require discussion. Brown v. Houston, 38 La. Ann. 843, 114 U. S. 622, 29 L. ed. 257; Pullman's Palace-Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 80, 35 L. ed. 619, 8 Inters. Com. Rep. 595, dissenting opinion; Cooley, Taxn. 37, 219-221; C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. v. Loraine, 22 Fed. Rep. 54; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S. 517, 29 L. ed. 715; Dyer v. Osborne, 11 R. I. 321, 23 Am. Rep. 460.

Our own constitutional provisions, quoted in an earlier part of this opinion, are invoked in opposition to the law of 1895, and the tax collected from the plaintiff. The proposition contended for is that, under the statute in question, the assessor was required to proceed at once; and that such peremptory action would be a violation of the constitutional rules relating to uniformity, equality, and due process of law. To sustain the proposition contended for, it is argued that uniformity and equality of taxation means equality and uniformity in the rate and also in the mode of assessment; that, as there is implied equality in the burden, that cannot exist without uniformity in the mode of assessment, it is then urged as the sole ground for the claim that there is an absence of uniformity in the mode of assessment, that no provision is made for notice, or for a hearing, or a correction of the assessment or tax, as in case of property embraced in the regular annual assessment. An examination of the authorities cited discloses that reference to the mode of assessment as concerns the rule of uniformity does not mean that, in the case of the assessment of all kinds of taxable property, the same officers shall act, or that the proceedings touching the assessment shall be the same. There is uniformity in the assessment and in the mode thereof if the same basis of valuation is taken as to all property of like character. The Constitution itself provides for the assessment of railroads and other common carriers upon their franchises, roadway, rails, rolling stock, and all other property used in their operation, except machine shops, rolling mills, and hotels, by a state board, for all state, county, and school-district taxes; and also that such board shall fix the valuation each year for the assessment of all live stock. Const. art. 15, § 10. Property other than that owned by common carriers is assessed by county officials, and the value of all personal property, except live stock, is determined by them. But is it true that the statutes provide for no hearing or review? It is evident that the law of 1895 must be construed together with other laws relating to the same subject. It seems to have been assumed that the property of plaintiff was assessed and taxed only in pursuance of that statute, but we are unable to assent to that theory. Sections 8845-8849, Rev. Stat., brought into the revision from the Laws of 1884, provide for and regulate the assessment and collection of taxes on all personal property brought, driven, or coming into the state prior to the last day of the year. Those provisions were before the court in the case of Frontier Land & Cattle Co. v. Baldwin, 8 Wyo. 764, and were held not to contravene any of the congressional enactments which constitute the fundamental law of the territory, and their validity under the state Constitution has not been questioned, so far as we are aware. Except as far as they may have been in conflict with the act of 1895, they were in full force during that year. It is required by § 8846 that personal property coming into the state after the annual assessment shall be assessed at the same value as property of like kind and character is appraised and valued for the current year, and that the levy shall be the same as that made upon like property for the current year. The assessor is required to assess such property as soon as possible after he shall obtain knowledge of the existence of such property in the county, and the assessment is to be made in the same manner as other assessments. The county clerk is required to levy the tax thereon and enter the same upon the tax list for the current year. The duty of collecting the tax devolves upon the regular county collector of taxes. Section 8847. The statute of 1895 changed these provisions somewhat in respect to the levy and collection as to live stock brought into the state to graze. The assessor was substituted for the county clerk and collector, in regard to the levy and collection; but it seems entirely clear that the restrictions upon the manner of the assessment and rate of the levy mentioned in § 8846 would have controlled the action of the assessor in taxing live stock coming in to graze after the annual assessment. Such provisions are general, covering the case of any kind of personal property which is brought into the state subsequent to such annual assessment. The act of 1895 was silent concerning the basis of valuation and rate of levy, and therefore did not repeal the former statutory regulations controlling that matter. The assessable value of all live stock is fixed by the state board in March of each year. It is true that § 8845 provides that the taxes so assessed become due and payable at the same time as other taxes, unless assessed after the regular annual taxes are payable, in which event they become due and payable upon demand. It is, however, also provided by § 8847 that, if there is danger of removal, the collector may levy upon and detain sufficient of the property, and hold the same until the taxes thereon are due, unless a sufficient deposit is made with him to cover the taxes and costs. Although the statutes of 1895 require immediate collection, we do not think, in view of the migratory character of the property, and other provisions of the law, which will be adverted to, that any principle of uniformity was thereby infringed upon. The courts have gone to great lengths in upholding the authority of the legislature to classify property for purposes of taxation, and establish such rules, according to the nature and habits of the property, as will insure its bearing its due and proper burden of government. In Wisconsin the statute was held valid which required the assessors to assess all logs and lumber of nonresidents piled upon the banks of streams for shipment in April, although other personal property was not assessed until the 1st of May. This provision was evidently enacted to guard against the removal of such property prior to May, and thereby escape taxation. C. N. Nelson Lumber Co. v. Loraine, 22 Fed. Rep. 54. The further fact is also pertinent that the interval between the completion of the annual assessment and levy and the time when taxes are regularly payable is so short that a requirement of earlier payment of a tax upon migratory animals could hardly be considered unjust or inequitable. Now, in regard to hearing and opportunity for review, it is further provided in § 8846, that any person aggrieved by any proceedings under it and the preceding and subsequent sections may apply to the board of county commissioners at any general or special meeting, to have the assessment equalized or corrected in any just particular; and the duty is enjoined upon the board to equalize and correct the same as justice may require, and, if the party complaining has paid an unjust tax, to refund to him the amount he has paid in excess of what he ought to have paid. We perceive no reason why that regulation was not open to any person in the situation of plaintiff, or anyone whose property had been taxed by the assessor under the provisions of the act of 1895, after the annual assessment. Such person would not have been taxed solely in pursuance of the last above-mentioned act, but under all the provisions and regulations affecting the taxation of such property as they existed, taken together, modifying and controlling each other. If such live stock was covered by the act of 1895 had been assessed prior to the determination of the rate of levy for the current year by the proper officials, the requirement for immediate collection would have been inoperative in its strict sense, as delay on the part of the assessor for purposes of collection would have been necessary until the rate had been fixed. In such case the command for immediate collection would have been understood to mean as soon as practicable, or immediately after the rate had been determined upon. In that case, moreover, the person taxed would have had the same opportunities that all other taxpayers were given to appear before the board of equalization. As long as the rate and method of valuation are the same as in case of other property, we are unable to conceive of any valid reason why a statute affecting the taxation of a peculiar class of property may not be enacted to guard against its escape therefrom. Absolute equality in taxation is an impossibility. The late Mr. Justice Miller of the Federal Supreme Court said in one of the opinions of that court that it was an "unrealized dream." In the case of Com. v. Brush Electric Light Co. 145 Pa. 147, the court said: "Where the measure of value and the rate are uniform and applicable to all the members of the given class, the incidental hardships and inequalities must be borne." And the supreme court of Texas expressed itself as follows: "Taxes are said, within the meaning of the Constitution, to be 'equal and uniform,' when no person or class of persons in the taxing district, whether a state, county, or other municipal corporation, is taxed at a different rate than are other persons in the same district upon the same value or the same thing, and where the objects of taxation are the same by whomsoever owned, or whatever they be." Norris v. Waco, 57 Tex. 685. The difficulty is so apparent that we shall not attempt to formulate a general definition of equality and uniformity in taxation applicable to all cases, as such words are used in the Constitution. Neither is it requisite in this case that we should do so. In 1895 the legislature of the state of Washington enacted a law very similar to our statute of the same year. It was provided thereby that when any cattle, horses, sheep, or goats are driven into any county, of the state for the purpose of grazing at any time after the 1st Monday in April in any year, they shall be liable to be assessed for all taxes leviable in that county for that year, the same as if they had been in the county at the time of the annual assessment; and it was made the duty of the assessor to assess the same, and the taxes became due upon such assessment. The sheriff was required to collect such taxes at once in the manner provided for the collection of delinquent taxes. Laws 1895, p. 105. That statute came before the court in Wright v. Stinson, 16 Wash. 368, and was assailed as unconstitutional. It was held that no constitutional right was invaded by the act. Such statutes, in some other states, have been declared invalid, on the ground that there existed no provisions for taxing other kinds of personal property coming in after the annual assessment. As in Washington, so in this state, there is no discrimination in that respect.

The fourth question reserved for our decision is, in substance, whether the payment of the tax by plaintiff, under the evidence, was voluntary or otherwise, and whether it was so made as would authorize its recovery, if illegal. The facts as agreed to are that the money was paid after a refusal to pay the same upon a demand, and to prevent the seizure and sale of plaintiff's property, and the damages which would thereby accrue to the plaintiff. If that is true, we do not perceive what difference it makes whether the threat made by the collector was that he could take enough sheep or that he would do so. The concession that the payment was made to prevent the seizure implies that seizure was intended or imminent, and that both parties so understood it. Under such a statute as that of 1895, requiring the same officer to assess, levy, and collect the taxes, giving him all the power of collecting officers, and applying to property of the character upon which these taxes were paid, it would not take very strong evidence of force to show a payment of the tax to be involuntary, particularly so when the statute, as in § 8846, enjoins upon the commissioners the duty of refunding such an amount as they should discover to be unjust. In our judgment the payment was made under such circumstances as would authorize the recovery if the tax should prove to be illegal.

The seventh certified question is, "For the recovery of taxes paid in the manner set forth in this case, against whom should a suit be brought; and, in this case, is the suit brought against the proper persons?" Plaintiff relies upon the cases of Powder River Cattle Co. v. Johnson County Comrs. 8 Wyo. 598, 603, and 638; Johnson County Comrs. v. Searight Cattle Co. 8 Wyo. 777,—wherein it was held that actions to recover back taxes collected by the county collector of taxes on account of state, county, and school-district taxes can only be maintained against the officer making the collection. It is clear that, unless manifest error has crept into a former decision of the court, and works injustice, it should not be departed from. A mere doubt on our part concerning its correctness is not sufficient to require a review thereof. It is equally well settled that, if it appears to be radically unsound, and subverts no useful purpose, but, on the contrary, establishes a hardship which is not within the manifest contemplation of the law, and, moreover, if no injurious results will be likely to follow a reversal, no principle of stare decisis interferes with a reconsideration of the principle involved and a reversal of the doctrine formerly announced. In consequence of a deep feeling that nothing but hardship and injustice flow from the law as construed in those cases, and especially as the late chief justice dissented there from in vigorous opinions, we deem it wise and expedient to examine the question anew, in the endeavor to discover whether the statutes are reasonably susceptible of the construction given them in the cases aforesaid. It may be premised that no provision has ever been made by law for a reimbursement to the collecting officer should a recovery be maintained against him, and that the invalidity which may require the return of a tax to the one paying it may have been the result of the action of other taxing officials, and even of the board itself in ordering the levy. The statute, then, which imposes such onerous responsibilities upon the public servant which obeys the mandates of the tax warrant should be unmistakable. It would be far better, and more consonant with equity, that the taxpayer should suffer in a single instance than that one officer, possibly without fault, should bear the burden in many; or that the loss should be distributed among several than borne entirely by a single individual, in case the law has permitted such a loss to fall upon anyone. These observations are suggested merely as incidental to an examination of the statutes themselves. They must control. They should receive such construction, however, as shall harmonize them with the general policy of our laws and institutions, should their language permit it.

The statute providing the method of legal procedure to recover back taxes which may have been illegally collected is § 9055, Rev. Stat., and that part relating to such subject reads as follows: "Actions to recover back taxes and assessments must be brought against the officer who made the collection, or, if he is dead, against his personal representative; and when they were not collected on the tax list the corporation which made the levy must be joined in the action: provided, that when the money derived from said taxes or assessment has been actually paid over to any municipal corporation for whose use and benefit it was levied or collected, then an action shall be brought against said municipal corporation to recover said taxes or assessments." That part of the section preceding the proviso was taken from Ohio, in which state the action was in all cases to be brought against the collecting officer, unless not collected on the tax duplicate. The only taxes in this state, and possibly in Ohio, which would not be placed on the tax list, would be local taxes for improvements, such as assessments to construct sewers in the city of Cheyenne, and in other instances where taxes are assessed according to benefits. It is evident that no taxes are collected for state or county purposes except on the tax list, but the party to be joined in an action for the recovery of taxes not on the list is described as the "corporation," without the qualifying word "municipal." Yet it is only such a corporation as a city or town which could possibly be embraced within the provision. When, however, a municipal corporation is mentioned in the proviso, it has been thought to refer only to such a corporation in its most limited sense. I mention this at this time to show that it is entirely probable that the legislature did not intend, by the use of said respective designations, to confine itself to the precise use of language in legal acceptance. The difficulty supposed to arise in the construction of this section of the statute is in the reference to a "municipal corporation" in the proviso; and a majority of the court in the cases above cited concluded that a corporation such as a "county" would not be included therein. The first portion of the section having been imported from Ohio, it will be well to notice some of the other relative provisions of the statutes of that state then in force. In the first place, all the regular taxes which go upon any tax list of the state, county, school district, and of any city, village, or hamlet, within the county, go upon one list prepared by the county auditor, and all such taxes are collected by the county treasurer. The auditor is required to open an account with each township, city, hamlet, and school district, and, after each semiannual settlement which he makes with the treasurer, to credit each with the net amount collected for its use, and, on the application of the treasurer of each such subordinate corporation, to give him a warrant on the county treasurer for the amount then due. Ohio Rev. Stat. 1880, § 1047. It seems that the treasurer is charged with the taxes upon the list, and he may remain charged with an uncollected tax (§ 1108), but the auditor may deduct an erroneous tax, and give a certificate thereof to the taxpayer for presentation to the treasurer (§ 1088). The treasurer may return an account of uncollected taxes with his reasons therefor. Section 1101. Finally, it is provided that, in case of any recovery from him on account of the collection of the public revenue, he shall be allowed and paid out of the county treasury counsel fees and other expenses of his defense in the suit and the amount of any damages and costs adjudged against him, all of which is required to be apportioned ratably by the county auditor among all the parties entitled to share the revenue so collected, and deducted from the shares or portions of the revenue at any time payable to each, including as one of said parties the state, as well as the counties, townships, cities, villages, and school districts, and other organizations entitled. Section 2862. It will be thus observed that in Ohio the system is made plain and harmonious. The treasurer collects for all taxing authorities, and, in case of damages recovered against him, is given a sure indemnity. At the same time a convenient method is provided, whereby a taxpayer who has been unlawfully assessed may secure a return of his money. At the time our legislature adopted the provision in respect to actions to recover taxes illegally collected, it was undoubtedly perceived that the revenue laws were somewhat dissimilar to those in Ohio, that a treasurer was not given indemnity when he had dispensed the funds collected by him; and not desired to interfere, or alter the provisions already in force concerning the collection of the public revenue, devised the more simple method of adding the proviso to the effect that, after the municipal corporation for whose use and benefit it had been collected, had received the tax, it should be made the respondent in an action for a recovery of such tax. We think a county is included in the designation "municipal corporation" as used in the proviso. While it is true that, in a restricted sense, and possibly by way of distinction, the term "municipal," as applied to a corporation, is generally understood to refer to such subordinate organizations as a city or town, nevertheless it is not improper, nor at all uncommon in legal parlance, to include a county within the designation "municipal corporation." That was conceded in the majority opinion in the Powder River Cattle Co. Case.

A further obstacle to declaring that the county is embraced within the meaning of the proviso was deemed to arise from the words, "for whose use and benefit it was levied and collected." It was thought that state and school district taxes were not collected for the use and benefit of the county. If that were so, we are unable to perceive why the statute would not authorize an action against the county for the money which was actually received for its use and benefit, and why it should be allowed, as to them, to hide behind the fact that there might be other money which was not held for its benefit. The words quoted, however, must receive a reasonable construction. In view of other statutory provisions, to which reference will be made, we are not inclined to apply to such words any narrow and confined meaning. As to state taxes, the county is made responsible for all which are levied, and it is not permitted to receive credit except for such assessments as are certified to be double or erroneous. A particular tax is not returned itemized to the state, but payments are made on account of the county's actual statutory liability. Such taxes are, in a certain sense, collected for the use and benefit of the county. It could not escape settlement with the state by an absolute refusal to collect the taxes. To relieve itself from the burden imposed upon it by law, it must collect and pay over the taxes. Whatever may be the regulations existing between the county as an organization and the school districts within its boundaries, it levies taxes for the support of all the schools, and the special district taxes which have been legally voted by each district. The treasurer collects them, and is the custodian thereof until lawfully paid out to the district treasurers upon the apportionment and order of the county superintendent as to the common-school tax, and according to law as to the special district taxes. Before school-district treasurers are entitled to receive any of the money, they are required to furnish bonds, to be approved by the board of county commissioners in each case, who also fix the amount thereof. The school money is referred to in the statutes as in the county treasury. Laws 1895, chap. 44. For its use and benefit, in accordance with law, the school moneys are collected and received for the county. Not, it is true, to assist in carrying on the ordinary functions of county government, but, as an agency of the state, to levy and collect taxes to support and maintain the school organizations located within its limits. In that sense we conceive that the language was used in the proviso. Such a construction does no violence to the words employed, but recognizes the various capacities in which the county acts, and the duties devolving upon it, as well as the power with which it is clothed. Neither does that construction work harshly upon the county corporation, as we shall attempt to show. Section 8821, Rev. Stat., was thought to be in conflict with the statute above considered. We are not of that opinion, but believe that it harmonizes with it, and tends to explain it. The two sections should be so construed that both shall stand, if possible. That section is as follows: "In all cases where any person shall pay any tax, or any portion thereof, that shall thereafter be found to be erroneous or illegal, whether the same be owing to clerical errors or other errors, the board of county commissioners shall direct the treasurer to refund the same to the taxpayer, or, in case any real property subject to taxation shall be sold for the payment of such erroneous tax, the error in tax may at any time be corrected as above provided, and shall not affect the validity of the sale, but such property shall be redeemed by the county as hereinafter set forth." The provision for redemption referred to is found in § 8883, which, in substance, requires the county to repay to a purchaser at tax sale of any land sold by mistake or unlawfully the amount to which he would have been entitled had the sale been legal; and the treasurer, unless the invalidity is not his fault, is made liable to the county for the amount. These two sections, 8821 and 8833, must be construed together. The former impresses upon the county board the absolute duty to direct the treasurer to refund any tax found to be erroneous, and, in case land has been sold for such erroneous tax, the same may be corrected in the same manner, or "as above provided," which means by directing the treasurer to refund the same. If sold, then the one entitled to payment is the purchaser, and the amount to be refunded is specified and fixed by the provisions of § 8833. Now, it is reasonably clear that the thing to be refunded is the tax. The statute does not say that the same shall be returned by a payment out of the general fund of the county, or out of any particular fund. The tax is to be refunded. That tax will have gone into various funds. The command, therefore, as I understand it, is to take the proportionate amounts from each fund. This conclusion was reached in Iowa under a similar statute. Lauman v. Des Moines County, 29 Iowa, 810; Stone v. Woodbury County, 51 Iowa, 522. See also George's Creek Coal & I. Co. v. Allegany County Comrs. 59 Md. 255.

The erroneous character of the tax may be adjudged by the courts in a suit for a recovery of the amount paid, or by some other authorized proceedings, or the board itself may discover that it is invalid. In either event, it is to be refunded to the person entitled thereto. The legislature having constituted the county authorities and officers the agency to assess, levy, and collect the tax, and having designated the county treasurer the custodian of the proceeds, at least temporarily in all cases, it was certainly entirely competent for the lawmaking power to confer upon the board the authority—nay, more, to impose upon it the duty—of directing the custodian to return the tax, and in doing so to take it from the respective funds into which it had gone. It might have been expressed by language more in detail, but we think it has done so by the general terms employed. Suppose the requirement had been that the treasurer refund the tax. Could there be any question but that he should take it from the funds of which it formed a part? Where is the distinction if the legislative command is that the action of the treasurer shall be directed by the board? Part of the tax collected being for state purposes, the statute requires it to be refunded. The treasurer, by direction of the board, is made the agency to return it. It is not to be expected that the identical moneys received shall be refunded in any event, or under whatever construction § 8821 might receive. There is, at all times, more or less money in the various funds which are to be dispensed to other organizations. If not, the repayment can be made when any such fund shall be replenished. Whether the amount of interest, and costs which may be paid to a purchaser of lands at tax sales, and which is required to be paid to him by the county on discovery of the illegality of the sale, is to come out of the different funds, or is to be paid by the county itself, to be reimbursed by the liability of the treasurer, if it exists is a question which need not now be determined. It is not clear to us upon what theory it can be truly said that, as to state taxes, the county should not be compelled, if illegally exacted, to refund them. The county is a debtor to the state for such taxes, but for all erroneous taxes charged against it the law requires that it shall be credited; and this court has held that such credit shall be extended upon its account, whenever it is certified to the proper state officer. State v. Laramie County Comrs. (Wyo.) 38 Pac. 992, 35 Pac. 929. It is therefore manifest that, should the county refund such erroneous tax, it would be entitled to a credit upon its account with the state.

Under the decisions in the Powder River Cattle Co. and Searight Cattle Co. Cases a person who has paid an unlawful state and county tax is granted a remedy, but one which consists in pursuing an officer individually, who may only have done his duty skillfully and faithfully; and, if that official is unable to respond, the taxpayer is still remediless, and the right given to him is an empty one. If the amount is collected from the officer or his representative, they are caused to bear a loss which belongs in justice to the public. Thus the remedy would often be without advantage to anyone, and unjust whenever it should possess any merit. Under the construction which we believe to be the only true and correct one, all those disadvantages depart, all the provisions become harmonious, and without any straining of language. It enforces the manifest legislative design. For the reasons aforesaid, it is our opinion that an action to recover back taxes, when they have been paid by the collecting officer into the county treasury, should be brought against the county in its corporate name. In the cases where the action is to be brought against the collecting officer, he must be sued individually. That seems to be the plain meaning of the statute, and it was so held in Ohio. 13 Bull. 334; Ratterman v. State, 44 Ohio St. 641.

The effect of a decision of the supreme court construing a statute renders it the law for the time being as so construed. Parties have a right to act upon such a decision, and no injury ought to be allowed to result, by reason of a dependence thereon, if the decision is subsequently changed, any more than in case of a repeal of a statute. Hollinshead v. Van Glahn, 4 Minn. 190 (Gil. 181). Until the decision now rendered, since the announcement of the court in the cases heretofore referred to, the law of the state has been as set forth and adjudged in those cases, at least to the extent that no one should be injured by relying thereon. Consequently, any case which has been brought against the collecting officer in his individual capacity should be permitted to proceed without objection on that ground. This case is not against the officer individually.

We have not arrived at the conclusion to depart from the rule heretofore announced except after mature reflection and a profound sense of an imperative necessity. This disposes of all the questions except the eighth, which, under our former decisions, is not a proper one for reservation.

To the first question, we answer that, if the sheep of the plaintiff were brought into this state for the purpose of being grazed, they were subject to taxation in the year 1895. To the second question: We have stated in this opinion the legal principles which should apply to a consideration of the fact whether or not the animals were driven in for grazing purposes. It is not proper for us to determine the fact itself in this kind of proceeding. To the third question, our answer is in the negative. To the fourth question: The payment was involuntary. To the fifth question: The plaintiff was afforded by law an opportunity to be heard, as set forth in this opinion. The taxes were not illegal for any reason mentioned in such question. To the sixth question: Chapter 61, Sess. Laws 1895, was constitutional. Our answer to the seventh question has been given above.

CLARKE HARDWARE COMPANY.

To a declaration substantially alleging that the plaintiff sought to purchase a particular kind of loaded cartridges, and was negligently given by defendant's agent to sell certain loaded cartridges which were represented to be of the kind asked for, and which were alleged to be very similar in size, make, and mark to those desired, but were in reality of different caliber, and that on account of such difference in caliber the plaintiff (he being without fault or negligence in handling the cartridges so purchased, and while using the same properly) was injured by the premature explosion of one of them,—Held: (1) That it was error to sustain a demurrer for want of a cause of action. (2) That the allegations in the declaration authorized a submission of the case to a jury to determine the facts involved,—among them whether or not the injury could have been avoided by the plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care.

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Glenn & Rountree and J. A. Noyes, for plaintiff in error:

It appearing from the allegations in the declaration that the damage resulted directly and proximately from defendant's breach of duty to, and implied contract with, plaintiff, the damages suffered are not too remote to be recovered.

Messrs. Rosser & Carter for defendant in error.

Little, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Smith brought an action against the Clarke Hardware Company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the explosion in his face of a cartridge purchased from said company. In his declaration the plaintiff alleges, substantially, that he applied to an employee of the defendant company for a particular kind of loaded cartridges, to wit, No. 38 caliber, for a Winchester rifle, and that defendant's agent to sell negligently gave to plaintiff certain loaded cartridges, which were represented to be of the kind and caliber asked for, and which were in fact very similar in size, make, and mark to those desired, but were in reality of different caliber, and manufactured and intended for use in altogether a different firearm. It is alleged that notwithstanding the cartridges actually sold to plaintiff were marked on the end "S. & W." and the cartridges desired were marked "W. S.," yet the letters on the end of each were of the same size, and both kinds of cartridges very nearly the same size, differing only in the fact that the spread of the ball in the cartridges sold to plaintiff was broader than that in the cartridges asked for, in consequence whereof plaintiff did not detect the difference until after he was injured; that petitioner was in no way negligent in the purchase of said cartridges, nor in failing to detect that they were not the right kind of cartridges, nor in his use of said cartridges in his rifle at the time the injury occurred; nor was he in any way to blame for such injury. To this action the defendant demurred upon the grounds (1) that no cause of action is set up in said petition; (2) the petition shows upon its face that the negligence of the plaintiff caused the damage complained of in said petition; (3) the petition shows upon its face that by the exercise of ordinary care the plaintiff could have avoided the injury which he complains of in said petition. This demurrer was sustained by the court below, and the action dismissed, to which ruling the plaintiff excepts.

The second and third grounds of the demurrer were obviously untenable. It is inconsistent to admit all the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, as the demurrer does, and yet contend that the petition shows on its face that the negligence of plaintiff caused the damage, or that the injury could have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff. It is manifest from the allegations contained in the petition that it cannot be adjudged, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was negligent. The character of his allegations is such that, with defendant's liability in other respects established, the points raised by the second and third grounds of the demurrer are questions of fact, which should be submitted to and determined by a jury. We therefore come to consider the single question, Does the petition set forth a cause of action? Has the plaintiff suffered at the hands of the defendant the consequences of a tort arising by reason of the negligence of the latter? Inasmuch as there can be no actionable negligence in the absence of the existence of a duty, and inasmuch as there can be no tort unless in a transaction of this character the law imposed upon the defendant the duty of exercising ordinary care in the sale of such goods to purchasers, it becomes material only to consider whether there was a duty imposed by law upon the defendant to exercise such care relatively to the plaintiff. As stated, there can be no case of the negligent injury of one person by another in the absence of a legal duty from the person inflicting the injury to the person on whom it is inflicted. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 415, ¶ 8, and authorities there cited. It must be a duty implied by law, although it may arise out of contract. Bishop, Non-Cont. L. §§ 132, 133. In actions of tort no duty is considered in law except a legal duty, and all legal duties exist from implication of law. A contract merely creates this implication. Whart. Neg. § 24. In his treatise on Negligence (§ 24) Dr. Wharton has well defined a legal duty to be "that which the law requires to be done or forborne to a determinate person, or to the public at large, and is correlative to a right vested in such determinate person, or in the public." The obligation involved is not a moral obligation, but it is the obligation imposed on every member of society by law so to conduct himself and use his property as not to injure others. Sic utere, tuo ut alienum non laedas. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 417. In every undertaking there arise by implication of law certain rights and duties. The duty incumbent upon the party engaged in the undertaking is to so conduct it that no injury will result to others; and upon every person holding himself out to the public as willing to act in a certain capacity, professional or otherwise, and who has induced persons to commit themselves or their property to his care, there is, by implication of law, a duty to use proper care in his conduct towards them, and, as a consequence of this duty, there is a liability to answer for injuries caused by a breach of it. Id. p. 420, and authorities there cited. Thus, an attorney is liable for negligently giving improper advice (Moorman v. Wood, 117 Ind. 144); a physician, for negligence in the treatment of his patient (Babbitt v. Bumpus, 78 Mich. 881). It has been held that a caterer is liable for injuries caused by poisonous food negligently furnished by him at a public entertainment; the court holding that since he assumed to act as a caterer, and was employed as such, a duty was implied to him by law to perform with due care that which he had undertaken. Bishop v. Weber, 189 Mass. 411, 52 Am. Rep. 715. So, also, an apothecary who, by his servant, negligently sold, as and for tincture of rhubarb, two ounces of laudanum, was held liable for damages resulting from such negligent sale. Norton v. Sewall, 106 Mass. 143, 8 Am. Rep. 298. In the case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, it was held that a dealer in drugs and medicines who carelessly labels a deadly poison as a harmless medicine, and sends it, so labeled, into market, is liable to all persons who, without fault on their part, are injured by using it as such medicine in consequence of the false label; the court further holding that the liability in such case arises, not out of any contract or direct privity between him and the person injured, but out of the duty which the law imposes upon him to avoid acts in their nature dangerous to the lives of others. The imminent danger attending the sale and use of such drugs, and the great difficulty of detecting their poisonous character, impose upon dealers the duty of exercising the highest degree of care known among practical men to prevent injury from the use thereof. 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 691. While, in the sale of cartridges, ammunition, and other devices to be used in firearms, the degree of care required may not be so great, nor the scope of liability so far-reaching, as in the sale of poisonous drugs, by reason of the fact that the dangers attending the former are not so imminent as those attending the latter, there being in all probability much less difficulty in detecting the real kind and character of the one than would be true as to the other, yet it will not be contended that cartridges and kindred devices are not dangerous explosives; and, being such, they cannot be blindly and indifferently distributed to purchasers, without regard to the purpose for which they are to be used, or the age and discretion of the person to whom they are sold. One holding himself out to the public as dealing in such articles at least owes to purchasers the duty of exercising ordinary care in the matter of placing into their hands the kind and character of goods for which they contract. This duty, of course, exists in a higher degree with respect to latent dangers which are hidden from the eye of the nonexpert, and without the knowledge of the uninformed. In the present case we think the defendant owed to the plaintiff the duty of exercising ordinary care in the matter of selecting and selling to him the kind of cartridges asked for. It is claimed that there was a breach of this duty, by reason of the fact that the defendant negligently sold to plaintiff a different cartridge, which was dangerous to be used in the rifle for which he endeavored to buy the cartridges. The demurrer admits the negligent sale, and, holding as we do that such negligence constituted a breach of duty due by the defendant to the plaintiff, and further holding that it is a question of fact, and not of law, as to whether the plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have detected the real character of the cartridge, or otherwise avoided the injury of which he complains, it follows that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the plaintiff's action. We think the allegations in the declaration authorized the submission of the case to a jury, to determine the facts involved,—among them, whether or not the injury could have been avoided by the plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care.

Judgment reversed.

City of CAPE MAY, Plff. in Err.,

*Headnotes by NIXON, J.

NOTE.—Municipal control over public nuisances upon public streets and highways created by street railroads and other electrical companies.

I. Street railroads.

II. Telegraph and electrical poles, etc.

III. Steam and electricity.

Upon the question of municipal control over nuisances in highways and streets in general, see note to Hagerstown v. Witmer (Md.)—L. R. A. —.

Cases in which the power of a municipality to proceed in equity for the abatement of public nuisances created by street railroads and electrical companies will be found specifically treated of in a later note.

I. Street railroads.

Generally it may be said that the municipal authorities have a right, under their police power, to pass all necessary laws for the purpose of regulating the use of the streets by railroad companies, and that all such laws and regulations are valid as being for the benefit of the public safety and general welfare, so long as they do not contravene any constitutional provisions. It is not, however, within the province of this note to consider or define the extent of such power, except in so far as it relates to the question of nuisances relating to the operation of such roads.

In the principal case of CAPE MAY v. CAPE MAY, D. B. & S. P. R. Co. turnouts, built pursuant to an ordinance giving the company power to lay tracks on certain streets in the city, are not such obstructions as will justify their summary and forcible removal by the police without notice, and notice should be given before any ordinance interfering with such city rights can be adopted, although a resolution declaring such a turnout an obstruction, and directing the employment of counsel to take legal measures to compel its removal, is not objectionable.

Where the lawmaking power has given railroad railway company to lay its tracks on certain streets (naming them), and also to construct all necessary switches and turnouts. Held, that turnouts built in pursuance of such authority, unless it clearly appears that the authority has been exceeded, are not such an obstruction of the streets as to warrant their summary and forcible removal by police intervention without notice or a hearing.

2. Notice, either actual or constructive, companies the right to construct their railroads upon the streets, and invested the local government of such cities both with the fee of the soil and the exclusive control over the streets, and if, in the exercise of their proprietary rights and police regulations over such streets, the authorities should determine that iron rails and their use are a legitimate street improvement, the court cannot control their authority in that respect, as both the city and company derive their rights and privileges from the sovereign power of the state, which cannot be supposed to authorize that which amounts to a nuisance. Milburn v. Cedar Rapids, 12 Iowa, 246.

Under such circumstances such railroads cannot be adjudged obstructions or annoyances which can be declared nuisances. Milburn v. Cedar Rapids, 12 Iowa, 246.

To the same effect are the following cases: Illinois & M. Canal v. Haven, 11 Ill. 554; Moses v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 21 Ill. 513; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana, 298, 33 Am. Dec. 497; Hamilton v. New York & H. R. Co. 9 Paige, 171; Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 508; Chapman v. Albany & S. R. Co. 10 Barb. 360; Heutz v. Long Island R. Co. 13 Barb. 646; Wetmore v. Story, 22 Barb. 414.

The legislature have power to authorize the building of a railroad upon a public road, and such power is indubitable. Danville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 29, 38; Philadelphia & T. R. Co.'s Case, 6 Whart. 25, 36 Am. Dec. 302; Green v. Reading, 9 Watts, 382; Henry v. Pittsburgh & A. Bridge Co. 8 Watts & S. 85; O'Connor v. Pittsburgh, 18 Pa. 189.

And as the legislature has, under the general police power, the constitutional right to authorize a city to grant the right to construct a railroad track, upon which steam engines are operated, across and through the streets, it cannot be said that the obstruction of the street in such a manner is a nuisance per se. Port of Mobile v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 115, 119; Perry v. New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. 55 Ala. 413, 23 Am. Rep. 740.

should be given to all who are interested, before the adoption of an ordinance which affects and practically adjudicates property rights. An unreasonable ordinance will not be sustained.

3. A resolution by a city council declaring the turnout of a street railway to be an unlawful obstruction, and directing the street committee to employ counsel and take legal measures to remove it, is not objectionable.

(July 1, 1897.)

ERROR to the Supreme Court to review a judgment setting aside on certiorari a res-

In Geiger v. Filor, 8 Fla. 325, 332, it is stated that railroads in cities or towns cannot with propriety be termed nuisances, neither are wharves necessarily nuisances, although both may be converted into injuries or subjects of offense, and so become public nuisances.

A railroad in a city is not necessarily a nuisance. New Albany & S. R. Co. v. O'Dally, 12 Ind. 551.

So, as a railroad in the streets of a city is not in itself a nuisance, it cannot be inferred from the occupancy of the streets for that purpose that a nuisance is created. State v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114, 116.

And this is so for the reason that that cannot be a nuisance which is permitted by competent authority. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 38 Mich. 62, 31 Am. Rep. 306.

If a street railroad is laid under the sanction of a competent legal authority, it cannot constitute a nuisance, but if it is not so laid it does constitute a nuisance abatable by the public authorities. Davis v. New York, 14 N. Y. 506, 67 Am. Dec. 186; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 38 Mich. 62, 31 Am. Rep. 306.

So, if such a road is bona fide laid under the provisions of its charter, and is not injurious to public health or safety, it cannot be summarily abated by a forcible destruction or removal thereof by the municipality as a public nuisance, although it may obstruct the street and so become a nuisance, and in such a case resort may be had to legal proceedings. Easton, S. E. & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Easton, 133 Pa. 505.

And under the general power to prevent and abate nuisances such authorities have no power to interfere with the tracks or business of such a road at a specified point when the road is laid by legislative authority. Brooklyn City R. Co. v. Furey, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 364.

A railroad erected in a city by legislative authority is not a nuisance per se. Wetmore v. Story, 22 Barb. 415; Brooklyn City R. Co. v. Furey, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 364, 367.

And this is so even where the cars are drawn by steam power into a crowded part of the city. Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 508; Lexington & O. R. Co. v. Applegate, 8 Dana, 289, 33 Am. Dec. 497; Hunter v. Long Island R. Co. 13 Barb. 646; Moses v. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. 21 Ill. 516; Murphy v. Chicago, 29 Ill. 279, 81 Am. Rep. 307; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25, 43.

In Milbau v. Sharp, 15 Barb. 193, 207, it is stated that a railroad in a city is not per se a nuisance or a purpresture.

So long as the building of a railroad is authorized by law, and is done with reasonable care and skill, it is not a nuisance. Ridley v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 118 N. C. 996, 32 L. R. A. 708.

And the mere construction of a railroad track across a public highway in pursuance of law is no nuisance, but it must be so constructed as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or olution and ordinance in relation to the tracks of the defendant road. Affirmed as to ordinance. Reversed as to resolution.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. David J. Pancoast, for plaintiff in error:

The defendant company was not entitled to notice or a hearing.

The power of the municipal authorities of a city, in a summary manner, to remove obstructions from its streets, is an important one, without which good city government cannot well exist.

property, along the same. Northern C. R. Co. v. Com. 90 Pa. 300, 305.

As long as a railroad company uses proper care, and makes reasonable efforts to so conduct its business as to cause no unnecessary obstruction, it cannot be deemed the author of a nuisance; and while it has no right to unnecessarily obstruct the streets, it has a right to use them in a reasonable manner for the necessary transaction of its business. State v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114, 116.

So, the duty imposed upon a street-railroad company to so construct its road as not unreasonably to interfere with the public in the use of the road, and thereby create a public nuisance, does not require absolute safety or perfect convenience, as every crossing of streets in a city necessarily affects in a greater or less degree the safety of travelers and the convenience of travel, and in a crowded and busy city where the travel is large, the inconvenience might be great and accompanied with some degree of danger; but, considering the necessity of such travel, it is not always held to be unreasonable, much depending upon the circumstances of the case. Johnston v. Providence & S. R. Co. 10 R. I. 365.

In Hinchman v. Paterson Horse R. Co. 17 N. J. Eq. 75, 77, 86 Am. Dec. 252, it was sought to restrain the railroad company from constructing a horse railroad through the streets of a city under the authority of their act of incorporation. The court stated that in order to make such erection a public nuisance it must be occasioned by acts done in violation of law, and that a work which is authorized by the law cannot be a nuisance; and further, that the question, whether or not the construction of such a road would be beneficial or injurious to the public right of way, and prove a public benefit or a public nuisance, was one for the determination of the legislature and of the city council; and that even if they erred in judgment, and the work proved an obstruction and a public inconvenience and injury, yet it was not punishable as a nuisance if constructed as prescribed by the charter.

A street railroad so laid out as to be even with the street and property laid and kept in order is no obstruction to the ordinary use of the street, but is a desirable and proper use thereof. Coast Line R. Co. v. Cohen, 50 Ga. 451, 462.

So, a railroad track made upon the street of a city by authority of law, properly constructed and operated in a skilful and careful manner, is not in law a nuisance. Randle v. Pacific R. Co. 65 Mo. 225; Danville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 38.

In People v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 89 N. Y. 286, 270, it was held that the construction by a railroad of a bridge of less width than the highway was not per se a nuisance.

The tracks of a street-railroad company must be made to grade so that the only obstruction will be the passing of the trains. Sherlock v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. (Mo.) 43 S. W. 629, 632.

Spokane Falls, 46 Fed. Rep. 322; Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. New Iberia, 47 La. Ann. 863; Pedrick v. Bailey, 12 Gray, 161; Montgomery v. Hutchinson, 18 Ala. 573; State, Trenton Horse R. Co., v. Trenton, 58 N. J. L. 182, 11 L. R. A. 410; Compton v. Waco Bridge Co. 62 Tex. 715; North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 44 Am. Rep. 788.

The company's action in laying the track in question was entirely without the warrant of law, and, being so laid, it was in reality a public nuisance, which it was the city's right and duty to abate.

Stamford v. Stamford Horse R. Co. 58 Conn. 381, 1 L. R. A. 375; Waters Pierce Oil Co. v. New Iberia, 47 La. Ann. 863.

Where a street-railway company had obtained possession of land as a right of way by the involuntary action of an improvement company, and its possession was not unlawful, it was held that the subsequent annexation to the city of the land of which such company had become so possessed did not render the company's possession unlawful, neither did the subsequent acceptance of the street upon which the company operated its railroad as a public highway, nor the change of the name of the street, render the occupation and possession of the street by such railroad company a nuisance subject to be abated by a mere resolution of the city council, and the action of the authorities in tearing up and removing the railroad in the manner threatened by them was therefore restrained. Denver v. Denver & S. F. R. Co. 17 Colo. 583, 586. To the same effect, Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345; Omaha & N. W. R. Co. v. Redick, 16 Neb. 313.

So, where an injunction was sought to restrain the city authorities from opening a street through an embankment of a railroad company as an obstruction and a public nuisance upon the streets, the injunction was granted, as it was doubtful whether the street in question was ever a public street across the railroad except as such road made it by opening the culvert,—especially as the public authorities had acquiesced in such alleged nuisance for over twenty years. Atlanta v. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. 40 Ga. 471.

And where a statute authorizes a railroad company to appropriate so much of the public road as is necessary to its purpose, and the portion taken does not exceed the width fixed by law, such a taking is not a public nuisance. Danville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Com. 73 Pa. 29, 38; Fletcher v. Auburn & S. R. Co. 25 Wend. 463; Drake v. Hudson River R. Co. 7 Barb. 508; Harris v. Thompson, 9 Barb. 350.

Where the state has granted the right to a railroad company to lay its track upon the streets of a city, the mayor and aldermen of the city have no such property in the streets and squares of the same under their act of incorporation or the act amending the same as will entitle them to pecuniary compensation for the additional servitude so placed upon the streets and squares, neither have they the right to an injunction restraining the construction of such railroad for the benefit of the residents, and if the residents are damaged by the construction of the road they are entitled to be heard by the courts upon a proper case being made out. Savannah & T. R. Co. v. Savannah, 45 Ga. 602, 610, wherein the city sought to enjoin the defendants from laying their track along the streets of the city pursuant to their legislative power.

Yet it has been stated that it cannot be doubted that the use of steam locomotives, puffing, blowing, whistling, clattering, and crushing through the streets of a city or along a public highway in the country, is within the definition of a public nuisance, as being a nuisance to the citizens in general, 39 L. R. A.

Mr. Edward A. Armstrong for defendant in error.

Nixon, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error brings here for review the judgment of the supreme court setting aside both a resolution and an ordinance passed by the council of the city of Cape May. The resolution was adopted June 4, 1895, and is as follows: "Whereas, the Cape May, Delaware Bay, & Sewell's Point Railroad Company, without the sanction or authority of the city council, on the 28th day of May last, made an extension of its road by laying an additional track on Beach avenue, from the Sea Breeze dangerous to human life, requiring constant care and watchfulness from all who are in the vicinity to keep free from damage from it. Vason v. South Carolina R. Co. 42 Ga. 631.

Whenever any local private corporation under a legislative grant enters upon the streets of any city or borough it does so under and subject to the general police powers of the municipality, and when those powers are exercised reasonably and not fraudulently, corruptly, and oppressively by the municipality, the private corporation has no such vested rights in the occupancy of the streets as will defeat the official municipal action. Monongahela City v. Monongahela Electric Light Co. 4 Am. Electrical Cas. 53, 56, 57.

So, the construction of a railroad in a street may be a public nuisance, abatable by the public authorities. Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Street Pass. R. Co. 1 W. N. C. 429.

Thus an unauthorized occupation in a street by railroad tracks is a nuisance per se, and its use as well as their removal may be controlled by injunction. Musser v. Fairmount & A. Street R. Co. 5 Clark (Pa.) 466; Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Streets Pass. R. Co. 10 Phila. 352; Larimer & L. Street R. Co. v. Larimer Street R. Co. 137 Pa. 533; Faust v. Second & Third Street Pass. R. Co. 3 Phila. 164; Sherlock v. Kansas City Belt R. Co. (Mo.) 43 S. W. 629, 630.

And a railroad over and along a highway obstructing it is a nuisance where no express or legal statutory authority is granted for the erection thereof. Com. v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 14 Gray, 93.

Without the authority of the legislature a railroad corporation has no right to interfere in any way with any ordinary road or highway and every obstruction which such corporation causes to be placed in such road stands on the same ground as an obstruction similarly placed by any individual; and an obstruction endangering the public travel is a nuisance for which the party placing it there will be liable in damages in case any injury should be caused thereby. Hamden v. New Haven & N. Co. 27 Conn. 158, 166. To the same effect, Linsley v. Bushnell, 15 Conn. 225, 38 Am. Dec. 79.

If, through the unlawful acts of a railroad company in maintaining its railroad upon the public streets of the city, it occasions injuries for which the public authorities have been forced to make compensation, the city authorities will have a right to recover the amount of damages thereby occasioned against such railroad company by reason of the nuisance thereby created. Hamden v. New Haven & N. Co. 27 Conn. 158.

A railroad charter which legalizes the use of the streets by a railroad company does not authorize the erection of an embankment except on condition that it shall restore the road to its former state of usefulness, and where such usefulness can only be re-established by the erection of good and sufficient railings on the sides of the embankment, un-

Hotel westward to the end of Beach avenue drive, a distance of about 1,500 feet, the effect of which is injurious to the said Beach avenue and the right of the traveling public therein. Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the said railroad company be notified and requested to remove the said extension at once, and if they shall refuse to comply with such notice and request that said committee shall be empowered and directed to employ counsel and take legal measures in behalf of the city to enforce the same."

The ordinance was introduced June 3, and adopted June 18, 1895, and is as follows:

"An Ordinance Relating to the Railroad Encroachments and Obstructions in Beach Avenue.

"Sec. 1. Be it ordained and enacted by the inhabitants of the city of Cape May, in city council assembled, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that the extension to their street railroad which the Cape May, Delaware Bay, and Sewell's Point Railroad Company made on the 28th day of May, 1895, on Beach avenue, from the Sea Breeze Hotel westward to the end of Beach avenue drive, without the sanction or authority of city council, is an unlawful obstruction and encumbrance in and upon the said avenue; and the street committee is hereby authorized and directed to remove the same, and the mayor of the city is hereby requested to aid and assist the said committee in the enforcement of this ordinance according to the duty imposed upon him by the city charter.

"Sec. 2. And be it ordained and enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this ordinance shall take effect immediately."

til such railings are erected the embankment is a nuisance to the highway notwithstanding the usefulness of the road, and the statute of limitations will not protect the corporation against liability, as every continuance of a nuisance amounts to a new nuisance. Hamden v. New Haven & N. Co. 27 Conn. 158.

In Vason v. South Carolina R. Co. 42 Ga. 681, it was alleged that locomotive engines running on a railway in certain streets in a city were a nuisance tending to the immediate annoyance of, or working hurt, inconvenience, and damage to the citizens in general, as impeding and obstructing the free and common use of the streets, and by the shaking of the houses and breaking the plaster of the same, and disturbing the occupants by the noise of the bells and steam and the frightening of animals in the street, and also as endangering the life of the citizens, some having been killed. The court held that the use of steam on such a railroad, being specially permitted by the public authorities, could not therefore be abated as a nuisance, although if in its use acts were done beyond the scope of the permission, and if the use be in a manner not contemplated by the public authorities, equity would restrain it within the bounds prescribed.

Where a railroad is constructed without authority, either from the state through the legislative branch of the government, or from a municipal corporation, it is a public nuisance and unlawful, and may be made the subject of proceedings to abate it at the hands of the proper authorities in the local jurisdiction, but cannot be abated at the instance of a private individual. Garnett v. Jacksonville, St. A. & H. River R. Co. 20 Fla. 889, 904.

In Denver & S. R. Co. v. Denver City R. Co. 2 Colo. 673, street railroads constructed in a public street without authority of law are held to be a continuous obstruction and a public nuisance. And being so constructed without right no matter how little inconvenience the permanent appropriation of the street may occasion, such a railroad cannot defend itself from the charge of nuisance, but if authorized by law their acts may be justifiable no matter how much inconvenience to the public they may occasion.

An obstruction of a highway by the construction of a railroad across it in a manner not authorized by law is a nuisance. Com. v. Vermont & M. R. Corp. 4 Gray, 22, 24; Com. v. Nashua & L. R. Corp. 2 Gray, 54; Com. v. Proprietors of New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray, 339.

In State v. Tupper, Dud. L. 135, it was held that the South Carolina acts of 1823, 1832, authorizing and empowering a railroad company to construct a single track on its road, but prohibiting the use of any locomotive steam engine below a certain street, and also providing that the railroad should be constructed so as not to impede the ordinary passage of carriages and persons along the roads and streets and squares of the city, did not necessarily imply that steam power should be used as a means of propelling such cars, and the company using such power would be liable for any nuisance occasioned thereby.

By § 1 of chap. 355 of the New York Laws of 1855, the commissioner or commissioners of highways in each of the towns of the state are empowered to bring any action against any railroad corporation that may be necessary or proper to sustain the rights of the public in and to any highway in such town, and to enforce the performance of any duty enjoined upon any railroad corporation in relation to any highway in the town of which they are commissioners, and to maintain an action for damages or expenses which any town may sustain or may have sustained, or may be put to or may have been put to, in consequence of any act or omission of such corporation in violation of any law in relation to such highway, but nothing in the act is to be construed as impairing the right of any person or officer to bring any other action than authorized by law.

It has been held that under such act the highway commissioners have power to bring action against a railroad company constructing its road on and along two highways without first obtaining authority, and for failure to restore such highways to their former state of usefulness. Barse v. Herkimer, N. & P. Narrow Gauge R. Co. 13 N. Y. S. R. 215, 217.

Although power may be given to a street-railroad company to carry its tracks along streets of a city, yet it cannot, in the exercise of such right, cause any unnecessary obstruction to the public street, and the power to cause such obstruction cannot be derived from any resolution of a common council no matter how comprehensive its terms may be, and therefore the city authorities may proceed in a summary manner to abate such obstruction as a public nuisance, especially after notice had been given to the company to remove the obstruction, and a reasonable time has elapsed to enable them to comply with such notice. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 4 App. Div. 562.

In Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 4 App. Div. 562, the court justified the proceedings of the common council of the city under N. Y. Laws 1890, chap. 519, tit. 9, § 5, whereby they condemned a bridge which had been erected by the railroad company across a street of the city as a nuisance, although at the time such bridge was built the company had the sanction of the city thereto, and the New York laws empowered such company to use the streets of the city.

And although a railroad company may have a

The principal question raised by the writ relates to the validity of this ordinance, and it is important to first note the relation of the parties to the controversy. The defendant in error is a railway corporation formed by the merger and consolidation, under the laws of this state, of three companies, and has been for several years past operating a street railway in and through the city of Cape May to adjacent points; and a map of this consolidated road is on file in the office of the secretary of state, showing the true location of the same, as required by law. The validity of this consolidation, and the right of the new corporation to exercise all the privileges and franchises possessed by the constituent roads out of which it was formed by the merger, are not challenged in these proceedings. The city council of Cape May, the plaintiff in error, by an ordinance dated June 29, 1892, granted to the Cape May & Schellenger's Landing Railroad Company, one of the three companies merged into and now forming the Cape May, Delaware Bay, & Sewell's Point Railroad Company, "permission to lay, construct, maintain, and operate a railroad, with the necessary switches and turnouts, upon and adjoining the board walk from Madison avenue, in the city of Cape May, to Wood street, in said city, and from Wood street, crossing the said board walk to the southerly side of Beach avenue, and thence extending inside and adjoining the board walk along the same to Broadway, and thence to the northwardly side of Beach avenue and extending to the boundary line of the city of Cape May." Other provisions follow, providing, among other things, that the propelling power for its cars shall be right to use the public places specified, it has no right to unreasonably and unnecessarily obstruct them, for an improper or unreasonable exercise of a right to use a street may become a nuisance. State v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114, 116; State v. Berdett, 73 Ind. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 117.

In Windsor v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 92 Hun, 127, as it was found that the railroad constructed by the defendant company materially and unnecessarily impaired the usefulness of the highway, and that no necessity existed for requiring such a narrow passage as was then maintained by the defendant, the court abated the nuisance.

The principle applicable in such a case is that the doing of a lawful act in an illegal and wrongful manner may cause the thing done to be treated as a public nuisance. State v. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. 86 Ind. 114, 116.

In Burlington v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (N. J. Ch.) 38 Atl. 849, 850, it is said to be entirely settled that without statutory authority expressly given or arising from necessary implication, a railroad placed longitudinally in a street is a nuisance, and that a railroad so placed is regarded as practically an exclusive appropriation of that part of the street which it occupies to a use inconsistent with the legitimate use of the street by the public, its presence in the street being as repugnant to the rights of the public as the presence of a church or a market house, or any other structure devoted to private objects.

So, a railroad company erecting a building upon the public highway, and continuing it there and placing cars on the public highway and suffering them to remain therein is guilty of creating a public nuisance. State v. Morris & E. R. Co. 23 N. J. L. 360, 364.

And a railroad company having power to construct its road along, upon, or across, or to use an existing highway, cannot so construct it as to obstruct the use of the highway by the public, and it may be called upon to remove such obstruction and to abate the nuisance by grading the highway to the surface of the railroad, or by carrying the highway under or over the railroad, but it cannot be ordered to absolutely remove the constituent elements of the roadbed from the highway. Palatka & I. River R. Co. v. State, 23 Fla. 546, 558.

In Donnauer v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 649, the defendant was charged with a public nuisance in obstructing the streets in that he was grading and hauling dirt for a street railroad company which was preparing the streets for the purpose of laying its tracks under an act of the legislature which it was alleged gave the company power to so construct its road, and the question was whether it could so proceed, inasmuch as the title to the streets was vested in the city. The court held the 39 L. R. A.

defendant liable, for the reason that the act incorporating the company did not give it the right to so use the streets without the consent of the corporation and without complying with the municipal laws regulating such use of the streets.

The placing of an embankment upon a street, thereby changing the face and character thereof, by a railroad company, so as entirely to prevent the passing and repassing across the same, and so as to prevent the turning of vehicles into and from the street thereby rendering it entirely useless as a street, is a diversion of the street from customary use and enjoyment by the inhabitants, and creates a public nuisance. Savannah, A. & G. R. Co. v. Shiels, 33 Ga. 601, 618; Columbus v. Jaques, 30 Ga. 506; State v. Mobile, 5 Port. (Ala.) 279, 30 Am. Dec. 564.

A railroad company, in order to justify the placing of an embankment in a highway, must resort to its charter or to the general statutes authorizing it, and where there is no uncertainty in respect to the terms of the grant, and it only authorizes the old highway to be altered provided it is restored to its former state, or put in as good repair as at the time of altering the same, the company will be bound to compensate the town for any damages occasioned by obstructions caused by such company in the use of its road. Hamden v. New Haven & N. Co. 27 Conn. 158, 166.

In Cincinnati R. Co. v. Com. 80 Ky. 137, the leaving of a hand car upon the road, and hanging upon such car boxes and clothing by reason of which, and the location of the car upon the road, the horses of those passing were frightened and the lives of persons endangered, was held to be a public nuisance and an unlawful obstruction.

So, in Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Com. 80 Ky. 143, 44 Am. Rep. 498, the habitual running by a railroad of its trains at an unsafe and unreasonable rate of speed, thereby endangering persons traveling upon the turnpike, without giving warning signals or taking precaution to avoid injuring such persons, was held to constitute a public nuisance of such a character that contributory negligence by the persons using the highway would furnish no excuse or defense.

The laying of a street railroad many be enjoined as a nuisance at the instance of the public authorities where the provisions of the city ordinance respecting the same have not been complied with. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago, 96 Ill. 620.

If such a road deviates from the course laid out, or extends further than the limit fixed by the authorities, it is an obstruction to the street and a public nuisance so far as it exceeds the legal limit. Com. v. Erie & N. E. R. Co. 27 Pa. 330, 67 Am. Dec. 471.

So, an injunction will be granted to restrain the electric motors, and also that the company shall file its acceptance of the ordinance with the city recorder, which was done. It will be perceived that the ordinance gives permission to conduct and operate the railroad, with the necessary switches and turnouts; and also that the route includes Beach avenue, from which that part of the defendant's road described in the resolution and ordinance was to be removed. After the passage of this ordinance the company laid its tracks and two turnouts on Beach avenue, and the road had been operated with these sidings for over two years without objection, when, in May, 1895, the two were connected by the addition of about 470 feet, and thus converted into one turnout of about 1,500 feet in length. This act on the part of the company gave occasion for the passage of the ordinance in question, and also the resolution. The purport of the ordinance is to adjudge this turnout, or "extension," as it is termed in the ordinance, an unlawful obstruction amounting to a nuisance, and to direct its removal as such. This is the status, as claimed by counsel for the plaintiff in error, who, in his brief, says, "On the fourth of June city council passed a resolution directing the street committee to take legal measures for the removal of said extension, and on the 13th of the same month passed an ordinance declaring the said extension to be a nuisance, and ordering its removal."

The general proposition that the municipal authorities of a city may, in certain cases, remove in a summary manner obstructions from its streets, will not be controverted by anyone. Power to do this is given to the council of Cape May. Laws 1875, p. 206, § 19. But obstruction of the streets by a railroad company not authorized by law to use them, even though it may have the consent and authority of the municipal authorities. Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Street Pass. R. Co. 1 W. N. C. 489.

And a city is a proper party to a bill in equity to restrain the wrongful use of its streets by a street-railroad company, such use constituting an obstruction and a nuisance. Philadelphia v. Thirtieth & Fifteenth Streets Pass. R. Co. 8 Phila. 648.

A railroad company erecting a road over a public highway, contrary to the provisions of its charter, and to the authority of the selectmen of the town, which required a draw bridge to be erected over the same for the accommodation of the public, creates an obstruction in the nature of a public nuisance for which it is liable to indictment by the public authorities. Com. v. Nashua & T. R. Corp. 2 Gray, 54.

To set up or establish a railroad in a street, when there is not sufficient authority to sanction it, is to set up that which is per se a nuisance, because it is an invasion of the right of the public, and becomes a purpresture by making too exclusive to one that which ought to be common to everyone, and it obstructs and impedes the free use of a public road or street, interfering with the freedom of transit. Atty. Gen. v. Lombard & S. Street Pass. R. Co. 1 W. N. C. 489.

The occupation of a public road by a track of a railroad operated by steam, which effectually prevents the use of the part so occupied by the public as a highway for ordinary travel, for which these lands are dedicated, and for which ordinary roads are laid out, unless authorized by law, is a public nuisance which may be abated by the public authorities. Atty. Gen., Stickie, v. Morris & E. R. Co. 19 N. J. Eq. 386, 392.

A city may, in the exercise of its police power, make reasonable regulations for railroad operations within the city limits, but the mere declaration of the city council that such a structure in its street is a nuisance does not render it such or make the company bound to abandon or remove such track even though there may be a provision in a city ordinance making such companies liable to the regulations imposed by future ordinances of the city. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Joliet, 79 Ill. 25, 43.

Any unauthorized use of the highway, in the absence of special authority under charter, must be presumed to have been granted to a railroad company on the condition that its exercise should be consistent with the establishment of the highway and in accordance with its use by the public, and a railroad company should not afterwards be permitted to destroy the usefulness of the public way by allowing its own road and approaches thereto to become dangerous for the want of repairs, and therefore where a railroad company neglects such duty it is guilty of a nuisance. Paducah & E. R. Co. v. Com. 80 Ky. 147, 149.

And in Brooklyn Steam Transit Co. v. Brooklyn, 78 N. Y. 524, 531, it is stated that a city has as much right to question the use of its streets by a street-car company as a private owner has to question the use of his property, and the fact that such a company has already built a certain length of its road does not alter the fact, where the act is done without any authority, and is therefore wrongful.

In Louisville City R. Co. v. Louisville, 8 Bush, 417, the right of the municipal government in the exercise of its sound discretion to make reasonable and proper regulations prescribing the manner in which the right of way of a street-railroad company should be exercised was upheld, the city government having the general power to regulate the use and enjoyment of private property in the city so as to prevent what proves pernicious to the citizens generally, and also power to prevent the use from becoming a nuisance. In that case the city sought to substitute the tram rail for the present rail as used on the street-railroad tracks by the company.

Under a charter giving power to pass all laws and ordinances necessary for the preservation of the health, peace, prosperity, comfort, and security of the citizens of the city not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, an ordinance prohibiting boys and other persons unconnected with railway trains, except passengers and other persons in the act of taking passage, from getting off or on any engines or cars at the depot or elsewhere in the city limits, and providing a penalty therefor, was upheld as a police regulation for the welfare and a proper regulation of municipal government. Bearden v. Madison, 73 Ga. 184, 186.

So, under a charter giving a city express power to regulate the use of all its streets, and to regulate all vehicles, business, trades, and associations, and declare, abate, and prevent nuisances on public or private property, a city has power to pass an ordinance regulating the speed of cars and locomotives propelled by steam power within the limits of the city, and also to prevent the same from obstructing any street crossing or standing thereon for a longer period than five minutes, and also to compel them when moving to sound a bell, and also in case of a freight car backed within the city limits to station a man on the top of the car at the farthest end of the engine to give signals, even though there may be no express provisions or authority in its charter to pass such an ordinance, the same being within the general police power and therefore violative of no provision of the Constitution. Merz v. Missouri P. R. Co. 88 Mo. 672, 676.

The same ordinance was passed upon in the case such power without notice or hearing should be exercised only in cases of nuisances per se, and which are unquestioned and obvious, such as obstructions on a street which impede travel or endanger the safety of persons using it. A street railway is not such an unlawful obstruction as can be summarily and forcibly removed by police intervention, when its construction has been authorized by the city council, and it does not clearly appear that the authority has been exceeded. In such a case some less summary remedy should be sought, if any grievance exists. The ordinance passed by the city council in 1892 empowered the company to construct all necessary turnouts. It is in evidence and uncontradicted that the business of the company made this lengthened turnout necessary in order that its cars might be properly operated at this point. Two turnouts had been in use at this place since 1898 without protest from anyone, and the act complained of merely connected the two by an addition of 470 feet; making one siding of about 1,500 feet, instead of 1,000 feet in the two old ones. It does not appear how this turnout, only about one third longer than the two previously used, could have so interfered with the public safety or convenience as to require its immediate and forcible removal without notice or a hearing given to the company. In Wood, Nuisances, 8d ed. 977, it is said: "The fact that a particular use of property is declared a nuisance by an ordinance of the city does not make that use of property a nuisance unless it is in fact so, and comes within the common-law or statutory idea of a nuisance." Furthermore, the adoption of this ordinance by the city council was at once both an adjudication of the rights and of Rafferty v. Missouri P. R. Co. 91 Mo. 33, although in that case it was held that it did not apply to a case where the railroad employees were simply engaged in setting cars in a car yard.

And also in Wilkins v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 101 Mo. 93.

So, a similar ordinance was upheld in Grube v. Missouri P. R. Co. 98 Mo. 380, 4 L. R. A. 776.

Whatever is dangerous to human life or detrimental to health, and whatever renders the air or human food or drink unwholesome, is a nuisance within chap. 956 of the New York Laws of 1897, § 6. Jamaica v. Long Island R. Co. 27 How. Pr. 379, 382, in which case the railroad company was charged with violating the village ordinance relating to manure and other offensive substances, but the case turned solely upon the question whether or not the village ordinance was not superseded by the act of the legislature of 1868, which created a metropolitan sanitary district and the board of health, under which the above specified powers were given to the boards of health.

In South Covington & C. Street R. Co. v. Berry, 93 Ky. 43, 15 L. R. A. 804, an ordinance providing that street cars running upon the streets of the city should have two persons, a driver and a conductor, on each car, and that every failure to have the same should subject the president and the officers of the company to a fine, and empowering the police of the city to cause any car not having such driver and conductor to be returned to the stable, passed pursuant to a charter giving the city, inter alia, a right to cause the removal or abatement of any nuisance, was held constitutional and valid as merely protecting the public from the danger existing from running the cars without proper control and sufficient force, and providing for their removal if attempted to be run otherwise than as provided, in order to prevent their becoming a nuisance.

But a similar ordinance was held invalid in Brooklyn Crosstown R. Co. v. Brooklyn, 37 Hun. 413, although that case turned upon the construction placed upon the act incorporating the road and the acts regulating and defining the powers of the municipality.

In Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Brown, 67 Ind. 45, 33 Am. Rep. 73, the court upheld an act calling upon railroad companies when approaching a crossing or a turnpike or other public highway in the state to sound a whistle continuously when within not less than 80 nor more than 100 rods from such crossing until it should have fully passed it, provided that such act should not interfere with any ordinance upon the subject. Upon the defendant's contending that such constant whistling would amount to a nuisance, the court stated that although such whistling might amount to a nuisance yet when deemed necessary for the public good it might be permitted or required, for the reason that the operation of railroads might, in many instances, without legislative sanction, be in itself a nuisance, although such legislative sanction was not a legal nuisance.

So, an ordinance which prohibits the use of certain streets by cars, engines, carriages, or other vehicles drawn or propelled by steam does not impair any vested rights conferred upon a railroad company by its charter, neither does it deprive the company of its property without due process of law. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521, 529, 24 L. ed. 734, 737.

Under an act incorporating the town, and an act amending the same, which gives the authorities the control and supervision of the highways, streets, alleys, public grounds, and parks in the town, and to define and declare what shall be deemed nuisances, and to prevent and abate the same, a town has power to pass an ordinance prohibiting the use of steam as a motive power for the purpose of propelling street cars where there is no legislative grant. North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 213, 44 Am. Rep. 788.

In Buffalo & N. F. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 5 Hill, 209, 211, the question was whether, upon the construction of the New York act of 1837, the common council had power to restrain a railroad company from propelling its cars by steam power within the corporate limits of the city, the act providing that the common council should have power to make and establish ordinances to regulate, within the bounds of the said city, the grading of railroads and the running of railroad cars. The court stated that under the provisions of such charter the city had power by ordinance to entirely prohibit the use of steam for such purposes upon its streets, the act giving the city a large discretion, the right to regulate the running seeming, ex vi termini, to imply an authority to regulate the power by which they were to be driven.

In Whitson v. Franklin, 34 Ind. 302, 306, the court stated with approval the holding of the court in the above case of Buffalo & N. F. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 5 Hill, 209, to the effect that if a train of cars is impelled by force of steam through a populous city it may expose the inhabitants to unreasonable perils to such an extent that unless conducted with more than human watchfulness the running of such cars might be regarded as a public nuisance. In this case the city prosecuted the defendants for a violation of the city ordinance in driving the locomotive through the streets at a faster rate than 4 miles an hour in violation of the ordinance.

In Spokane Street R. Co. v. Spokane Falls, 46 Fed. Rep. 322, an injunction was sought to prevent the destruction of a street-railway company's track a condemnation of the property of the defendant company without an opportunity to be heard; for it is not claimed that any previous notice, either actual or constructive, was given to the company of the action of the council. It being an ordinance which affected property rights, the defendant in error was entitled to notice before its passage.

This ordinance cannot be sustained, on still another ground. It is unreasonable. It will be perceived that it directs the removal of the extension to the street railroad made on the 28th of May, 1895, from the Sea Breeze Hotel westward to the end of Beach avenue drive. This distance includes the whole of the turnout, both the old part and the new. That this was the purpose of the council is made clear by the resolution introduced concurrently with the ordinance, in which the extension is described in the same manner, and the words, "a distance of about 1,500" feet are added. It thus contemplated the forcible removal, as an unlawful obstruction of the street, of the whole 1,500 feet, the entire turnout of the defendant company on Beach avenue, two thirds of which had been used for more than two years without protest from the city council, or any private citizen or property owner, and which was laid under authority from the city to construct "all necessary switches and turnouts." In 47 N. J. L. 288, in State, Pennsylvania R. Co., v. Jersey City, the late Chief Justice Beasley said: "The third and last ground was that the ordinance in question is unreasonable, and the stress of the argument was properly laid on this point. If this by-law be situated in one of the public streets of the city, and it was alleged that the same was so constructed as required by the conditions of the city ordinance granting the franchise, and also as required by the conditions of the contract entered into by the plaintiff and the defendant transit company. The answer denied that the track was constructed in conformity to the requirements of either the ordinance of the city or the contract with such transit company, and specified the imperfections of the track and the failures of the plaintiff to meet the requirements of the ordinance and contract. The plaintiff failing to introduce sufficient proof to controvert the same, the court held that the allegations of the defendant's answers were an obstacle to the granting of any equitable relief, the plaintiff, by disregarding the obligations and terms of the ordinance and contract, obstructing travel in the street and creating a nuisance.

So, under a charter giving the city power to declare what shall be considered as nuisances, and to prevent and remove the same, and to regulate the police of the town, and to make such ordinances as the good of the inhabitants of the town may require, an ordinance prohibiting the running of trains within the town at a greater rate of speed than 6 miles per hour is valid. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Haggerty, 67 Ill. 113, 115.

Under a charter giving a city power to pass such ordinances as may be deemed necessary for the good government of the city, to control streets and alleys, and to declare what shall be deemed a nuisance, and to abate the same, and to control the laying of railroad tracks in the streets and alleys, an ordinance requiring a railroad company to keep a flagman by day, and a red lantern by night, at a point where its track crosses the street or state road over which only the usual trains pass is not a reasonable requirement, especially where it is not shown that the crossing is unusually dangerous, the charter containing no express grant of power to pass such an ordinance; the right to do so not coming within the police power of the municipality although in cases where the crossings are dangerous to the public safety such an ordinance might be upheld. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 39, 42, 16 Am. Rep. 611. See also Ravenna v. Pennsylvania Co. 45 Ohio St. 118, infra.

An ordinance prohibiting a railroad engine, machine, or cars from standing or remaining on a traveled railroad crossing, used by teams and travel, to the hindrance and detention of the same at any time, was upheld in Great Western R. Co. v. Decatur, 33 Ill. 381, 383, wherein the traveling public were put in peril by the negligence of the company in allowing a train of cars to so obstruct the public in the use of the crossings as only to allow a narrow space of 12 feet or less through which none but a gentle team could pass in safety.

In State, Delaware, L. & W. R. Co., v. East Orange, 41 N. J. L. 127, the effect of an ordinance of a town compelling a railroad company to station and maintain a flagman in the daytime and in the evening at a point where its railroad tracks crossed certain streets, such person with a flag and lighted lantern to give warning of the approach of the locomotives, engines, and cars, is simply to enforce a common-law obligation, and guard against any nuisance by the company in the construction of its road, and is therefore a valid exercise of a municipal power, being for the preservation of the public safety.

And in Glaessner v. Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assn., 100 Mo. 508, a private railroad track constructed with the authority of the city officers was held to be a public nuisance, the powers given to the city with respect to the regulations of the use of the streets extending to public uses, and not private.

So, in Com. v. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. 14 Gray, 93, 96, the defendants, who had been found guilty of a nuisance upon the highway by unlawfully laying and constructing a railroad thereon, sought to relieve themselves from liability by reason of a statute subsequently passed confirming the location of such road, but the court determined that the effect of such statute only prevented the encroachment on the highway from being hereafter deemed a common nuisance, and did not prevent its being declared a nuisance theretofore.

The question whether the tracks and appendages thereof have been duly constructed under the authority of the legislature, or are a necessary incident to the franchise granted, is a legal one, which the municipal authorities have not the right to determine summarily in the exercise of a power to abate nuisances and remove obstructions from streets. Brooklyn City R. Co. v. Furey, 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 364, 367.

Under a charter giving the authorities power to pass, alter, or repeal ordinances regulating and controlling the running of locomotives, and to regulate, control, or prohibit the passing through the streets and public places of buildings and other large structures materially interfering with the free use of the streets by the public, and to regulate the use of the streets and public places by foot passengers, vehicles, railways, and engines, and also to regulate or prevent the use of the streets for any other purpose than travel, the city has power by ordinance to prevent such obstructions as may materially interfere with the use of the streets, such as an ordinance providing that the standing at the intersection caused by the crossing of the main street or thoroughfare of any railroad or track within the city limits, of all locomotives or steam engines, cars, carriages, wagons, and vehicles of whatever kind longer than two minutes at one time, should be considered unlawful, was upheld subject to this imputation, there can be no doubt that it would be the duty of this court to pronounce it a nullity." We think this ordinance is subject to that imputation.

We do not, however, concur with the judgment of the supreme court in setting aside the resolution. It only provides that the street committee shall notify and request the railroad company to at once remove the extension of its track on Beach avenue from the Sea Breeze Hotel to the end of Beach avenue drive,—a distance of about 1,500 feet, and instructs them, in case of refusal to comply with such notice, to employ counsel and take legal measures to enforce its removal. We think it was clearly within the power of council to pass such a resolution. It did not of itself affect any property right of the railroad company, and therefore no notice was required to be given before passing it. By its terms, it was only a notice and request. No summary or arbitrary action was advised or suggested, but rather the contrary; for the committee is directed to employ counsel, and to take legal measures to accomplish the object proposed. It is always lawful to employ counsel and take legal measures to remedy a real or supposed grievance, whether public or private, and we think the instructions to the committee were unobjectionable.

Our conclusion is that the judgment of the Supreme Court setting aside the ordinance should be affirmed, but, with respect to the resolution, it should be reversed.

as reasonable. State, Long, v. Jersey City, 37 N. J. L. 348. In that case, however, the obstruction was not specifically declared to be a nuisance.

Railroad cars are carriages within the meaning of a charter authorizing the adoption of ordinances to prevent the encumbering of streets with carriages, carts, wagons, sleighs, boxes, firewood, or any other material or substance whatever, and an ordinance passed prohibiting the stopping of trains of railroad cars, or a locomotive, on any street crossing, either for switching or any other purpose whatever, except to prevent accident or in case of immediate danger, was held to be within the power of such charter and reasonable and valid as a means of preventing obstruction. Duluth v. Maljett, 43 Minn. 204. In that case, however, the obstruction was not specifically declared to be a nuisance.

So, in Jamestown v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 89 Wis. 648, the court recognized the power of the municipality to compel the railroad company to restore the roadbed of the street to its former condition and to remove obstructions therefrom, and the same principles were also enforced in the later case of Oshkosh v. Milwaukee & L. W. R. Co. 74 Wis. 534, although the question of nuisance was not raised in either case.

Again, in Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Chenoa, 43 Ill. 209, the court upheld the right of a municipality to enforce the provisions of its ordinance against the railroad company obstructing the use of the public street, although the question of nuisance was not raised and passed upon. To the same effect is St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Belleville, 122 Ill. 376, 384, wherein the court upheld the city's right to prohibit obstructions of the streets by railroad companies although it did not expressly declare such obstruction to be a nuisance.

And an ordinance compelling railroad companies to water their tracks within the city limits and on the street was held to be within the powers conferred by a charter, being for the welfare and convenience of the inhabitants on the streets as a health preserving effect, the same being an exercise of the police power. City and Suburban R. Co. v. Savannah, 77 Ga. 731, 733. In this case, however, it was not shown that the nonwatering of the tracks constituted a nuisance.

In the principal case, STATE V. NEW ORLEANS, C. & L. R. Co., an ordinance calling upon a city railroad company to sprinkle streets without stating or defining where, when, and in what manner the sprinkling was to be done was held void and unreasonable as an unwarranted invasion of private rights, for the reason that in adopting ordinances of such a nature the situation or locality of the nuisance should be considered, it being necessary that the measure of duty should be stated so that there may be no conjectures as to how much or how little is to be done by the parties upon whom the duty is imposed.

So, an ordinance prohibiting a railroad company from obstructing or preventing the free and uninterrupted use by the public of the intersection, caused by the crossing of any street or thoroughfare by any railroad or track within the limits of a city, for a longer period than three minutes at one time has been upheld, although the case did not show that the obstruction was specifically declared to be a nuisance. State, Pennsylvania R. Co., v. Jersey City, 47 N. J. L. 226.

Again, in Thorpe v. Rutland & B. R. Co. 27 Vt. 140, 62 Am. Dec. 625, the legislative power over railroads, for purposes of public safety and as an exercise of police power, was fully recognized although the question of nuisance did not arise in that case.

And in Illinois C. R. Co. v. Galena, 40 Ill. 344, an ordinance prohibiting a deposit of dust, dirt, filth, shavings, or other rubbish or obstructions of any kind upon the streets was held to apply to a railroad company allowing its cars to be across the street so as to obstruct the public use of the same. In this case, however, the act was not specially declared to be a public nuisance.

So, in Broadway & S. A. R. Co. v. New York, 49 Hun, 126, the court upheld the power of the municipal authorities to control the use of a snow plow upon the public streets by the railroad company so as to prevent it from throwing the snow against the sidewalks and thus preventing other vehicles from approaching the same, but the question was not specially decided upon the ground of nuisance.

Yet, an ordinance which manifestly abrogates a privilege and irrevocable franchise to a railroad company to load and unload freight at its sidings and turnouts on the streets, provided the use of the streets by the public is not unnecessarily or materially impaired, cannot be destroyed by an ordinance made for the obvious intention of destroying the franchise, no question of the right to resort to the exercise of police power or to abate nuisances arising. Port of Mobile v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 84 Ala. 115, 122, 123.

So, an ordinance declaring the running of any locomotive, steam engine, train of cars, or cars of any kind whatsoever, through or upon any track, street, or thoroughfare in a city at a faster or greater speed than 1 mile in six minutes to be a nuisance, and providing that all locomotives or steam engines, steam carriages, or railroad cars stopping or ceasing in a particular spot between certain streets on its or their passage through the city should be considered a nuisance, was held not to be within the provisions of the city charter giving the city power to declare nuisances and provide for their removal, the power to remove nui-

STATE of Louisiana
v.
NEW ORLEANS CITY & LAKE RAIL-ROAD COMPANY et al., Appts.

(49 La. Ann. 157L.)

1. It may well be that one person or a number of persons can, as relates to his or to their property, be brought within the scope of the police power of the municipality, and made to comply with regulations looking to the health and comfort of the public; but no person, no class of persons, no interests, can be singled out and forced to contribute labor or money in the interest of the public on property not owned by him or by them, which is in the exclusive use of the public.

2. It would be an unwarrantable instances applying only to statutory ones, the same being an unwarranted interference with franchises granted by the legislature to be exercised by the prosecutors for the public good, such acts not interfering with the public health or exposing the inhabitants to danger or inconvenience. State, New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., v. Jersey City, 29 N. J. L. 170, 175.

In Ravenna v. Pennsylvania Co. 45 Ohio St. 118, it was held that an ordinance compelling a railroad company to maintain watchmen at points where the tracks crossed a street was not an exercise of the powers granted to municipal corporations under § 1602, Ohio Rev. Stat., which authorized the prevention, inter alia, of injury or annoyance from anything dangerous, offensive, or unwholesome, and the causing any nuisance to be abated, and also to provide for the preservation of the peace and good order, and the protection of the property of the municipal corporation and its inhabitants. Although a municipal corporation has a right to exercise police powers, yet when the question is whether it has authority to enact a particular ordinance it must be shown that the power to do the particular thing in the way marked out has been given either expressly or by clear implication, the railroad company in the case in point not being a wrongdoer in crossing the street, its right being the same as that of any other individual in the use of the streets, although it cannot exempt itself from police regulations in the use of the same. See also Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 39, 42, 16 Am. Rep. 611.

So, where the board of trustees of an incorporated town have exclusive control over the streets within the corporate limits, with power to declare what shall constitute a nuisance, and to prevent, abate, and remove the same, and take such other measures for the preservation of the public health as they deem necessary, an ordinance compelling a railroad company at its own expense to keep a watchman and maintain gates where the tracks cross a street under a penalty for failure to do so, is not within the general grant of power to regulate travel upon the streets so as to make their use reasonably safe, and to enact ordinances for the protection of health, life, and property. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Crown Point, 146 Ind. 421, 85 L. R. A. 684.

Where a tramway was laid down under a contract entered into by the defendants with the vestry pursuant to resolutions passed by the latter, it was held that the laying down of such road was not the paving or repairing of the street within the meaning of the London metropolitan local manvasion of private rights. In adopting ordinances to promote health and comfort, the "situation" or "locality" of the nuisance must be considered.

3. The law limits and defines the power it bestows and the duty it imposes.

4. Here the duty sought to be imposed was to "sprinkle" streets, without statuting or defining where, when, and in what manner the sprinkling was to be done.

5. There should be a measure of duty stated, so that those upon whom it is imposed will not be left to conjecture how much or how little they should do.

6. Due consideration should be given to "locality," as well as to "reasonableness" and "certainty," in drafting an ordinance with the view of promoting public health and comfort.

agement act so as to justify the defendant's actions under the powers given to the vestry by such act, the road as laid being an obstruction to the street and a public nuisance. Queen v. Train, 31 L. J. M. C. N. S. 160, 2 Best & S. 640, 9 Cox, C. C. 180, 10 Week. Rep. 539.

In the above case it was sought to charge the defendant with obstructing the highway and creating a nuisance thereon by making a tramway upon the same, and it was found that accidents had happened in consequence of such way, and that the same was a nuisance and an obstruction in a substantial degree to the ordinary use of the highway by carriages and horses, and rendered the same unsafe and inconvenient. The defendants were found properly chargeable with the creation of such nuisance, and evidence showing the usefulness of such road in the carrying of passengers and as a saving of money was held inadmissible. Queen v. Train, 31 L. J. M. C. N. S. 160, 2 Best & S. 640, 9 Cox, C. C. 180, 10 Week. Rep. 539.

The English nuisance removal act, 18 & 19 Vict. chap. 121, § 8, is a sanitary one, and applies only to such nuisances as are injurious to health, and therefore does not apply to a nuisance occasioned by rainwater collected on a railroad bridge running through the planks thereof and dripping onto the highway and on persons using the same, such nuisance not being injurious to health, and therefore the justices are wrong in ordering its abatement under the statute. Great Western R. Co. v. Bishop, L. R. 7 Q. B. 550, 28 L. T. N. S. 905, 20 Week. Rep. 969, 41 L. J. M. C. N. S. 120.

But in Newark Pass. R. Co. v. East Orange, 53 N. J. Eq. 248, the court interfered by way of injunction to restrain the proceedings of the town authorities in removing the poles and wires used by the company in propelling its railroad by electricity until such time as the cause could be heard, the continuance of the operation of the road by the complainants in compliance with the terms of their contract not being seriously detrimental to the municipality.

In Easton, S. E. & W. E. Pass. R. Co. v. Easton, 133 Pa. 505, the court denied the right of the municipal authorities to forcibly remove the tracks of a street-railway company laid under authority of its franchise, and granted an injunction restraining such action, stating that the proper method to be adopted by such corporation was to proceed by way of legal process to prevent such a use as a nuisance and for the court to determine upon such question.

So, in the above case of Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Buffalo, 4 App. Div. 562, there was a dissenting APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Sixth Recorder's Court convicting them of violation of a city ordinance requiring the sprinkling of streets. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Denegre, Blair, & Denegre, for appellant:

Every ordinance must be reasonable. The unreasonableness vel non of an ordinance is a judicial question.

Pick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220; State v. Zurich, 49 La. Ann. 447; State v. Von Sachs, 45 La. Ann. 1416; State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496.

The law must tell a man clearly and definitely what he must do or not do before it can punish him for any act of commission or omission in regard thereto.

State v. Smith, 30 La. Ann. 846; Ex parte Bell, 32 Tex. Crim. Rep. 808.

The ordinance in question evidences an attempt on the part of the city council, under pretense of an exercise of the police power, to shift a public duty from the city at large, and to impose it upon the shoulders of particular persons or corporations. The legislature has not conferred upon the city of New Orleans the requisite authority to compel any person or corporation, at his or its own expense, to water the public streets and keep them free from dust.

State v. Robertson, 45 La. Ann. 954, 20 L. R. A. 691.

The ordinance constitutes an impairment of a contract and the deprivation of property without due process of law, within the prohibition of both the state and Federal Constitutions.

State, Kansas, v. Corrigan Consol. Street R. Co. 85 Mo. 263, 55 Am. Rep. 361; Coast-Line R. Co. v. Savannah, 30 Fed. Rep. 646; Chicago v. Sheldon, 76 U. S. 9 Wall. 50, 19 L. ed. 594.

opinion by Justice Follett in which he was of opinion that the city had no right to summarily tear down the bridge, erected by the company and which had been in existence for eight years over the street, as a public nuisance, and that the city's redress for its alleged wrongs should have been by way of action in which the duties and liabilities of the parties could have been determined. In this opinion Justice Ward concurred.

And where the nuisance consists in the use of the road for purposes creating a nuisance injurious to health in the transportation of live stock, the city authorities are not justified in destroying the road by tearing up the tracks which may be used for a lawful purpose, the remedy being to prevent the use for the purposes creating the nuisance. Chicago v. Union Stock Yards & T. Co. 184 Ill. 224, 35 L. R. A. 281.

for the erection and use of electric wires in the street and require all reasonable safeguards for the same. State, Wisconsin Teleph. Co., v. Janesville Street R. Co. 37 Wis. 72, 22 L. R. A. 759.

In Allentown v. Western U. Telegr. Co. 148 Pa. 127, the court upheld the city ordinance relating to and regulating the erection of telephone and electric-light poles in the city streets as being within the power of such authorities. Saatro, Western U. Telegr. Co., v. Philadelphia, 22 W. N. C. 39. To the same effect, Chester v. Philadelphia, R. & P. Telegr. Co. 148 Pa. 120.

The action of the public authorities, highway commissioners, in removing telegraph poles and overhead wires, after notice and refusal to comply with the request of such authorities by placing its electrical conductors in subways properly constructed for their use, was upheld in the case of American Rapid Telegr. Co. v. Hess, 125 N. Y. 641, 13 L. R. A. 454, such structures being a nuisance, removable by the authorities after notice, as the property was not taken for public use but was simply removed from the public streets as a nuisance, which the public authorities had a right to remove, doing no unnecessary damage, as, after the passage of the act relating to subways and the building of the subways, and the giving of notice, the company had no right to maintain its poles and wires above the surface of the street, and when so allowed to remain they were there without authority and so became a public nuisance.

In People v. Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. 31 Hun, 596, an action to abate the erection of telegraph poles as a public nuisance, and to enjoin the erection of more of such structures, and the renewal of such erection, was upheld.

Telegraph poles permanently placed upon the highway, of such sizes and dimensions and solidity as to obstruct and prevent the passage of carriages and horses or foot passengers are a public nuisance at common law. Reg. v. United Kingdom Electric Telegr. Co. 31 L. J. M. C. N. S. 167, 2 Best & S. 647, note.

In People v. Metropolitan Teleph. & Telegr. Co. 31 Hun, 596, 602, it is said that so far as the poles of such companies are necessary either in size or height the right to erect and maintain them is given by the legislature, and so far as they are within that authority they cannot be alleged to be a nuisance or an unlawful obstruction of the streets by the people, but that wherever they exceeded their necessary size or height the act of the company in so maintaining them is unauthorized.

So, if telegraph poles are erected within the limits of a street or highway without legislative sanction they are nuisances abatable by the public

In Monongahela City v. Monongahela Electric Light Co. 4 Am. Electrical Cas. 53, 56, 57, the petition for mandamus set forth that, in improving the streets it was necessary to remove defendant's telegraph poles so as to be in the curb line of the sidewalk, and defendant had refused to remove same after notice and request to do so, and the court granted the writ, there being no other adequate specific remedy, the city having a right to improve its streets and to demand the removal of the defendant's poles when the same were found necessary for the purposes of improvement.

The city authorities will have power to restrain by way of injunction the replacing of telegraph wires in the public streets, where the time limited by the city ordinance for the use of the streets in that manner has expired, they having power to regulate and control the manner in which the telegraph lines shall enter or pass through the city. Mutual U. Teleg. Co. v. Chicago, 16 Fed. Rep. 308.

In Electric Improv. Co. v. San Francisco, 45 Fed. Rep. 563, 564, 13 L. R. A. 131, an ordinance of the city prohibiting the suspension of electric wires over and upon the roofs of buildings was upheld as valid, passing within the legitimate police powers of the city under the authority of the state, such power embracing all regulations affecting the health, good order, morals, and safety of society, the stretching of such wires over buildings being extremely dangerous as being liable to originate fires and as obstructing the extinguishment of fires otherwise originating.

An ordinance regulating the stringing of wires in a city, and providing that whenever it is necessary to cross the line of any existing electric light, electric power, telegraph or telephone wires, or any wires used for transmitting electrical energy it should be at a certain distance, and that the person or company making such crossing shall apply all necessary safeguards for the same, except that when the wires of any telegraph, telephone, or fire-alarm or police system shall cross the line of any electric light or power system for the transmission of electric energy, the person or company owning or operating such electric light or power system of such wires shall provide all necessary safeguards at such crossings, and further providing that such company violating such condition or refusing to make such alterations and repairs in their present or future constructions in conformity with the provisions of the ordinance shall be subject to a penalty, is within the inherent provisional or police powers of the municipal corporation to pass ordinances regulating or restraining the use of such dangerous agencies. State, Wisconsin Teleph. Co., v. Japewille Street R. Co. 87 Wis. 78, 77, 22 L. R. A. 759.

In American U. Teleg. Co. v. Harrison, 31 N. J. Eq. 627, 631, the court enjoined the proceedings of the public authorities in cutting the wires or otherwise unlawfully interfering with the wires and 39 L. R. A.

elevations of the telegraph company, where such wires as then overhung the streets did not in the slightest degree impede or endanger the full, free, and safe use of such streets by the public, and did not therefore constitute a nuisance,—especially where the public authorities had not exercised the powers given to them under the statutes regulating and fixing the elevation of telegraph wires.

In the above case of American U. Teleg. Co. v. Harrison, 31 N. J. Eq. 627, the telegraph poles were erected outside of the streets or highways upon private property, and the wires overhanging the streets were erected with the permission of the owner's of the soil, but without the permission of the defendant corporation, and were sufficiently elevated not to impede, obstruct, or endanger the free and safe use of the streets, and therefore could not be destroyed by the public authorities as a means of abating them as a nuisance.

In Com. v. Boston, 97 Mass. 555, it was held that the determination of the mayor and aldermen of the places in which the poles of telegraph companies might stand was to be regarded as conclusive upon the rightfulness of their erection within the limits of a highway so that they could not be removed by the city or any other of its officers, or treated in any manner as a public nuisance,—especially where the mayor and aldermen acted according to the provisions of Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 64, § 3.

In People, Cochen, v. Dettmer, 26 App. Div. 327, it was sought to compel the defendant, a park commissioner, by mandamus to take proceedings to prevent the further maintenance and operation of a steam railroad at grade over a certain parkway in a city, and the contention was that his duty was based upon the New York Laws 1892, chap. 665, which declared that the highway in question should, after the passing of the act, be "under the exclusive charge and management of the park commissioner of the city of Brooklyn," and further, that such commissioner should "make and enforce proper rules and regulations for the public use thereof;" and it was also suggested that such commissioner acquired the powers which the highway commissioners previously possessed under the highway law of 1890, chap. 568, § 15. The court held that the first enactment was not broad enough to empower the commissioner to institute such proceedings as the railroad was then upon the highway and had been there for many years, the language of the statute giving him no authority, even expressly or by implication, and further, that the Laws of 1892 contained no evidence of any intent to transfer to such commissioner the right to sue for injuries to the highway which belonged to the highway commissioners generally.

In People, Cochen, v. Dettmer, 26 App. Div. 327, the court intimated that if such railroad company was occupying and obstructing the avenue or street in defiance of the special statutes relating to that highway the remedy for such public nuisance was found by obtaining an indictment against the corporation, or in procuring the attorney general to

Messrs. James J. McLoughlin and Samuel L. Gilmore, for appellee:

An ordinance of the city council requiring all persons, firms, and corporations operating electric, trolley, or other cars or trains on the streets of this city to provide for the sprinkling of the streets through which their cars run, is a regulation under the police power for the health and comfort and convenience of the patrons of the cars, and of the people residing on the streets through which the cars pass, and for the health and comfort of persons in the vicinity, and is therefore legal, valid, and constitutional.

All persons, natural and artificial, are subject to the police regulations of the municipality in which they live; and this is so whether they are contractors or ordinary citizens.

Keeping the street in repair meant the street from curb to curb.

Breaux, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In Mutual U. Teleg. Co. v. Chicago, 16 Fed. Rep. 309, 11 Biss. 539, Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 359, 30 L. ed. 1187, 1189, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 300, and Hannibal v. Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. 31 Mo. App. 23, the court passed upon the right of municipal corporations to regulate the erection and use of telegraph poles and wires in the city, although in those cases the question of nuisance did not specifically arise.

See, upon the question of public safety in the control of the use of steam and electricity, note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 306, where such matters will be found treated of under the head of Matters of public safety, and infra, IV. d.

III. Steam and electricity.

The question of municipal control over steam and electricity as nuisances affecting public safety will be found in note to Harrington v. Providence (R. I.) 38 L. R. A. 306, 1. b, and the consideration of the question of railroads as nuisances on highways is treated of in this note, supra, I.

Under § 527 of the Iowa Code, the city has power to abate all nuisances on streets, but such power and duty do not deprive it of the right to allow or grant permission for the use of the streets by railroad companies under § 464 of the Code. Heath v. Des Moines & St. L. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 11.

Cities have no authority, in the absence of a legislative grant to that effect, to grant privileges for the use of the street by steam motors, and such roads cannot be constructed upon streets and highways except as provided in the section of the Iowa Code. Stanley v. Davenport, 64 Iowa, 463, 467, 37 Am. Rep. 216.

Yet it has been stated that a stationary steam engine is not in itself a nuisance, even if erected and used in the midst of a populous city, unless it interferes with the safety or convenience of the public in the use of the streets. Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217, 227, 38 Am. Rep. 239.

But the use of steam, contrary to the provisions of an ordinance, for the purpose of propelling street cars along the public street in a thickly populated town in the absence of any legislative grant authorizing it to be done, is per se a nuisance. North Chicago City R. Co. v. Lake View, 105 Ill. 207, 213, 44 Am. Rep. 788.

A traction steam engine used on a highway and calculated to frighten horses lawfully driven thereon is a public nuisance rendering the owner liable under the English Statute, 24 & 25 Vict. chap. 70. Watkins v. Reddin, 2 Fost. & F. 629.

In Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 199, 60 Am. Rep. 686, it is said that to declare the use of road engines propelled by steam, and portable engines operated by steam, near, or their passage over, a public highway, a nuisance, would be practically to prohibit their use in a manner in which they are customarily employed and moved from place to place.

So, a portable steam engine upon wheels, drawn by horse power, placed within 4 yards of the center of the road, used to propel a threshing machine in a barn near such road, not fixed thereto, or to the soil and not protected by any building, screen, or other cover, calculated to frighten horses, is a nuisance and an obstruction to the highway within the provisions of the English Statute 5 & 6 Wm. IV. chap. 50, § 70, which has in view the prevention of danger to passenger's horses and cattle. Smith v. Stokes, 4 Best & S. 84, 32 L. J. M. C. N. S. 190, 8 L. T. N. S. 425, 11 Week. Reg. 753.

In People, New York Electric Lines Co., v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 563, 604, it is held that the New York Statute of 1885, chap. 499, which provides for the placing of electrical conductors under ground in cities in that state, and for commissioners of electrical subways, did not purport to deny such companies any privileges theretofore granted, but did require that they should be exercised with due regard to the claims of others, and in such a way that they should cease to constitute a public nuisance, and should be enjoyed in such a manner as to inconvenience and endanger the general public as little as possible. Judgment in this case was affirmed upon appeal to the United States Supreme Court in 145 U. S. 175, 191, 36 L. ed. 686, 672.

In Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 26 Gratt. 83, Affirmed 96 U. S. 521, 24 L. ed. 734, the court recognized the authority of a city council to prohibit the use of steam in propelling the city street cars, although the same was not based upon the question of nuisance, the same being for the purposes of safety, comfort, good government, and general welfare of the inhabitants, and a proper police regulation.

A city ordinance, enacted pursuant to a charter giving the city authority to make, ordain, and establish such by-laws, ordinances, rules, and regulations as shall appear requisite and necessary for the security, welfare, and convenience of the city and its inhabitants, and for the preservation of public peace and good government, which ordinance compels a railroad company to water the track on which it runs through the streets of the city, is a valid exercise of its police power, the same being necessary for the welfare and convenience of the inhabitants as preventing nuisances. City & Suburban R. Co. v. Savannah, 77 Ga. 731.

Upon the question of police power over electric companies, see note to State, Laclede Gaslight Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 31 L. R. A. 731.

As to grant of franchise to electric subway companies, see note to State, St. Louis Underground Service Co., v. Murphy (Mo.) 34 L. R. A. 389.

As to whether or not a traction engine used upon a public highway is a nuisance, see note to Com. v. Allen (Pa.) 16 L. R. A. 148.

dered by the sixth recorder's court, imposing a fine of $25 or thirty days' imprisonment upon the president of the New Orleans City & Lake Railroad Company, under an ordinance adopted to compel persons operating street cars to sprinkle the streets through which their cars run. Under the terms of the ordinance, it was made "unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to operate any electric, trolley, or other cars or trains on the streets of this city without first providing in some reasonable manner for the sprinkling of the streets through which their cars run." The ordinance further provided "that any person, firm, or corporation violating this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be subject to a fine of $25, or thirty days in the parish jail, or both, at the discretion of the recorder." The facts, as developed by the testimony offered by the plaintiff, are that by reason of the velocity of the car, and its weight and its rapidly revolving wheels, volumes of dust are raised and wafted by the winds to the streets adjacent to the tracks; that the clouds of dust are counter to the health and comfort of the inhabitants. Several physicians of prominence testified that dust is injurious. Regarding comfort, there was no necessity of proving how annoying and uncomfortable are clouds of dust. The defendant, as relates to the facts, showed that, under its grant, it was bound, during the continuance of its franchise, to keep in good order and repair all streets through which their lines run, between the rails and for 1 foot on each side of the rails; that sprinkling the streets through which its cars run would compel it to expend large amounts to defray the costs.

The defendant, in the plea filed in the recorder's court, assailed the ordinance upon a number of grounds. The first was that the ordinance was unreasonable. No one disputes the proposition that an unreasonable ordinance should not be enforced. The word "unreasonable" is here used in the sense that an ordinance is inconsistent with the law of the land and the right to property. From that point of view, the courts have universally entertained jurisdiction to determine whether the ordinance was blinding. It is, said the court in Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 371, 30 L. ed. 227, "an ancient jurisdiction of judicial tribunals to pronounce upon the reasonableness and consequent validity of their by-laws. Ordinances must be reasonable," citing Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d ed.) § 319, and reviewing several decisions upon the subject.

It remains for us to pass upon the question of unreasonableness vel non of the ordinance. There is indefiniteness in the ordinance. It does not set forth with the least particularity what shall be done, or the extent of the service required, in order to escape the penalty it ordained should be inflicted for not sprinkling the streets. The failure or performance may vary each day and in each locality where sprinkling may be required. No attempt was made to indicate how the work shall be done, the days the streets should be sprinkled, the capacity for sprinkling the sprinklers should have, and the number of sprinklings that should be applied each day, 39 L. R. A.

or at such time as may have been intended. Without a matured plan covered by the terms of an ordinance in regard to sprinkling the streets, nothing good or useful can be accomplished. It will give rise only to confusion and failure. Authority must issue its orders with such clearness and definiteness that it may be understood, and the work required should be specified so that performance can be required in every locality and from everyone, under some defined rule. There should be some similarity in the work in each district. There cannot be under the ordinance in hand. There should be a measure of duty imposed, and those upon whom it is imposed should not be left to conjecture how much or how little they should do. For the purpose of illustrating: No one ordinarily careful would enter into a formal written agreement with a contractor to sprinkle 54 miles of street (the total length of defendant's line) without specification of some kind as relates to the work required. The act to be done would not be indicated by the single word "sprinkle" in the contract. The contractor would never know when he is exonerated from the obligation of his contract by performance. An ordinance imposing a duty "to do" should contain some of the elements of certainty usual in private contracts.

This brings us to the objection that the ordinance is not equal and uniform in its operations, and imposes an unjust and oppressive burden upon a particular class of persons or corporations. In so far as relates to the work of "sprinkling" the streets from curb to curb, less that portion over which defendant has a franchise, in our judgment the requirement of the ordinance is not equal and uniform. These streets are used by the public. The work necessary to maintain their cleanliness, or to insure freedom from excessive dust, is a burden which the municipality cannot impose upon particular persons and corporations, only because they own a franchise over an adjacent way. It cannot be imposed by municipal ordinance in the manner here attempted. The defendant cannot be compelled to clean and sprinkle streets not covered by its contract and over which it has no franchise. The dust raised by defendant's cars, it may be, is carried by the winds to the streets near. The evidence does not disclose that such is a fact. Presumably, however, it is; but defendant's cars are not the only vehicles which raise the dust and it would scarcely be desirable equality to make it sprinkle all the dust. The question may be propounded: Can they not be made to sprinkle their own tracks, and relieve their own road, as well as the adjacent streets, of the dust raised by their cars? To this the answer immediately suggests itself: The ordinance being indefinite and uncertain, it would serve no purpose to decide in this case the issue raised by the question. Having determined that the ordinance in its entirety is unreasonable, we would not be justified in holding that it is reasonable and valid in so far as it affects defendant's track. In view of the "unreasonableness" of the present ordinance, both the streets and the tracks are unaffected thereby.

This conclusion relieves us from the necessity of passing upon the other points urged, as it finally disposes of plaintiff's case. We do not think we should subject ourselves to the examination of every point, and pass upon them, in view of the fact that it would not add to or in any respect change the conclusion we have reached. Whatever there may be in other points must be left to future consideration and decision, if ever they are again presented.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment appealed from is reversed, annulled, and avoided. The ordinance is declared void, and the prosecution by the plaintiff against the defendant is dismissed.

A petition for rehearing having been presented, the following response was handed down on December 13, 1897:

One of the grounds of the application for a rehearing was the asserted possible interpretation which may be given to our reference to the work of sprinkling the streets from curb to curb, and our reference to the contract under which the defendant holds its grant. Of course, the contract, which is to become operative only in the distant future (the year 1906) never received a moment's consideration in preparing the opinion and entering the decree. All reference to a contract was the one under which the defendant's road is being operated. In order, however, to prevent any misinterpretation, and to put the question entirely at rest, we expressly limit all discussion preceding our decree to the question of indefiniteness of the ordinance, and the consequent unreasonableness. This entirely eliminates all questions of contracts, and of extant duties due under the contract.

Having thus modified the discussion leading to the decree, the rehearing is refused.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

DRENNEN & COMPANY, Appt.,

MERCANTILE TRUST & DEPOSIT COMPANY.

(.....Ala.....)

1. Employees of a corporation in the hands of a receiver on foreclosure of a mortgage have a perfect equity to priority of payment for wages earned within six months before the receiver's appointment, when the funds from which they ought to have been paid have been used for the benefit of bondholders, even if the terms of the mortgage embrace income.
2. The public character of a corporation is not a element of the equity in favor of the priority of claims against a receiver for wages when earnings which should have been applied to them have been wrongfully diverted for the benefit of bondholders; but a manufacturing company or a mining company is subject to the rule as much as a railroad company.
3. More casual and incidental repairs to remedy defects caused by current use are not improvements or betterments within the rule which gives priority to wages out of the assets of a receiver of a corporation when funds that should have been used to pay wages have gone into improvements.
4. Labor necessary to the continuation of the business of a corporation does not entitle the workmen to priority of payment out of the assets of a receiver on foreclosure of a mortgage, if the labor is not shown to have been to the advantage of the bondholders, or necessary in conservation of their interests, or that the receiver has realized any income out of which the wages should be paid.

5. An averment is not objectionable because made on information and belief.

6. An averment of the receipt of "about $40,000" is not insufficient for indefiniteness.

7. Claims for the purchase price of the products of a corporation constituting a part of its gross earnings, and a part of which represents the labor of employees, constitutes, in the hands of a receiver, a class of assets to which employees whose wages earned within six months are still unpaid have a claim prior to that of bondholders on foreclosure.

8. Assignees of employees may have their priority of payment out of the assets of a receiver.

A PPEAL by intervener from a judgment of the City Court of Birmingham County denying its petition for a distribution of the assets of the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company which had reached the hands of a receiver in a proceeding by the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company to foreclose a mortgage upon its property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Hewitt, Walker, & Porter for appellant.

Messrs. Alexander T. London and John P. Tellman for appellee.

McClellan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company

NOTE.—The above case goes beyond most prior cases in repudiating the distinction between private corporations and those of a quasi public character in respect to the power of a court to permit receivers and to create charges on the property for current expenses which shall have preference over 39 L. a mortgage. On this question, see Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Great Creek Coal Co. (C. C. S. D. Ill.) 16 L. R. A. 803, and note; also Hooper v. Central Trust Co. (Md.) 29 L. R. A. 222; Hanna v. State Trust Co. (C. C. App. 8th C.) 30 L. R. A. 201.

having made default in the payment of the interest on its bonded indebtedness, the trustee in the mortgages executed by said company to secure its said indebtedness, seasonably after such default made, filed a bill in the city court of Birmingham praying the appointment of a receiver, "with full power and authority to demand, sue for, collect, receive, and take into his possession the goods, chattels, rights, credits, moneys, and effects, lands, tenements, books, papers, and property belonging to the said Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company, and that said receiver may receive from the said court, in addition to the ordinary powers possessed by such receivers, full power and authority to manage, run, and operate said property; and to carry out any and all contracts that said company may have made, and to renew the same, connected with the conduct of their business, and especially the contract with T. G. Bush, receiver; if essential thereto, to pay to the said Bush, receiver, any indebtedness which may now be due him; and to preserve and protect the corporate franchises, privileges, and property; and to preserve the corporate existence of the said company; and to preserve all corporate property from being sacrificed under any proceeding which can or may be taken, and would be likely to prejudice or sacrifice the same; and that an injunction may issue against the said defendant company, and all persons claiming to act by, through, or under it, and all other persons, to restrain them from interfering with the said receiver's taking possession of and managing the said property." The further prayer of the bill is for the ascertainment of the mortgage indebtedness, principal and interest; a decree requiring the defendant to pay the same by a short day, to be named by the court; and, in default of such payment, for a decree that said company, and all other persons claiming under it, be absolutely barred and foreclosed of and from all right of equity of redemption in and to said premises, and for a decree directing the sale of the whole mortgaged premises for the payment of said bonded indebtedness, and the interest thereon, etc. The premises embraced in the mortgages, and for which a receiver and sale are thus prayed, consisted of a coal mine and plant, complete, coking ovens, and a railway, in Jefferson county. The railway was 6 or 7 miles in length, built primarily, it may be admitted, for the development, and to be used in the working, of defendant's said mine; but defendant's charter, which authorized the construction and operation of this railway, required that defendant should transport persons and the property of others upon it, so that as to this road the defendant corporation was a common carrier. A receiver was appointed in accordance with the prayer of the bill, and took possession of all the property and effects of the respondent corporation. The bill was filed and the appointment made on November 28, 1893. On February 20, 1894, Drennen & Co. filed a petition in the cause, which, as finally amended, presents the following averments: That the defendant, the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company, is indebted to petitioners in the sum of $14,697.52, including interest to time of filing the petition, and that all this indebtedness had accrued during the months of August, September, October, and November, 1893. That, as shown by the bill, said defendant owned and operated the coal mine, coke ovens, and a railway in Jefferson county at the time of the appointment of the receiver under said bill, and that the defendant had carried on these operations for six months prior to such appointment; and that the company then owed a large amount of back wages to its employees and operatives, a great part of which was due to them for work and labor done in said mine, and in and about said coke ovens and railway. That the amount alleged to be due petitioners from said company is a part of such back wages due by defendant to its said employees and operatives for work and labor done and performed for the defendant during the months of July, August, September, October, and November, 1893, and that the books and accounts of petitioners, showing the said amount alleged to be due them, have been compared and checked over with the books and accounts of the defendant, which are in the possession of the receivers in the cause, and both sets of books and accounts agree as to said amount due the petitioners. That the work done by said employees and operatives during said months consisted in part in digging and mining and shipping coal, in keeping said mine in operation, and in preparing said coal for shipment, and that about $8,947.52 of the amount due petitioners was for this work; in other part, to the extent of about $750 in value, in operating and repairing defendant's said railroad; and for the rest, to the extent of about $5,000, in operating and repairing said coke ovens, and in preparing coke for shipment to market. And that all said work was necessary to enable the defendant to carry on its business, and was done for the benefit of the complainant in the cause, and to preserve the property and franchises of the defendant embraced in the deeds of trust to the complainant. That petitioners have been informed, and believe, and so state, that there was due to the defendant at and before the time of the appointment of the receiver the sum of about $40,000, for coal and coke sold by the defendant, which had been taken from said mine and manufactured in said ovens; that said $40,000 represented gross earnings of the defendant, into which the labor of said employees and operatives entered, and that they performed work and labor in mining said coal and in manufacturing said coke. That defendant was, and has been for a year or more prior to the appointment of the receiver, a corporation duly organized under the general laws of Alabama, and as such had power to condemn land for railroad purposes, and to operate its said railroad as a common carrier, and did so operate it. And that petitioners, for value, purchased from said employees and operatives their claims against the defendant, aggregating said sum of $14,697.52 and said claims were duly transferred and assigned to them before the appointment of said receiver. The following is the prayer of this petition: "That your honors will take jurisdiction of this petition, and that a day be fixed or set for the hearing of the same, and that such notice as is required by law and the rules of your honors' court be given or served upon the parties to this cause, and that upon the hearing of this, their petition, your honors will render a decree declaring or establishing the said claim of the petitioners a prior and preferred claim to and over said mortgage or deeds of trust of complainant, and that the said receiver be required to pay said claim of petitioners out of the first moneys that come into his hands over and above what shall be necessary to pay the running and operating expenses of said property. Petitioners ask and pray for all other, and such other, orders and decrees as may be necessary in the premises." The petition is verified; one of the petitioners making oath that its allegations and statements made of his own knowledge he knows to be true, and those made upon information and belief he believes to be true. To this petition the complainant in the cause interposed a demurrer, assigning numerous grounds of objection to its sufficiency. The assignments chiefly relied on may be summarized as follows: (1) That the petition fails to show that the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company is a railroad corporation. (2) That the petition fails to show that the receiver has any money in his hands subject to the payment of petitioners' claim or that complainant or the bondholders ever received any moneys that should have been paid to the petitioners, or that they were ever paid anything on their bonds after the accrual of the claims of petitioners, or that the security afforded by said mortgages was enhanced or improved in value by the rendition of the services referred to in the petition. (3) That the petition fails to show that the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company ever diverted any of its gross earnings from the payment of its running expenses, either for the improvement or betterment of its said railroad or other property, or for the payment of interest on any of the bonds secured by said deeds of trust, or any of the other charges secured by either of said deeds. And there are other assignments, based on the grounds above stated, going separately to the particular claims of petitioners for work, etc., done on the railroad, on the coke ovens, and in manufacturing and shipping coke, and in the mine severally. These need not be further set out at this place. The city court sustained complainant's demurrer, and dismissed the petition, and from that decree petitioners prosecute this appeal.

The equitable doctrine whereby employees of railway corporations which have passed into the hands of receivers on bills for foreclosure, and the like, filed by or in behalf of the holders of their bonded indebtedness secured by mortgage or deed of trust, are given a preference and priority of payment over the bondholders in respect of wages earned within a short period—generally said to be six months—before the appointment of the receiver, is thoroughly well established in other jurisdictions, and especially in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. *Foadick v. The grounds of this doctrine, and its extent and limitations, are nowhere more lucidly and forcibly stated than in the opinion of Chief Justice Waite in Foadick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, where it is, we believe, first clearly expounded and declared; and we cannot do better here than to quote the language of that learned judge: "As to the second question, we have no doubt that, when a court of chancery is asked by railroad mortgagees to appoint a receiver of railroad property pending proceedings for foreclosure, the court in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, may as a condition of issuing the necessary order, impose such terms in reference to the payment from the income, during the receivership, of outstanding debts for labor, supplies, equipment, or permanent improvement of the mortgaged property, as may, under the circumstances of the particular case, appear to be reasonable. Railroad mortgages and the rights of railroad mortgagees are comparatively new in the history of judicial proceedings. They are peculiar in their character, and affect peculiar interests. The amounts involved are generally large, and the rights of the parties oftentimes complicated and conflicting. It rarely happens that a foreclosure is carried through to the end without some concessions by some parties from their strict legal rights, in order to secure advantages that could not otherwise be attained, and which it is supposed will operate for the general good of all who are interested. This results, almost as a matter of necessity, from the peculiar circumstances which surround such litigation. The business of all railroad companies is done, to a greater or less extent, on credit. This credit is longer or shorter, as the necessities of the case require; and, when companies become peculiarly embarrassed, it frequently happens that debts for labor, supplies, equipment, and improvements are permitted to accumulate, in order that bonded interest may be paid, and a disastrous foreclosure postponed, if not altogether avoided. In this way the daily and monthly earnings, which ordinarily should go to pay the daily and monthly expenses, are kept from those to whom in equity they belong, and used to pay the mortgage debt. The income out of which the mortgagee is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements. Every railroad mortgagee, in accepting his security impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid for the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income. If, for the convenience of the moment, something is taken from what may not improperly be called the current debt fund, and put into that which belongs to the mortgage creditors, it certainly is not inequitable for the court, when asked by the mortgagees to take possession of the future income and hold it for their benefit, to require, as a condition of such an order, that what is due from the earnings to the current debt shall be paid by the court from the future current receipts before anything derived from that source goes to the mortgagees. In this way the court will only do what, if a receiver should not be appointed, the company ought itself to do. For even though the mortgage may, in terms, give a lien upon the profits and income, until possession of the mortgaged premises is actually taken, or something equivalent done, the whole earnings belong to the company, and are subject to its control. Galveston, H. & H. R. Co. v. Cowdrey, 78 U. S. 11 Wall. 459, 20 L. ed. 199; Gilman v. Illinois & M. Teleg. Co. 91 U. S. 603, 23 L. ed. 405; American Bridge Co. v. Heidebach, 94 U. S. 798, 24 L. ed. 144. The mortgagee has his strict rights which he may enforce in the ordinary way. If he asks no favors he need grant none. But, if he calls upon a court of chancery to put forth its extraordinary powers and grant him purely equitable relief, he may with propriety be required to submit to the operation of a rule which always applies in such cases, and do equity in order to get equity. The appointment of a receiver is not a matter of strict right. Such an application always calls for the exercise of judicial discretion, and the chancellor should so mold his order that, while favoring one, injustice is not done to another. If this cannot be accomplished, the application should ordinarily be denied. We think, also, that if no such order is made when the receiver is appointed, and it appears in the progress of the cause that bonded interest has been paid, additional equipment provided, or lasting and valuable improvements made, out of earnings which ought in equity to have been employed to keep down debts for labor, supplies, and the like, it is within the power of the court to use the income of the receivership to discharge obligations which, but for the diversion of funds, would have been paid in the ordinary course of business. This, not because the creditors to whom such debts are due have in law a lien upon the mortgaged property or the income, but because, in a sense, the officers of the company are trustees of the earnings for the benefit of the different classes of creditors and the stockholders, and if they give to one class of creditors that which properly belongs to another, the court may, upon an adjustment of the accounts, so use the income which comes into its own hands as, if practicable, to restore the parties to their original equitable rights. While, ordinarily, this power is confined to the appropriation of the income of the receivership and the proceeds of moneyed assets that have been taken from the company, cases may arise where equity will require the use of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property in the same way. Thus it often happens that, in the course of the administration of the cause, the court is called upon to take income which would otherwise be applied to the payment of old debts for current expenses, and use it to make permanent improvements on the fixed property, or to buy additional equipment. In this way the value of the mortgaged property is not unfrequently materially increased. It is not to be supposed that any such use of the income will be directed by the court, without giving the parties in interest an opportunity to be heard against it. Generally, as we know both from observation and experience, all such orders are made at the request of the parties or with their consent. Under such circumstances, it is easy to see that there may sometimes be a propriety in paying back to the income from the proceeds of the sale what is thus again diverted from the current debt fund in order to increase the value of the property sold. The same may sometimes be true in respect to expenditures before the receivership. No fixed and inflexible rule can be laid down for the government of the courts in all cases. Each case will necessarily have its own peculiarities, which must to a greater or less extent influence the chancellor when he comes to act. The power rests upon the fact that in the administration of the affairs of the company the mortgage creditors have got possession of that which in equity belonged to the whole or a part of the general creditors. Whatever is done, therefore, must be with a view to a restoration by the mortgage creditors of that which they have thus inequitably obtained. It follows that, if there has been in reality no diversion, there can be no restoration; and that the amount of restoration should be made to depend upon the amount of the diversion." Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 251, 25 L. ed. 339, 342 et seq.

The subject-matter involved in the case of Fosdick v. Schall was railroad property, and stress is laid upon that fact in the opinion. Moreover, in all the cases cited above as sustaining this doctrine the question arose between mortgagees of railroad property, or receivers of railroads, and persons who claimed to have furnished labor or supplies in the operation of the road, or to have put permanent improvements and betterments upon the property; and this character of the property is not infrequently referred to in these cases as one of the grounds or reasons for the existence of the doctrine. Nor are there lacking in many of them expressions (which are, perhaps, no more than dicta of the judges writing the opinions) to the effect that the rule has never been, and cannot be, extended to the property of any other corporation or class of corporations. The application of the principle to railroad corporations and property, and the view that it should not be extended to other corporations and their property, is based partly upon the supposed peculiarities of such corporations, in the manner of conducting their business, adverted to somewhat by Chief Justice Waite, supra, but mainly on their public character, the public uses to which their property is devoted, the public convenience which their business is to conserve, the right and interest which the public have in the carrying on of their business without break, let, or hindrance, and their corresponding duty to the public to so carry it on; but, while these considerations are pretty generally referred to in these cases, the equity of the principle is nowhere, nor in any degree, made to rest upon them. To the contrary, they seem to be advanced merely for the purpose of affording a justification—we had almost said excuse—for the application and effectuation in the particular case of an abstract equity resting entirely upon other and altogether sufficient grounds of recognized equitable cognizance, and which needs no other justification or excuse for its application in any case than the existence of the facts upon which it arises and rests. It may be—probably is—that all which is said in the cases about railroads, and this equity being confined to the property, etc., of railroad corporations, comes from a conservative view of the sacredness of the rights of mortgagees as against the subsequently accruing claims of third persons, and is prompted by an apprehension that if the principle is allowed to operate in respect of the property of other corporations, as to which there may not be, from all points of view, the same necessity for its application, it would become an engine of oppression to bondholders, and be used in violence to their vested rights and interests. This view is most commendable, but the apprehension is without any reasonable foundation, it seems to us. If the principle is equitable in itself, it can never be used to work injustice or inequity to bondholders or to anybody else. And that it is equitable in itself, and without reference to whether the mortgagor corporation is a railroad company or not, is demonstrated by the opinion of Judge Waite in Fosdick v. Schall, which has been uniformly followed and never doubted, and is demonstrable by every consideration obtaining in the premises. The doctrine proceeds on the broad principle which underlies the administration of all law concerning property rights, that, when one party has property which belongs to another, restitution, in some form or another, must be adjudged or decreed by the courts, upon proper and seasonable application by the party aggrieved. The theory is, to get nearer the case in hand, that the bondholders, or the receiver for them, have property, or something of value, to which the party invoking the court's aid has a better abstract right,—a superior equity. To state the proposition yet more concretely, the equity arises and is rested upon one or another of the three following categories or states of fact: First, that the gross earnings of the corporation before the receivership, to which its operatives and laborers and persons furnishing necessary supplies are, upon all the authorities, entitled in preference and priority to the bondholders, have been diverted from the payment of their wages and accounts, and paid to the bondholders, or are in the hands of the receiver, to be paid to the bondholders, or to be expended by him in the further operation of the corporation's works for the benefit of the bondholders, or have been expended, either before or after receiver appointed, in the improvement and betterment of the mortgaged property, whereby the security of the bonds is increased, to the obvious advantage and benefit of the bondholders. Or, second, that whether, strictly speaking, there has been any diversion of gross earnings from the employees, directly or indirectly, to the bondholders, or not, the operatives and laborers have performed services and labor in the improvement and betterment of the mortgaged property, so that such labor and services have inured directly to the benefit of the bondholders, in the enhancement of the value of their security, and hence of their bonds; they thereby securing, in addition to the property embraced in their mortgages, the value of the services of the company's operatives and laborers, which value belongs to such operatives and laborers, and would have been paid to them, it is to be assumed, by the corporation, out of its gross earnings, but for the intervention of the bondholders, and the appointment, at their instance, of the receiver. Or, third, that labor and services have been performed and rendered in carrying on the business of the corporation, and keeping it a "going concern" (the mortgages and bonds evidencing a contemplation of the parties to them that the operations of the corporation should be kept on foot and going, and a necessity therefor, as a means of production of the net income out of which the bonds, principal and interest, are to be paid); that the business has been kept going by the receiver, and earnings from it have been realized; that such earnings have been paid to the bondholders, or are held by the receivers; and that the laborers have not been paid for services thus rendered prior to the receivership. The first two categories of fact under which such priority will be awarded are fully stated, and the equity of the results flowing from them is fully demonstrated, in the opinion of Judge Waite copied above. The third finds ample illustration and support in an opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered also by the Chief Justice, in Burnham v. Bowen, 111 U. S. 776, 28 L. ed. 596, where it was sought to have the amount due Bowen for coal supplied to a railroad company before the appointment of the receiver made a first charge upon the income of the receivership, and, such income having been paid to the bondholders, to have payment made out of the corpus of the mortgaged property; and it is not questioned that sums due to laborers stand upon the same footing as supply accounts in this connection. In the course of the opinion, Judge Waite said: "In the present case, as we have seen, the debt of Bowen was for current expenses and payable out of current earnings. . . . It is said, however, that as no part of the income, before the appointment of the receiver, was used to pay mortgage interest, or to put permanent improvements on the property, or to increase the equipment, there was no such diversion of the funds belonging in equity to the labor and supply creditors as to make it proper to use the income of the receivership to pay them. The debt due Bowen was incurred to keep the road running, and thus preserve the security of the bond creditors. If the trustees had taken possession under the mortgage, they would have been subjected to similar expenses to do what the company, with their consent and approbation, was doing for them. There is nothing to show that the receiver was appointed because of any misappropriation of the earnings by the company. On the contrary, it is probable, from the fact that the large judgment for the right of way was obtained about the same time the receiver was appointed, that the change of possession was affected to avoid anticipated embarrassments from that cause. But, however that may be, there certainly is no complaint of a diversion by the company of the current earnings from the payment of the current expenses. So far as anything appears on the record, the failure of the company to pay the debt to Bowen was due alone to the fact that the expenses of running the road and preserving the security of the bondholders were greater than the receipts from the business. Under these circumstances, we think the debt was a charge in equity on the continuing income, as well that which came into the hands of the court after the receiver was appointed as that before. When, therefore, the court took the earnings of the receivership and applied them to the payment of the fixed charges on the railroad structures, thus increasing the security of the bondholders at the expense of the labor and supply creditors, there was such a diversion of what is denominated in Fosdick v. Schall, the 'current debt fund' as to make it proper to require the mortgagees to pay it back. So far as current expense creditors are concerned, the court should use the income of the receivership in the way the company would have been bound in equity and good conscience to use it if no change in the possession had been made. This rule is in strict accordance with the decision in Fosdick v. Schall, which we see no reason to modify in any particular." And to the same effect (that it is not necessary to the application of this doctrine that there should be, strictly speaking, any diversion of income before the appointment of the receiver) are the opinions of Judge Thompson, expressed in his work on Corporations, and of Judge Caldwell on the circuit bench. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 7118; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Kansas City, W. & N. W. R. Co. 53 Fed. Rep. 182.

Enough has, we think, been said by ourselves, and through our adoption of the language of Judge Waite to demonstrate that the equity of the doctrine lies solely in the facts that the gross income of the corporation, which in good conscience belongs to its laborers and operatives, has been, in one form or another, diverted from them, and converted, directly or indirectly, to the use, benefit, and behoof of the bondholders, to whom in equity and good conscience it does not belong (whether the mortgages securing the bonds in terms embrace income or not) until the wages of laborers and operatives, and the accounts of supply or materialmen for labor done and supplies furnished recently before the appointment of the receiver, have been paid. And this is the whole equity, and it is in itself a perfect equity. The fact that the corporation is of a public character does not enter into it, and is not an element of it, any more than such fact would be necessary to a recovery in trover for a horse converted by a corporation. Every element of this equity may exist as well against a private as against a public corporation, and against bond creditors of the one as well as the other. The right to be asserted is obviously the same, whatever the character in this respect of the corporation. The wrong done to the employees is the same,—the misappropriation of the fund for the payment of their wages. And the remedy for the effectuation of the right and the redress of the wrong is applied upon considerations which take no account of whether the corporation whose earnings have thus been wrongfully diverted from the payment of its employees is a railroad company, or a manufacturing company, or a mining company. The diversion of the fund being shown, and the equity being thus made to appear, the redress is accorded, the equity is declared and effectuated, by courts of chancery, upon that broad and beneficent maxim of equity jurisprudence which imposes, or authorizes the court to impose, upon every suitor asking equitable relief, the duty and burden of doing equity; and we have not heard or seen it suggested that this principle is applicable more to one suitor than another, or more to a public than a private corporation. The necessity for the application of this equitable doctrine, for giving preference to claims of employees for wages is doubtless more frequent in railroad cases, but that does not argue that the facts which authorize it cannot as well exist in other cases. So there is more necessity, ordinarily, for a railroad corporation to be kept a "going concern," because of the duty it owes the public, and the character of its business; and hence it is true that the facts stated, constituting the equity of the doctrine in the third category, supra, exist more frequently in respect of railroad property. But there may well be, from the point of view of the bondholders, as much necessity to keep the works of a private corporation going, in order to protect and preserve the property which is the bondholders' security, as also to earn income for the payment of current expenses, and the principal and interest of the bonds. And the necessity of keeping the corporation a going concern is in all cases gauged, not from the standpoint of the public, but from the standpoint of the bondholders; and for the purpose of determining, not what injury the public would have suffered from the stoppage of the works, nor how they have been benefited by the continuation of the business, but what injury the bondholder would have suffered from such stoppage in the loss of net income, and the diminution of the value of the property, with a view to measuring the benefits he has received from the laborer of employees in continuing to carrying on the operations of the corporation. The damages and loss to the bondholder from a stoppage of the operations of a railroad would generally be greater than from the stoppage of the works of a mining company; but, whether greater or less, they stand upon the same footing as a measure of the benefit accruing to him from the labor which prevented their infliction upon him. The difference is one of quantity, and not of kind.

We have undertaken to state this doctrine as it has been declared in other jurisdictions, and there applied to railroad property, and to give our reasons, on general principles, for the conclusion we have reached, that that limitation of the doctrine is unsound, and that, of consequence, in our opinion, the equity is as salutary, and its effectuation is as practicable and necessary, against the bondholders of a private as against those of the public corporations. The argument against this wider application of the doctrine which is based on the supposed fact that such application has not heretofore been made, is the same argument that stood in the way of the conclusion in Fosdick v. Schall, and was in that case entirely demolished, in respect of railroad corporations and their property; the same argument, indeed, that has had to be met and overthrown in every new application of equitable principles from the beginning, and which, had it been allowed to obtain and control, would have left England and this country without the splendid system of equity jurisdiction which now embellishes the jurisprudence of both countries. It may be, as suggested, that courts have been very stupid, or very much at fault, in not making an earlier application of these principles to cases like the present one; but, if so, it is the same stupidity which delayed the declaration of the doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall, that in the early ages failed to recognize equity jurisprudence at all, and which, upon the eventual establishment of the court of chancery, stood in the way of the immediate development and application of all the principles of equity into a perfect system of equity jurisprudence, which has not even yet been attained. The broader application of the doctrine which we are attempting to justify on what we regard as very plain and simple elementary principles of equity will not lead to, involve, or admit of any of the dire consequences which are suggested, as will be clearly seen upon reference to the limitations which those principles themselves involve, and which we have endeavored to state with care and precision. It will not take the place of mechanic's lien laws, and the like, nor obviate the necessity or policy of such enactments. It will not in any sense encroach upon vested or contractual securities or rights. The principles upon which it rests, in the application of it which we are proposing, in and of themselves mark a distinct line between the particular corporation cases to which it applies, and the ordinary cases of mortgages on property, whether of individuals or corporations to secure the payment of debts, and under it there is not the slightest danger of the secured creditor in any case losing anything which he is entitled to on recognized principles of equity and good conscience. We have examined all the authorities brought to light in the case, not to speak of the adjudications of this court; and none of them conflicts with our position, except in the matter of obvious dicta, to which we have already referred.

We have proceeded thus far, and to the conclusion indicated above, without reference to or consideration of what has heretofore been said or decided by this court on the subject. Aside from the case of Merchants' Bank v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, there are two cases in our Reports which are supposed to bear upon it. The first is that of Meyer v. Johnston, 53 Ala. 237. In this case it appears that the mortgagor of a railway executed a second mortgage on the property to secure money borrowed for the purpose of making permanent improvements upon it, and this money was so used. Of an effort made by the beneficiaries in the second mortgage to have their claim given a priority over the first-mortgage debt, the court by Manning, J., said: "The claim of complainants below, for the value of the improvements made . . . on the railroad . . . is equally without just foundation. It would be a case of charging the mortgagee with improvements put on the mortgaged property by the mortgagor, which is wholly inadmissible." Page 352. The equitable principle of Fosdick v. Schall had not been formulated and expounded at the time of, nor was it urged in argument or at all considered by the court in, the decision of Meyer v. Johnston; nor, indeed, did the facts there involved present a case for its application. So that we feel entirely warranted in saying that adjudication is not an authority against the so well established doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall, and the other cases in that line of authority. The other case referred to is that of Lehman Bros. v. Tullasseo Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567. In that case the equitable doctrine invoked by these petitioners was not only fully considered by this court, but it was reaffirmed and adopted, and its operation was expressly extended to the property of a manufacturing company then in the hands of a receiver appointed at the instance of the holders of the corporation's bonds, which were secured by a deed of trust or mortgage on its property. Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court, and, after quoting with approval the following language from the opinion of Judge Waite in Fosdick v. Schall, viz.: "When a court of chancery is asked by railroad mortgagees to appoint a receiver of railroad property, pending proceedings for foreclosure, the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, may, as a condition of issuing the necessary order, impose such terms in reference to the payment from the income, during the receivership, of outstanding debts for labor, supplies, equipment, or permanent improvement of the mortgaged property, as may, under the circumstances of the particular case, appear to be reasonable,"—went on to say: "The further observation is made, in reference to railroad mortgages, which seems to us applicable to mortgages by manufacturing and commercial corporations, generally, that they 'are comparatively new in the history of judicial proceedings. They are peculiar in their character, and affect peculiar interests. The amounts involved are generally large, and the rights of the parties oftentimes complicated and conflicting. It rarely happens that a foreclosure is carried through to the end without some concessions of some parties from their strict legal rights, in order to secure advantages that could not otherwise be attained, and which it is supposed will operate for the general good of all who are interested. This results, almost as a matter of necessity, from the peculiar circumstances which surround such litigation.'" And the chief justice, in another connection, said further: "The general creditors . . . then before the court, under the circumstances, could properly, for the convenience and interest of all, be required to concede the use of the property [belonging to the mortgagor, but not covered by the mortgage], from their strict legal rights to it, and its immediate reduction to money by a sale; as the mortgagees could be required to concede from their strict legal rights, that from the earnings of the mortgaged property, outstanding debts for labor, supplies, etc., should be paid." 64 Ala. 596 et seq. The case of Merchants' Bank

v. Moore, 106 Ala. 646, above referred to, goes upon certain dicta of Judge Brewer in Kneeland v. American Loan & T. Co. 136 U. S. 89, 34 L. ed. 379, which we have already considered, to the conclusion that the doctrine under consideration cannot be applied to other than railroad corporations. That conclusion is, we think, at war with our own case of Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co. 64 Ala. 567; and it appears to have been rendered without consideration, and certainly without discussion, of the broad and beneficent principles of equity which not only support the doctrine in respect of railway corporations, but, with equal force, require its extension to all corporations which, as shown by deeds of trust or mortgages to secure bonds, it is in the contemplation and to the interest of the parties (the mortgagor and bondholders) should be kept going; and this without at all impinging upon the sacredness of the vested rights of the bondholders. We are now of opinion that what is said in that case in limitation of the doctrine to railroads is unsound in principle, and must be modified so as to comport with the views we now announce. And we will return to and reaffirm the decision in Lehman Bros. v. Tallassee Mfg. Co.; and upon that, in connection with the general equities to which we have adverted, we do not hesitate to apply the doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall to the property of the defendant corporation, though it be only a mining and coke manufacturing concern, now in the hands of the receivers appointed at the instance of the trustee in the deeds of trust, if the petition presents the particular facts which are essential elements of the equity petitioners invoke and rely upon.

To return, then, to the petition: We find no averment in it of any such improvement or betterment of the mortgaged property by the laborers whose wages are unpaid, and to whose claims petitioners have succeeded, as would entitle them to priority over the bondholders. There are averments of repairs to the coke ovens and to the railroad; but mere casual and incidental repairs, such as are implied here,—the mere mending of a break or defect caused by current use, etc.,—are not improvements or betterments, within the rule we are considering. The improvements must be of such character as to add a value, in a sense permanent, to the property, so that the security of the bonds is thereby increased, before the bondholders can be called upon to make restitution of that value to the laborers.

Nor do we find that a case is made under the third statement of facts supporting this equity above. It is said that the labor was necessary to continue the business of the corporation, but it is not shown either that such continuance was to the advantage of the bondholders, or necessary in conservation of their interests, or that any income out of which, or because of the receipt of which, the wages for this labor should be paid, had been realized by the receiver from his administration and operation of the business and works of the corporation. Hence no case is made under the third statement above of the facts constituting this equity.

But we do find an averment on information and belief, that "there was due to the defendant at and before the time of the appointment of said receiver the sum of about $40,000, which was due for coal and coke sold by the defendant, and which was taken from said mine and manufactured in said ovens, and that said $40,000 represented the gross earnings of the defendant, into which the labor of said employees and operatives entered, and that said employees performed work and labor in mining of said coal and in manufacturing said coke, and which is referred to in this section." This averment is not objectionable because of being made on information and belief. Christian v. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. 92 Ala. 180; Lucas v. Oliver, 34 Ala. 626; Nix v. Winter, 35 Ala. 209. It is as definite as to amount as if the language had been "a large sum, to wit, $40,000," which means about $40,000 and is a customary and sufficient mode of averring such facts. It is an averment that the company, when the receiver was appointed, held and owned claims for products sold, bills receivable, for about $40,000. Prima facie, the parties owing these bills were solvent, and the amounts against them were good. It is shown that the receiver was authorized and directed to take into his possession all the property of the corporation, special reference being made to assets of this kind, and that he did take possession of all its property of every kind. It is probable these accounts have been collected, but, whether so or not, they or their proceeds constitute the "moneyed assets that have been taken from the company," spoken of by Judge Waite as the class of assets upon which ordinarily the power to give laborers priority of payment over bondholders is exercised. The petition shows that these "moneyed assets" belonged to, and were a part of, the gross earnings of the corporation. They therefore belonged to the employees, in preference to the bondholders. If they are still uncollected in the hands of the receiver, the petitioners are entitled to have their claims charged upon them under the general prayer for relief. If they have been collected, and the money is in the hands of the receiver, petitioners are entitled to have their debts paid out of it. And if their proceeds have been paid to the bondholders, or expended in the administration of the receivership, the claims of the petitioners should be made a charge on the corpus of the mortgaged property, and paid out of the first moneys coming into the hands of the receiver, as specially prayed in the petition. The claims of the petitioners, being for labor done within six months before the appointment of the receiver, come within the strictest rule declared by any of the cases as to time. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 7115.

No objection to the relief prayed can be based upon the fact that petitioners claim as assignees of the employees. 5 Thomp. Corp. § 7117.

The petition prays that notice of its filing be given to the parties to the pending suit. This was, in our opinion, sufficient, in respect of making parties to the intervention, and the objection in this connection taken by the demurrer is untenable.

Finally, our conclusion is that the petition made a case for the relief as shown above, and the demurrer to it should not have been sustained.

The decree of the Circuit Court is therefore reversed, the demurrer to the petition as a whole is overruled, and the cause is remanded.

Head, J., dissents.

Coleman, J., dissenting:

The Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company (a corporation authorized by its charter to own and operate coal mines, coke ovens, and a railway in Jefferson county), to secure its bonded indebtedness, executed a deed of trust to the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Company, the appellee, upon all its property, and tolls, charges, and its income. Having defaulted, the trustee filed a bill praying for a receiver, and fore closure of the mortgage. Pending the foreclosure bill, the appellants, Drennen & Co., by petition, interposed a claim for $14,697, and prayed that it be allowed as a preferred claim. The basis of this claim is that it was "due for repairs and work and labor done and performed for the defendant, the Mary Lee Coal & Railway Company, during the months of July, August, September, October, and November," preceding the filing of the bill. Of the amount claimed, about $8,947 was due for digging and mining and shipping coal and in keeping said mine in operation, and in preparing said coal for shipment; about $5,000 was due in operating and repairing said coke ovens, and in preparing coke for shipment to market; and about $750 was due for operating and repairing defendant's said railroad. The real issue involved is whether the doctrine believed to have been first promulgated in the case of Foadick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235, 25 L. ed. 339, which allowed wages earned within six months before the appointment of a receiver preference and priority over the bondholders whose debts were secured by a mortgage preceding the accrual of the claim for wages, and which doctrine, by that decision, and others since rendered, was expressly limited to public railroads, shall be further extended, and as extended be applied to private business corporations, companies, and individual transactions. The principle asserted, and the rule adopted for its application, in the opinion of the court, logically lead to this result. No case has been cited in support of the contention, and the writer believes it is without precedent.

New and useful inventions for the benefit of mankind are commendable, but the province of courts is to apply existing principles, and not create rules and principles which injuriously affect the rights of parties, acquired by contract. The province and power of courts of equity to intervene for the protection of right and prevention of wrong, and to invent remedies, where none exist, to secure these ends, is one of its most useful attributes, and the exercise of this power on proper occasions has developed into our present admirable system of equity jurisprudence; but there is a great and irreconcilable difference between the application of a remedy and the creation of a right and priority which subvert and subordinate existing contractual interests. It has been truly said that under some circumstances courts of equity may amplify remedies, but cannot dispense with legislation or amplify jurisdiction. The reasons now assigned for this new departure have been obvious to the judicial mind for a century or more, and the very fact that the conclusion has not hitherto been accepted as sound and permissible, of itself, is full of warning to that conservatism which should characterize courts of justice. Precedents, though not always entitled to absolute domination, when they have become so established as to enter into and become elements of contract cannot be set aside by courts without inflicting injustice. The legislative department has no authority by its enactments to impair the obligation of contracts, and surely courts of justice ought not, by their adjudications, to adopt and apply principles to existing contracts which will have the effect of an ex post facto legislative enactment. It is unnecessary to cite authority in support of a proposition of law recognized in all courts, and especially in this state, to the effect that in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, at common law, a mortgage upon property carried with it all subsequent improvements, repairs, and betterments; and this rule prevails until changed by statute in courts of equity, as well as law, in all states where the common law exists. Nor is it necessary at this late day to cite the authorities which have upheld the validity of mortgages, including those of railroads, upon after-acquired property, and tolls and charges and incomes. It was the prevalence of these rules which led to the enactment of what are known as the "mechanics' and materialmen's lien laws," and statutes giving priority for labor and supplies and materials, the constitutionality and application of which statutes have undergone so many exhaustive discussions in the courts of the country. In no case that is now recalled have these statutes been sustained in so far as they were intended to displace or subordinate prior liens and contracts; nor can there be found a decision, in my opinion, which demanded of the owner of a right, vested in him by virtue of a prior valid contract, that he concede something of his rights as a condition precedent to his obtaining the aid of the courts of the country. I am not now construing the question of the unqualified right of a suitor to a receiver in a proper case, and the terms a court may impose as a condition to the appointment of a receiver, nor the power of a court to create prior liens for the preservation of property held by it during the pendency of litigation. The principle asserted in the case under consideration goes far beyond all these rules and regulations incident to the appointment of receivers and the preservation of property. It boldly announces as a universal principle of "abstract equity," not dependent upon contract nor affected by contract, "and which needs no other justification for its application in any case than the existence of facts upon which it arises and rests." I quote from the opinion itself as follows: "Enough has, we think, been said by ourselves, and through our adoption of the language of Judge Waite, to demonstrate that the equity of the doctrine lies solely in the facts that the gross income of the corporation, which in good conscience belongs to its laborers and operatives, has been, in one form or another, diverted from them, and converted, directly or indirectly, to the use, benefit, and behoof of the bondholders, to whom in equity and good conscience it does not belong (whether the mortgages securing the bonds in terms embrace income or not) until the wages of laborers and operatives, and the accounts of supply or materialmen, for labor done and supplies furnished recently before the appointment of the receiver, have been paid. And this is the whole equity, and it is in itself a perfect equity. The fact that the corporation is of a public character does not enter into it, and is not an element of it, any more than such fact would be necessary to a recovery in trover for a horse converted by a corporation. Every element of this equity may exist as well against a private as against a public corporation, and against bond creditors of the one as well as the other. The right to be asserted is obviously the same, whatever the character in this respect of the corporation. The wrong done to the employees is the same,—the misappropriation of the fund for the payment of their wages. And the remedy for the effectuation of the right and the redress of the wrong is applied upon considerations which take no account of whether the corporation whose earnings have thus been wrongfully diverted from the payment of its employees is a railroad company or a manufacturing company or a mining company. The diversion of the fund being shown, and the equity being thus made to appear, the redress is accorded, the equity is declared and effectuated, by courts of chancery, upon that broad and beneficent maxim of equity jurisprudence which imposes, or authorizes the court to impose, upon every suitor asking equitable relief the duty and burden of doing equity; and we have not heard or seen it suggested that this principle is applicable more to one suitor than another, or more to a public than a private corporation. The necessity for the application of this equitable doctrine for giving preference to claims of employees for wages is doubtless more frequent in railroad cases, but that does not argue that the facts which authorize it cannot as well exist in other cases. So, there is more necessity, ordinarily, for a railroad corporation to be kept a 'going concern' because of the duty it owes the public, and the character of its business; and hence it is true that the facts stated constituting the equity of the doctrine in the third category, supra, exist more frequently in respect of railroad property. But there may well be, from the point of view of the bondholders, as much necessity to keep the works of a private corporation going, in order to protect and preserve the property which is the bondholders' security, as also to earn income for the payment of current expenses and the principal and interest of the bonds. And the necessity of keeping the corporation a going concern is in all cases gauged, not from the standpoint of the public, but from the standpoint of the bondholders, and for the purpose of determining, not what injury the public would have suffered from the stoppage of the works, nor how they have been benefited by the continuation of the business, but what injury the bondholder would have suffered from such stoppage, in the loss of net income, and in the diminution of the value of the property, with a view to measuring the benefits he has received from the labor of employees in continuing to carry on the operations of the corporation. The damages and loss to the bondholder from a stoppage of the operations of a railroad would generally be greater than from the stoppage of the works of a mining company: but, whether greater or less, they stand upon the same footing, as a measure of the benefit accruing to him from the labor which prevented their infliction upon him. The difference is one of quantity and not of kind."

It must be observed that the "equity" here asserted is not made to depend upon any statute or agreement to that effect in favor of the "wages of laborers and operatives, and the accounts of supply or materialmen, for labor done and supplies furnished recently before the appointment of the receiver," and, until paid, made a prior charge upon the gross income proceeding from such consideration, or if such income has been otherwise expended, then upon the corpus into which consideration entered. The predicate for the argument is "that the gross income belongs to the laborers and operatives and materialmen, which, in one form or another, has been diverted from them, and converted, directly or indirectly, to the use, benefit, and behoof of the bondholders, to whom in equity and good conscience it does not belong (whether the mortgages securing the bonds in terms embrace income or not) until these wages and materialmen have been paid." We have italicized the words which are made the pillars of the argument. Is it a fact that the gross income covered by a prior executed mortgage, known to the parties, belongs, in any sense, to the laborer or materialman, as a matter of equal or equitable right, and that it does not belong to the bondholder, although by contract he has secured a prior lien, which lien existed, and which the laborer and materialman knew existed, when the services were rendered and the supplies or material were furnished? Have we discovered or invented a legal X ray, which exposes to the judicial eye an imperfection in the old doctrine of contract on personal credit, or manifests as unsound the rule which declares contracts to be sacred and inviolable? If the income belongs to the laborer, he ought to be able to recover it in an action for money had and received, and not by a judgment for services rendered. If he or the materialman has a lien upon or prior claim to the income, or upon the "corpus into which the labor or material has entered," as an "abstract" and "perfect equity," independent of contract or statute, the judicial mind, for a century or more, has been grossly at fault. The interventions of legislatures to provide for labor and material furnished, and the study and worry of courts to adjust the rights of contractors and prior mortgagees under these statutory enactments, were to a great degree superfluous, and labor lost; for if the doctrine now contended for be sound, there arose from the facts, without the statute or agreement, a perfect equity, which only needed application and enforcement. If the doctrine now contended for is sound, there must arise on every farm, in every manufactory, mine, and enterprise in which labor is performed and material furnished, from which a gross income is derived, the same rights and equity, independent of, and superior to, the claims of all other creditors, without regard to previous or subsequent contracts. If the perfect equity exist, the arbitrary limitation by some courts to six months within which such claims may be en-
